Secondly. It will redound to our honour, for herein we shall resemble God in his goodness, which is his greatest glory; "ye shall be the children of the Highest," shall be owned by him as his children, being like him. It is the glory of God that he is "kind to the unthankful and to the evil," bestows the gifts of common providence even upon the worst of men, who are every day provoking him and rebelling against him, and using those very gifts to his dishonour. Hence he infers, ver. 36, "Be merciful, as your Father is merciful;" this explains Mat. v. 48, "Be perfect, as your Father is perfect." Imitate your Father in those things that are his brightest perfections. Those that are merciful as God is merciful, even to the evil and the unthankful, are perfect as God is perfect; so he is pleased graciously to accept it, though infinitely falling short. Charity is called the bond of perfectness, Col. iii. 14; and this should strongly engage us to be merciful to our brethren, even such as have been injurious to us; not only that God is so to others, but that he is so to us, though we have been and are evil and unthankful; it is of his mercies that we are not consumed.

37 Judge not, and ye shall not be judged: condemn not, and ye shall not be condemned: forgive, and ye shall be forgiven: 38 Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again. 39 And he spake a parable unto them, Can the blind lead the blind? shall they not both fall into the ditch? 40 The disciple is not above his master: but every one that is perfect shall be as his master. 41 And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but perceivest not the beam that is in thine own eye? 42 Either how canst thou say to thy brother, Brother, let me pull out the mote that is in thine eye, when thou thyself beholdest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to pull out the mote that is in thy brother's eye. 43 For a good tree bringeth not day he beheld a certain man working on the Sabbath, and said unto him, O man, if thou knowest what thou art doing, blessed art thou; but if thou knowest not, accursed and a transgressor of the law. This remarkable substitution seems to be an interpolation, but hardly an invention of later times. Its form and contents speak for its originality, and, I am disposed to believe, its authenticity. On this extraordinary criticism it is enough to observe, that the Cambridge MS. is alone in its strange reading here, as it is in some other very eccentric examples. No ancient copy, translation, or author shows any trace of the existence of this reading elsewhere.

vi. 15. The word "Zelotes" is the Greek equivalent of the Aramaic Cananite, which is wrongly spelled Canaanite in Matt. x. 4, Mark iii. 18.

vi. 16. He who in our version is here called "Judas the brother of James" is clearly the same as is styled Thaddæus by Mark, and "Lebbæus, whose surname was Thaddæus," by Matthew. For forth corrupt fruit; neither doth a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. 44 For every tree is known by his own fruit. For of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble bush gather they grapes. 45 A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good; and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is evil: for of the abundance of the heart his mouth speaketh. 46 And why call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say? 47 Whosoever cometh to me, and heareth my sayings, and doeth them, I will shew you to whom he is like: 48 He is like a man which built an house, and digged deep, and laid the foundation on a rock: and when the flood arose, the stream beat vehemently upon that house, and could not shake it: for it was founded upon a rock. 49 But he that heareth, and doeth not, is like a man that without a foundation built an house upon the earth; against which the stream did beat vehemently, and immediately it fell; and the ruin of that house was great.

All these sayings of Christ we had before in Matthew, some of them ch. vii., others in other places. They were sayings Christ often used, they needed only to be mentioned; it was easy to apply them. Grotius thinks we need not be critical here in seeking for the coherence; they are golden sentences, like Solomon's proverbs, or parables. Let us observe here,

First. That we ought to be very candid in our censures of others, because we need grains of allowance ourselves. Therefore judge not others, because then you yourselves shall not be judged; therefore condemn not others, because then you yourselves shall not be condemned, ver. 37. Exercise towards others that charity which thinketh no evil, which bears all things, believes and hopes all things, and then others will exercise that charity towards you. God will not judge and condemn you, men will not. They that are merciful to other people's names shall find others merciful to theirs.

Secondly. That if we are of a giving and a forgiving spirit, we shall ourselves reap the benefit of it: "forgive, and ye shall be forgiven." They that forgive others' injuries, others will forgive them their inadvertencies. They that forgive others' trespasses against them, God will forgive them their trespasses against him; and he will be no less mindful of the liberal, that devise liberal things, ver. 38; "give, and it shall be given to you." God in his providence will recompense it to you; it is lent to him, and he is not unrighteous to forget it, Heb. vi. 10, but he will pay it again. Men shall return it into your bosom; for God makes use of men many times as instruments, not only of his avenging, but of his rewarding justice. If we in a right manner give to others when they need, God will incline the hearts of others to give to us when we need, and to give liberally, "good measure, pressed down and shaken together;" "they that sow plentifully shall reap plentifully." Whom God recompenseth he abundantly recompenseth.

Thirdly. That we must expect to be dealt with ourselves as we deal with others; "with the same measure that ye mete it shall be measured to you again." Those that deal hardly with others must acknowledge, as Adoni-bezek did, Jud. i. 7, that God is righteous, if others deal hardly with them, and they may expect to be paid in their own coin; but they that deal kindly with others have reason to hope that, when they have occasion, God will raise them up friends that will deal kindly with them. Though Providence doth not always go by this rule, because the full and exact retributions are reserved for another world, yet ordinarily it observes a proportion sufficient to deter us from all acts of rigour, and to encourage us in all acts of beneficence.

Fourthly. That those who put themselves under the conduct of the ignorant and erroneous, are likely to perish with them, ver. 39: "Can the blind lead the blind?" Can the Pharisees, that are blinded with pride, and prejudice, and bigotry, "lead the blind" people into the right way? "shall not both fall" together "into the ditch?" How can they expect any other? Those that are led by the common opinion, course, and custom of this world, are themselves blind, and are led by the blind, and will perish with the world, that sits in darkness. They that ignorantly, and at a venture, follow the multitude to do evil, follow the blind in the broad way that leads the many to destruction.

Fifthly. That Christ's followers cannot expect better treatment in the world than their Master had, ver. 40. Let them not promise themselves more honour or pleasure in the world than Christ had, nor aim at that worldly pomp and grandeur which he never was ambitious of, but always declined; nor affect that power in secular things which he would not assume; but every one that would shew himself perfect, an established disciple, let him be as his Master, dead to the world, and every thing in it, as his Master is; let him live a life of labour and self-denial, as his Master doth, and make himself a servant of all; let him stoop, and let him toil, and do all the good he can, and then he will be a complete disciple.

Sixthly. That those who take upon them to rebuke and reform others are concerned to look to it that they be themselves blameless, and harmless, and without rebuke, ver. 41, 42. 1. Those with a very ill grace censure the faults of others who are not aware of their own faults. It is very absurd for any to pretend to be so quick-sighted as to spy small faults in others, like a mote in the eye, when they are themselves so perfectly past feeling as not to perceive "a beam in their own eye." 2. Those are altogether unfit to help to reform others, whose reforming charity doth not begin at home. How canst thou offer thy service to thy brother to "pull out the mote from his eye," which requires a good eye, as well as a good hand, when thou thyself hast a "beam in thine own eye," and makest no complaint of it? 3. Those therefore that would be serviceable to the souls of others, must first make it appear that they are solicitous about their own souls. To help to pull the mote out of our brother's eye is a good work, but then we must qualify ourselves for it, by beginning with ourselves; and our reforming our own lives may, by the influence of example, contribute to others reforming theirs.

Seventhly. That we may expect men's words and actions will be according as they are, according as their hearts are, and according as their principles are.

1. The heart is the tree, and the words and actions are fruit according to the nature of the tree, ver. 43, 44. If a man be really a good man, if he is a principle of grace in his heart, and the prevailing bent and bias of the soul be towards God and heaven, though perhaps he may not abound in fruit, though some of his fruits be blasted, and though he may be sometimes like a tree in winter, yet he doth not bring forth corrupt fruit; though he may not do you all the good he should, yet he will not in any material instance do you hurt; if he cannot reform ill manners, he will not corrupt good manners. If the fruit man brings forth be corrupt, if a man's devotion tends to debauch the mind and conversation, if a man's conversation be vicious, if he be a drunkard or fornicator, if he be a swearer or liar, if he be in any instance unjust or unnatural, his fruit is corrupt, and you may be sure he is not a good tree. On the other hand, a "corrupt tree doth not bring forth good fruit," though he may bring forth green leaves, "for of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble do they gather grapes." You may, if you please, stick figs upon thorns, and hang a bunch of grapes upon a bramble, but they neither are nor can be the natural product of the trees; so neither can you expect any good carriage from those that have justly an ill character. If the fruit be good, you may conclude the tree is so; if the conversation be holy, and heavenly, and regular, though you cannot infallibly know the heart, yet you may charitably hope that that is upright with God, for "every tree is known by its own fruit;" but "the vile person will speak villany," Isa. xxxii. 6; and the experience of the moderns herein agrees with the proverb of the ancients, that "wickedness proceedeth from the wicked," 1 Sam. xxiv. 13.

2. The heart is the treasure, and the words and actions are the expenses or produce from that treasure, ver. 45: this we had, Mat. xii. 34, 35. The reigning love of God and Christ in the heart denominates a man "a good man," and it is "a good treasure in the heart," it enricheth a man, it furnisheth him with a good stock to spend upon for the benefit of others; out of such a good treasure a man may bring forth that which is good; but where the love of the world and the flesh reign, there is an evil treasure in the heart, out of which an evil man is continually bringing forth that which is evil; and by what is brought forth you may know what is in the heart, as you may know what is in the vessel, water or wine, by what is drawn out from it, Jno. ii. 8; "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks." What the mouth doth ordinarily speak, doth speak with relish and delight, generally agrees with what is innermost and uppermost in the heart; "he that speaks of the earth is earthly," Jno. iii. 31: not but that a good man may possibly drop an ill word, and a wicked man make use of a good word to serve an ill turn; but, for the most part, the heart is as the words are, vain or serious; it therefore concerns us to get our hearts filled, not only with good, but with abundance of it.

Eighthly. That it is not enough to hear the sayings of Christ, but we must do them; not enough to profess relation to him, as his servants, but we must make conscience of obeying him.

1. It is putting an affront upon him, to call him "Lord, Lord," as if we were wholly at his command, and had devoted ourselves to his service, if we do not make conscience of conforming to his will, and serving the interests of his kingdom. We do but mock Christ, as they that in scorn said, "Hail, King of the Jews," if we call him never so often "Lord, Lord," and yet walk in the way of our own hearts, and in the sight of our own eyes. Why do we call him "Lord, Lord," in prayer, (compare Mat. vii. 21, 22), if we do not obey his commands? He that "turns away his ear from hearing the law, his prayer shall be an abomination."

2. It is putting a cheat upon ourselves, if we think that a bare profession of religion will save us, that hearing the sayings of Christ will bring us to heaven without doing them. This he illustrates by a similitude, ver. 47—49, which shews,

1st. That those only make sure work for their souls and eternity, and take the course that will stand them in stead in a trying time, who do not only come to Christ as his scholars, and hear his sayings, but do them; who think, and speak, and act, in every thing, according to the established rules of his holy religion. They are like a house built on a rock; these are they that take pains in religion, as they do that build on a rock; that begin low, as they do that dig deep; that found their hope upon Christ, who is the Rock of Ages, and other foundation can no man lay; these are they who provide for hereafter, who get ready for the worst, who lay up in store a good foundation for the time to come, for the eternity to come, 1 Tim. vi. 19. They that do thus, do well for themselves; for, First. They shall keep their integrity in times of temptation and persecution; when others fall from their own steadfastness, as the seed on the stony ground, they shall stand fast in the Lord. Secondly. They shall keep their comfort, and peace, and hope, and joy, in the midst of the greatest distresses. The storms and streams of affliction shall not shock them, for their feet are set upon a rock, a rock higher than they. Thirdly. Their everlasting welfare is secured. In death and judgment they are safe. Obedient believers "are kept by the power of Christ through faith unto salvation," and shall never perish.

2nd. That those who rest in a bare hearing of the sayings of Christ, and do not live up to them, are but preparing for a fatal disappointment. "He that heareth and doth not," that knows his duty, but lives in the neglect of it, he is like a man that built a house without a foundation. He pleaseth himself with hopes that he has no ground for, and his hopes will fail him when he most needs the comfort of them; and when he expects the crowning of them, when the stream beats vehemently upon his house, it is gone; the sand it is built upon is washed away, and immediately it falls. Such is the "hope of the hypocrite, though he has gained, when God takes away his soul;" it is as the spider's web, and the giving up of the ghost.

CHAPTER VII.

In this chapter we have, I. Christ confirming the doctrine he had preached in the former chapter with two glorious miracles, the curing of one at a distance, and that was the centurion's servant, ver. 1—10; and the raising of one to life that was dead, the widow's son at Nain, ver. 11—18. II. Christ confirming the faith of John, who was now in prison, and of some of his disciples, by sending him a short account of the miracles he wrought, in answer to a question he received from him, ver. 19—23; to which he adds an honourable testimony concerning John, and a just reproof to the men of that generation, for the contempt they put upon him and his doctrine, ver. 24—35. III. Christ comforting a poor penitent that applied herself to him, all in tears of godly sorrow for sin, assuring her that her sins were pardoned; and justifying himself in the favour he shewed her against the cavils of a proud Pharisee, ver. 36—50.

"brother of James" we incline to receive the explanation, "son of James." His relation to James is not defined by the Greek, and hence the doubt. Jerome calls him "the three-named apostle."

vi. 20. In the clause "blessed be ye poor," it is important to note that "be" is used in the sense of "are," which is correctly used in the succeeding verses. The Greek words here, and in Matt. v. 3, are literally the same so far, but the first evangelist adds the explanatory phrase "in spirit," to show that material poverty is not declared to be a blessed condition in itself. The metaphorical sense of many of the forms of speech in this summary can scarcely be overlooked by an intelligent student who remembers its spiritual bearings.

vi. 35. "Hoping for nothing again" is a doubtful rendering, and one which cannot be justified. We have no doubt the sense is, "not disappointing hope;" i.e., "if the poor look to you for aid, help them, do not disappoint them;" or, as the Syriac says, "do not cut off the hope of a man."

NOW when he had ended all his sayings in the audience of the people, he entered into Capernaum. 2 And a certain centurion's servant, who was dear unto him, was sick, and ready to die. 3 And when he heard of Jesus, he sent unto him the elders of the Jews, beseeching him that he would come and heal his servant. 4 And when they came to Jesus, they besought him instantly, saying, That he was worthy for whom he should do this: 5 For he loveth our nation, and he hath built us a synagogue. 6 Then Jesus went with them. And when he was now not far from the house, the centurion sent friends to him, saying unto him, Lord, trouble not thyself: for I am not worthy that thou shouldest enter under my roof: 7 Wherefore neither thought I myself worthy to come unto thee: but say in a word, and my servant shall be healed. 8 For I also am a man set under authority, having under me soldiers, and I say unto one, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it. 9 When Jesus heard these things, he marvelled at him, and turned him about, and said unto the people that followed him, I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. 10 And they that were sent, returning to the house, found the servant whole that had been sick.

Some difference there is between this story of the cure of the centurion's servant, as it is related here, and as we had it Mat. viii. 5, &c.: for there it was said that the centurion came to Christ; here it is said that he sent to him, first some of the "elders of the Jews," ver. 3, and afterwards some other friends, ver. 6. But it is a rule that "we are said to do that which we do by another," quod facimus per alium id ipsum facere dicamur. The centurion might be said to do that which he did by his proxies, as a man takes possession by his attorney. But it is probable the centurion himself came at last, when Christ said to him, Mat. viii. 13, "As thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee." This miracle is here said to have been wrought by our Lord Jesus "when he had ended all his sayings in the audience of the people," ver. 1. What Christ said he said publicly; whoever would, might come and hear him; "in secret have I said nothing," Jno. xviii. 20. Now to give an undeniable proof of the authority of his preaching word, he here gives an incontestable proof of the power and efficacy of his healing word. He that had such a commanding empire in the kingdom of nature, that he could command away diseases, no doubt has such a sovereignty in the kingdom of grace as to enjoin duties displeasing to flesh and blood, and bind under the highest penalties to the observance of them. This miracle was wrought in Capernaum, where most of Christ's mighty works were done, Mat. xi. 23. Now observe.

First. That the centurion's servant that was sick was dear to his master, ver. 2. It was the praise of the servant, that by his diligence and faithfulness, and a manifest concern for his master and for his interest, as for himself and for his own, he recommended himself to his master's esteem and love. Servants should study to endure themselves to their masters. It was likewise the praise of the master, that when he had a good servant he knew how to value him. Many masters, that are haughty and imperious, think it favour to enjoin to the best servants they have not to rate them, and beat them, and be cruel to them; whereas they ought to be kind to them, and tender of them, and solicitous for their welfare and comfort.

Secondly. That the master, "when he heard of Jesus," was for making application to him, ver. 3. Masters ought to take particular care of their servants when they are sick, and not to neglect them then. This centurion begged that Christ would come and heal his servant; we may now by faithful and fervent prayer apply ourselves to Christ in heaven, and ought to do so when sickness is in our families; for Christ is still the great Physician.

Thirdly. That he sent some of the elders of the Jews to Christ, to represent the case and solicit for him, thinking that a greater piece of respect to Christ than if he had come himself, because he was an uncircumcised Gentile, whom he thought Christ, being a prophet, would not care for conversing with. For that reason he sent Jews, whom he acknowledged to be favourites of Heaven; and not ordinary Jews neither, but elders of the Jews, persons in authority, that the dignity of the messengers might give honour to him to whom they were sent: Balak sent princes to Balaam.

Fourthly. That the elders of the Jews were hearty intercessors for the centurion, "they besought him instantly," ver. 4: were very urgent with him, pleading for the centurion that which he would never have pleaded for himself, "that he was worthy for whom he should do this." If any Gentile was qualified to receive such a favour, sure he was. The centurion said, "I am not so much as worthy of a visit," Mat. viii. 8; but the elders of the Jews thought him worthy of the cure; thus honour shall uphold the humble in spirit: "Let another man praise thee, and not thy own mouth." But that which they insisted upon in particular was, that though he was a Gentile, yet he was a hearty well-wisher to the Jewish nation and religion, ver. 5: they thought there needed as much with Christ as there did with them to remove the prejudices against him as a Gentile, and a Roman, and an officer of the army; and therefore mention this, 1. That he was well affected to the people of the Jews; "he loveth our nation," which few of the Gentiles did. Probably he had read the Old Testament, from whence it was easy to advance a very high esteem of the Jewish nation, as favoured by Heaven above all people. Note, Even conquerors and those in power ought to keep up an affection for the conquered, and those they have power over. 2. That he was well affected to their worship; he built them a new synagogue at Capernaum, finding that what they had was either gone to decay or not large enough to contain the people, and that the inhabitants were not of ability to build one for themselves. Hereby he testified his veneration for the God of Israel, and his belief of his being the one only living and true God, and his desire, like that of Darius, to have an interest in the prayers of God's Israel, Ezr. vi. 10. This centurion built a synagogue at his own proper costs and charges, and probably employed his soldiers, that were in the garrison there, in the building, to keep them from idleness. Note, Building places of meeting for religious worship is a very good work, is an instance of love to God and his people; and those who do good works of that kind are worthy of double honour.

Fifthly. That Jesus Christ was very ready to shew kindness to the centurion. He presently went with them, ver. 6, though he was a Gentile; for "is he the Saviour of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also," Rom. iii. 39. The centurion did not think himself worthy to visit Christ, ver. 7, yet Christ thought him worthy to be visited by him; for those that humble themselves shall be exalted.

Sixthly. That the centurion, when he heard that Christ was doing him the honour to come to his house, gave farther proofs both of his humility and of his faith. Thus, the graces of saints are quickened by Christ's approaches towards them. "When he was now not far from the house," and the centurion had notice of it, instead of setting his house in order for his reception, he sends friends to meet him with fresh expressions, 1. Of his humility: "Lord, trouble not thyself," for I am unworthy of such an honour, because I am a Gentile. This speaks not only his low thoughts of himself, notwithstanding the greatness of his figure, but his high thoughts of Christ, notwithstanding the meanness of his figure, in the world. He knew how to honour a prophet of God, though he was despised and rejected of men. 2. Of his faith: "Lord, trouble not thyself," for I know it doth not need; thou canst cure my servant without coming under my roof, by that almighty power from which so thought can be withholden; "say in a word, and my servant shall be healed;" so far was this centurion from Naaman's fancy, that he should come to him, and stand and strike his hand over the patient, and so recover him, 2 Km. v. 11. He illustrates this faith of his by a comparison taken from his own profession, and is confident Christ can as easily command away the distemper as he can command any of his soldiers; can as easily send an angel, with commission to cure this servant of his, as he can send a soldier on an errand, ver. 8. Christ hath a sovereign power over all the creatures, and all their actions, and can change the course of nature as he pleaseth, can rectify its disorders, and repair its decays in human bodies, for all power is given to him.

Seventhly. That our Lord Jesus was wonderfully well pleased with the faith of the centurion, and the more surprised at it because he was a Gentile; and the centurion's faith having thus honoured Christ, see how he honoured it, ver. 9: "he turned him about," as one amazed, "and said to the people that followed him, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." Note, Christ will have those that follow him, to observe, and take notice of the great examples of faith that are sometimes set before them, especially when any such are found among those that do not follow Christ so closely as they do in profession; that we may be shamed, by the strength of their faith, out of the weaknesses and waverings of ours.

Eighthly. That the cure was presently and perfectly wrought, ver. 10. They that were sent, knew they had their errand, and therefore went back, and found the servant well, and under no remains at all of his distemper. Christ will take cognizance of the distressed case of poor servants, and be ready to relieve them, for there is no respect of persons with him. Nor are the Gentiles excluded from the benefit of his grace; nay, this was a specimen of that much greater faith which would be found among the Gentiles, when the Gospel would be published, than among the Jews.

11 And it came to pass the day after, that he went into a city called Nain; and many of his

vi. 38. The phrase "running over" scarcely conveys the force of the original, which, with Dr. Hammond, we understand to mean "abundantly poured out."

vi. 40. The word "perfect" has various shades of meaning. As the word "disciple" here means a "learner," and "master" one who teaches, "perfect" has been understood of a well or fully instructed learner. The same Greek term occurs elsewhere, as in 2 Cor. xiii. 11, Rom. ix. 22, Mark i. 19. It generally conveys the idea of setting or being set in order; hence, to repair, prepare, constitute; hence, to be in good condition, thoroughly qualified.

vi. 44. The word for thorns is sufficiently generic to include various kinds of thorny plants and shrubs, which are common in Palestine. "Bramble bush" is a very free rendering of a word which means a bush. The same word occurs in chap. xx. 37.

vi. 49. The liability to sudden rushes of water in time of rain is very common in many countries, and it is matter of observation that disciples went with him, and much people. 12 Now when he came nigh to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow: and much people of the city was with her. 13 And when the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not. 14 And he came and touched the bier: and they that bare him stood still. And he said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise. 15 And he that was dead sat up, and began to speak. And he delivered him to his mother. 16 And there came a fear on all: and they glorified God, saying, That a great prophet is risen up among us; and, That God hath visited his people. 17 And this rumour of him went forth throughout all Judæa, and throughout all the region round about. 18 And the disciples of John shewed him of all these things.

We have here the story of Christ's raising to life a widow's son at Nain, that was dead, and in the carrying out to be buried; which Matthew and Mark had made no mention of, only, in the general, Matthew had recorded it in Christ's answer to the disciples of John, that the dead were raised up, Mat. xi. 5. Observe,

First. Where and when this miracle was wrought. It was the next day after he had cured the centurion's servant, ver. 11. Christ was doing good every day, and never had cause to complain that he had lost a day. It was done at the gate of a small city, or town, called Nain, not far from Capernaum. Probably the same with a city called Nais, which Jerome speaks of.

Secondly. Who were the witnesses of it. It is as well attested as can be, for it was done in the sight of two crowds, that met in or near the gate of the city. There was a crowd of disciples and other people attending Christ, ver. 11; and a crowd of relations and neighbours attending the funeral of the young man, ver. 12. Thus there were a sufficient number to attest the truth of this miracle; for it was a greater proof of Christ's Divine authority than his healing of diseases, for by no power of nature or any means can the dead be raised.

Thirdly. How it was wrought by our Lord Jesus.

1. The person raised to life was a young man, cut off by death in the beginning of his days; a common case: "Man comes forth like a flower, and is cut down." That he was really dead was universally agreed; there could be no collusion in the case, for Christ was entering into the town, and had not seen him till now that he met him upon the bier. He was carried out of the city, for the Jews' burying-places were without their cities, and at some distance from them. This young man was "the only son of his mother, and she a widow." She depended upon him to be the staff of her old age; but he proves a broken reed; every man, at his best estate, is so. How numerous, how various, how very calamitous, are the afflictions of the afflicted in this world! What a vale of tears is it! What a Bochim, a place of weepers! We may well think how deep the sorrow of this poor mother was for her only son; that is used to express the greatest grief, Zec. xii. 10; and the deeper in that she was a widow, broken with breach upon breach, and a full end made of her comforts. "Much people of the city was with her," by condoling her loss, to comfort her.

2. Christ shewed both his pity and his power in raising him to life, that he might give a specimen of both, which shine so bright in man's redemption.

1st. See how tender his compassions are towards the afflicted, ver. 13: "When the Lord saw the poor widow" following her son to the grave, "he had compassion on her." Here was no application made to him for her, not so much as that he would speak some words of comfort to her, but, ex mero motu,—purely from the goodness of his nature; he was troubled for her. The case was piteous, and he looked upon it with pity. His eye affected his heart; and he said unto her, "Weep not." Note, Christ has a concern for the mourners, for the miserable, and often "prevents them with the blessings of his goodness." He undertook the work of our redemption and salvation "in his love and in his pity," Isa. lxiii. 9. What a pleasing idea doth this give us of the compassions of the Lord Jesus, and the multitude of his tender mercies, which may be very comfortable to us, when at any time we are in sorrow. Let poor widows comfort themselves in their sorrows with this, that Christ pities them, and knows their souls in adversity; and if others despise their grief, he does not. Christ said, "Weep not;" and he could give her a reason for it, which no one else could; weep not for a dead son, for he shall presently become a living one. This was a reason peculiar to her case; yet there is a reason common to all that sleep in Jesus, which is of equal force against inordinate and excessive grief for their death, that they shall rise again—shall rise in glory; and therefore we must not sorrow as those that have no hope, 1 Thes. iv. 13. Let "Rachel, that weeps for her children, refrain her eyes from tears, for there is hope in thine end, saith the Lord, that thy children shall come again to their own border," Jer. xxxi. 17; and let our passion at such a time be checked and calmed by the consideration of Christ's compassion.

2nd. See how triumphant his commands are over even death itself, ver. 14: "he came and touched the bier" or coffin, in or upon which the dead body lay: for to him it would be no pollution; hereby he intimated to the bearers that they should not proceed; he had something to say to the dead young man; "Deliver him from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom," Job xxxii. 24. Hereupon "they that bare him stood still," and probably let down the bier from their shoulders to the ground, and opened the coffin, if it were closed up; and then, with solemnity, as one that had authority, and to whom belonged the issues from death, he said, "Young man, I say unto thee, Arise." The young man was dead, and could not arise by any power of his own; no more can those that are spiritually dead in trespasses and sins; yet it was no absurdity at all for Christ to bid him arise, when a power went along with that word to put life into him. The Gospel call to all people, to young people particularly, is, "Arise, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give you light and life. Christ's dominion over death was evidenced by the immediate effect of his word, ver. 15: "he that was dead sat up" without any help. When Christ put life into him, he made it to appear by his sitting up. Have we grace from Christ? let us shew it. Another evidence of life was, that he "began to speak;" for whenever Christ gives us spiritual life, he opens the lips in prayer and praise. And lastly, he would not oblige this young man, to whom he had given a new life, to go along with him, either as his disciple, to minister to him, though he owed him even his own self, much less as a trophy or a show to get honour by him, but "delivered him to his mother," to attend her as became a dutiful son; for Christ's miracles were miracles of mercy; and a great act of mercy this was to this widow: now she was comforted, according to the time in which she had been afflicted, and much more, for she could now look upon this son as a particular favourite of Heaven, with more pleasure than if he had not died.

Fourthly. What influence it had upon the people, ver. 16: "There came a fear on all;" it frightened them all to see a dead man start up alive out of his coffin in the open street, at the command of a man; they were all struck with wonder at this miracle, "and glorified God." The Lord and his goodness, as well as the Lord and his greatness, are to be feared. The inference they drew from it was, "that a great prophet is risen up among us," the great Prophet that we have been long looking for; doubtless he is one divinely inspired, who can thus breathe life into the dead; and that in him "God had visited his people" to redeem them, as was expected, ch. i. 68. This would be life from the dead indeed, to all them that waited for the consolation of Israel. When dead souls are thus raised to spiritual life, by a Divine power going along with the Gospel, we must glorify God, and look upon it as a gracious visit to his people. The report of this miracle was carried, 1. In general all the country over, ver. 17: "this rumour of him," that he was the great Prophet, "went forth" upon the wings of fame "through all Judæa," which lay a great way off, and throughout all Galilee, which was "the region round about." Most got this notion of him, yet few believed in him, and gave up themselves to him. Many have the rumour of Christ's Gospel in their ears, that have not the savour and relish of it in their souls. 2. In particular, it was carefully brought to John Baptist, who was now in prison, ver. 18: "his disciples came" and gave him an account of all things, that he might know, that though he was bound, yet the word of the Lord was not bound; God's work was going on, though he was laid aside.

19 And John calling unto him two of his disciples sent them to Jesus, saying, Art thou he that should come? or look we for another? 20 When the men were come unto him, they said, John Baptist hath sent us unto thee, saying, Art thou he that should come? or look we for another? 21 And in that same hour he cured many of their infirmities and plagues, and of evil spirits; and unto many that were blind he gave sight. 22 Then Jesus answering said unto them, Go your way, and tell John what things he have seen and heard; how that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, to the poor the gospel is preached. 23 And blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me. 24 And when the messengers of John were departed, he began to speak unto the people concerning John, What went ye out into the wilderness for to see? A reed shaken with the wind? 25 But what went ye out for to see? A man clothed in soft raiment? Behold, they which are gorgeously apparelled, and live delicately, are in kings' courts. 26 But what went ye out for to see? A prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and much more than a prophet.

houses which are not substantially built upon a good foundation are undermined and destroyed within a very short space of time.

vii. 2. A similar narrative occurs in Matt. viii. 5, &c., but with differences which have occupied the attention of the critics. In particular, Matthew states that the centurion came to Jesus, while here we read that certain Jewish elders were sent. The common rule in such a case would lead us to take this as the literally exact account. What a man does by means of his agents he is regarded as doing himself, and this principle is recognised in records of every kind. "Thus is Christ said to have preached peace to the Ephesians (Eph. ii. 17), which personally he did not; and repentance to the old world (1 Pet. iii. 19), which he did by Noah. So James and John are said to come unto Christ, and petition him (Mark x. 35), which, in Matt. xx. 20, their mother is said to do for them." The term "elders," in verse 3, must be understood of those persons who took part in the management of public affairs at Capernaum. They may 27 This is he, of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee. 28 For I say unto you, Among those that are born of women there is not a greater prophet than John the Baptist: but he that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he. 29 And all the people that heard him, and the publicans, justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John. 30 But the Pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves, being not baptized of him. 31 And the Lord said, Whereunto then shall I liken the men of this generation? and to what are they like? 32 They are like unto children sitting in the marketplace, and calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept. 33 For John the Baptist came neither eating bread nor drinking wine; and ye say, He hath a devil. 34 The Son of man is come eating and drinking; and ye say, Behold a gluttonous man, and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners! 35 But wisdom is justified of all her children.

All this discourse concerning John Baptist, occasioned by his sending to ask whether he were the Messiah or no, we had, much as it is here related, Mat. xi. 2-19.

First. We have here the message John Baptist sent to Christ, and the return he made to it. Observe,

1. The great thing we are to inquire concerning is, whether he be he that should come to redeem and save sinners, or whether we are to look for another, ver. 19, 20. We are sure God has promised that a Saviour shall come, an anointed Saviour; we are as sure, that what he has promised he will perform in its season. If this Jesus be that promised Messiah, we will receive him, and will look for no other; but if not, we will continue our expectations, and, though he tarry, will wait for him.

2. The faith of John Baptist himself, or at least of his disciples, wanted to be confirmed in this matter; for Christ had not yet publicly declared himself to be indeed the Christ; nay, he would not have his disciples, who knew him to be so, to speak of it till the proofs of his being so were completed in his resurrection. The great men of the Jewish church had not owned him, nor had he gained any interest that was like to set him upon the throne of his father David. Nothing of that power and grandeur was to be seen about him, in which it was expected the Messiah would appear; and therefore it is not strange that they should ask, 'Art thou the Messiah?' not doubting but that, if he were not, he would direct them what other to look for.

3. Christ left it to his own works to praise him in the gates, to tell what he was, and to prove it. While John's messengers were with him he wrought many miraculous cures, "in that same hour;" which perhaps intimates, that they stayed but an hour with him; and what a deal of good work did Christ do in a little time, ver. 21: "He cured many of their infirmities and plagues" in body, and of evil spirits that affected the mind, either with frenzy or melancholy; "and unto many that were blind, he gave sight." He multiplied the cures, that there might be no ground left to suspect a fraud. And then, ver. 22, he bade them "go tell John what they had seen." And he and they might easily argue, as even the common people did, Jno. vii. 31, "When Christ cometh, will he do more miracles than these which this man hath done?" These cures, which they saw him work, were only not confirmations of his commission, but explanations of it. The Messiah must come to cure a diseased world, to give light and sight to them that sit in darkness, and to restrain and conquer evil spirits; you see that Jesus doth this to the bodies of people, and therefore must conclude this is he that should come to do it to the souls of people; and you are to look for no other. To his miracles in the kingdom of nature he adds this in the kingdom of grace, ver. 22: "to the poor the Gospel is preached;" which they knew was to be done by the Messiah, for he was anointed to "preach the Gospel to the meek," Isa. lxi. 1; and to "save the souls of the poor and needy," Ps. lxxii. 13; judge therefore whether you can look for any other that will more fully answer the characters of the Messiah, and the great intentions of his coming.

4. He gave them an intimation of the danger people were in of being prejudiced against him, notwithstanding these evident proofs of his being the Messiah, ver. 23: "Blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me," or scandalized at me. We are here in a state of trial and probation, and it is agreeable to such a state, that as there are sufficient arguments to confirm the truth to those that are honest and impartial in searching after it, and have their minds prepared to receive it; so there should be also objections to cloud the truth to those that are careless, and worldly, and sensual. Christ's education at Nazareth, his residence in Galilee, the meanness of his family and relations, his poverty, and the despicableness of his followers; these and the like, were stumblingblocks to many, which all the miracles he wrought could not help them over. He is blessed, for he is wise, and humble, and well disposed, that is not overcome by these prejudices. It is a sign God blesseth him, for it is by his grace that he is helped over these stumblingstones; and he shall be blessed indeed, blessed in Christ.

Secondly. We have here the high encomium which Christ gave of John Baptist; not while his messengers were present, lest he should seem to flatter him, but when they were departed, ver. 24; to make the people sensible of the advantages they had enjoyed in John's ministry, and were deprived of by his imprisonment. Let them now consider what they went out in the wilderness to see; who that was about whom there had been so much talk, and such a great and general amazement. Come, saith Christ, I will tell you.

1. He was a man of unshaken self-consistence; a man of steadiness and constancy; he was not "a reed shaken with the wind," first in one sway, and then in another, shifting with every wind; he was as firm as a rock, not fickle as a reed; if he could have bowed like a reed to Herod, and have complied with the court, he might have been a favourite there; but none of these things moved him.

2. He was a man of unparalleled self-denial; a great example of mortification and contempt of the world; he was not "a man clothed in soft raiment," nor did he live delicately, ver. 25; but on the contrary, he lived in a wilderness, and was clad and fed accordingly; instead of adorning and pampering the body, he brought it under, and kept it in subjection.

3. He was a prophet, had his commission and instructions immediately from God, and not of man, or by man. He was by birth a priest, but that is never taken notice of, for his glory as a prophet eclipsed the honour of his priesthood; nay, he was more, he was "much more than a prophet," ver. 26, than any of the Old Testament, for they spake of Christ as at a distance, he spake of him as at the door.

4. He was the harbinger and forerunner of the Messiah, and he was himself prophesied of in the Old Testament, ver. 27: "This is he of whom it is written," Mal. iii. 1, "Behold, I send my messenger before thy face." Before he sent the Master himself, he sent a messenger to give notice of his coming, and prepare people to receive him. Had the Messiah been to appear as a temporal prince, under which character the carnal Jews expected him, his messenger would have appeared either in the pomp of a general, or the gaiety of a herald at arms; but it was a previous indication, plain enough, of the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, that the messenger he sent before him to prepare his way, did it by preaching repentance and reformation of men's hearts and lives; certainly that kingdom was not of this world which was thus ushered in.

5. He was upon this account so great, that really there was not a greater prophet than he. Prophets were really the greatest that were born of women, more honourable than kings and princes, and John was the greatest of all the prophets; the country was not sensible what a valuable, what an invaluable man it had in it, when John Baptist went about preaching and baptizing; and yet "he that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he." The least Gospel minister that has obtained mercy of the Lord to be skilful and faithful in his work, or the meanest of the apostles and first preachers of the Gospel, being employed under a more excellent dispensation, are in a more honourable office than John Baptist; the meanest of those that follow the Lamb far excel the greatest of those that went before him. Those, therefore, who live under the Gospel dispensation have so much the more to answer for.

Thirdly. We have here the just censure of the men of that generation, that were not wrought upon by the ministry either of John Baptist or of Jesus Christ himself.

1. Christ here shews what contempt was put upon John Baptist, while he was preaching and baptizing. 1st. Those that did shew him any respect were but the common, ordinary sort of people, that in the eye of the gay part of mankind were rather a disgrace to him than any credit, ver. 29. The people indeed, the vulgar herd, of whom it was said, "this people who knoweth not the law are cursed," Jno. vii. 49; and the publicans, men of ill fame, as being generally men of ill morals, or taken to be so, these were baptized with his baptism, and became his disciples; and these, though glorious monuments of Divine grace, yet did not magnify John in the eye of the world; but by their repentance and reformation they justified God; justified his conduct, and the wisdom of it, in appointing such a one as John Baptist to be the forerunner of the Messiah; they hereby made it to appear that it was the best method that could be taken, for it was not in vain to them, whatever it was to others. 2nd. The great men of their church and nation, the polite and the politicians, that would have done him some credit in the eye of the world, did him all the dishonour they could; they heard him indeed, but they were not baptized of him, ver. 30. The Pharisees, that were most in reputation for religion and devotion, and the lawyers, that were celebrated for their learning, especially for their knowledge of the Scriptures, they "rejected the counsel of God against themselves;" they frustrated it; they received the grace of God in the baptism of John in vain. God, in sending that messenger among them, had a kind purpose of good to them, designed their salvation by it; and if they had closed with the counsel of God, it had been for themselves, they had been made for ever; but they rejected it, would not comply with it; and it was against themselves, it was to their own ruin; they came short of the benefit intended them, and not only so, but forfeited the grace of God, put a bar in their own door, and by refusing that discipline which was to fit them for the kingdom of the Messiah, shut themselves out of it; and they not only excluded themselves, but hindered others, and stood in their way.

2. He here shews the strange perverseness of the men of that generation, in their cavils both against John and Christ, and the prejudices they conceived against them.

1st. They made but a jesting matter of the methods God took to do them good; ver. 31, "Whereunto shall I liken the men of this generation?" 'What have been connected with the synagogue there, as they refer to it (verse 5).

vii. 11. Nain was a village in Galilee, situated at no great distance from Mount Tabor, according to Eusebius, and near Endor. A place of the same name is mentioned by Jewish writers, as in the tribe of Issachar, but this is not named elsewhere in the Bible. It is now called Nein. Robinson says, "The crusaders recognised it, and it has been since mentioned by most travellers to the present day. It has now dwindled to a small hamlet, occupied at most by a few families." The site is "on the northern slope of the rugged and barren ridge of Little Hermon."

vii. 12. Coffins were not used by the Jews. The deceased was covered with a dress of some kind, except the face, which was exposed. The body was laid upon a bier, very soon after death, and carried to the place of interment with lamentations. Burials took place outside the towns.

can I think of, absurd enough to represent them by?" They are, then, "like children sitting in the marketplace," that mind nothing that is serious, but are as full of play as they can hold; as if God were but in jest with them in all the methods he takes to do them good, as children are with one another in the marketplace, ver. 32; they turn it all off with a banter; and are no more affected with it than a piece of pagentry. This is the ruin of multitudes; they can never persuade themselves to be serious in the concerns of their souls; old men sitting in the Sanhedrim were but as "children sitting in the marketplace;" and no more affected with the things that belonged to their everlasting peace than people are with children's play. O the amazing stupidity and vanity of the blind and ungodly world! The Lord awakes them out of their security!

2nd. They still found something or other to carp at. First, John Baptist was a reserved, austere man; lived much in solitude; and ought to have been admired for being such a humble, sober, self-denying man; and hearkened to, as a man of thought and contemplation; but this, which was his praise, was turned to his reproach; because he "came neither eating nor drinking," so freely, and plentifully, and cheerfully as others did, "ye say, he has a devil;" he is a melancholy man; he is possessed, as the demoniac whose dwelling was among the tombs, though he be not all out so wild. Secondly, Our Lord Jesus was of a more free and open conversation; he "came eating and drinking," ver. 34; he would go and dine with Pharisees, though he knew they did not care for him; and with publicans, though he knew they were no credit to him; yet in hopes of doing good both to the one and the other, he conversed familiarly with them. By this it appears that the ministers of Christ may be of very different tempers and dispositions, very different ways of preaching and living, and yet all good and useful; diversity of gifts, but each given to profit withal; therefore none must make themselves a standard to all others, nor judge hardly of those that do not do just as they do. John Baptist bore witness to Christ, and Christ applauded John Baptist, though they were the reverse of each other in their way of living; but the common enemies of them both reproached them both. The very same men that had represented John as crazed in his intellect, because "he came neither eating nor drinking," represented our Lord Jesus as corrupt in his morals, because he came eating and drinking; he is "a gluttonous man and a winebibber." Ill-will never speaks well; see the malice of wicked people, and how they put the worst construction upon every thing they meet with in the Gospel, and in the preachers and professors of it; and hereby they think to diminish them, but really destroy themselves.

Lastly, He shews that, notwithstanding this, God will be glorified in the salvation of a chosen remnant; ver. 35, "wisdom is justified of all her children." There are those who are given to wisdom as her children; and they shall be brought by the grace of God to submit to wisdom's conduct and government, and thereby to justify wisdom in the ways she takes of bringing them to that submission, for to them they are effectual, and thereby appear well chosen. Wisdom's children are herein unanimous, one and all; they have all a complacency in the methods of grace which Divine Wisdom takes, and think never the worse of them for their being ridiculed by some.

36 And one of the Pharisees desired him that he would eat with him. And he went into the Pharisee's house, and sat down to meat. 37 And, behold, a woman in the city, which was a sinner, when she knew that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, brought an alabaster box of ointment, 38 And stood at his feet behind him weeping, and began to wash his feet with tears, and did wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment. 39 Now when the Pharisee which had bidden him saw it, he spake within himself, saying, This man, if he were a prophet, would have known who and what manner of woman this is that toucheth him: for she is a sinner. 40 And Jesus answering said unto him, Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee. And he saith, Master, say on. 41 There was a certain creditor which had two debtors: the one owed five hundred pence, and the other fifty. 42 And when they had nothing to pay, he frankly forgave them both. Tell me therefore, which of them will love him most? 43 Simon answered and said, I suppose that he, to whom he forgave most. And he said unto him, Thou hast rightly judged. 44 And he turned to the woman, and said unto Simon, Seest thou this woman? I entered into thine house, thou gavest me no water for my feet: but she hath washed my feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. 45 Thou gavest me no kiss: but this woman since the time I came in hath not ceased to kiss my feet. 46 My head with oil thou didst not anoint: but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment. 47 Wherefore I say unto thee, Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much: but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little. 48 And he said unto her, Thy sins are forgiven. 49 And they that sat at meat with him began to say within themselves, Who is this that forgiveth sins also? 50 And he said to the woman, Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace.

When and where this passage of story happened doth not appear; this evangelist doth not observe order of time in his narratives so much as the other evangelists do; but it comes in here upon occasion of Christ's being reproached as a "friend to publicans and sinners," to shew that it was only for their good, and to bring them to repentance, that he conversed with them; and that those he admitted near him were reformed, or in a hopeful way to be so. Who this woman was, that here testified so great an affection for Christ, doth not appear; it is commonly said to be Mary Magdalene, but I find no ground in Scripture for it; she is described, ch. viii. 2. and Mar. xvi. 9. to be one "out of whom Christ had cast seven devils;" but that is not mentioned here; and therefore it is probable it was not she. Now observe here,

I. The civil entertainment which a Pharisee gave to Christ, and his gracious acceptance of that entertainment, ver. 36; "one of the Pharisees desired him that he would eat with him;" either because he thought it would be a reputation to him to have such a guest at his table, or because his company would be an entertainment to him and his family and friends. It appears that this Pharisee did not believe in Christ, for he will not own him to be a prophet, ver. 36; and yet our Lord Jesus accepted his invitation, "went into his house, and sat down to meat" that they might see he took the same liberty with Pharisees that he did with publicans, in hopes of doing them good. And those may venture farther into the society of such as are prejudiced against Christ and his religion, who have wisdom and grace sufficient to instruct and argue with them, than others may.

II. The great respects which a poor penitent sinner shewed him, when he was at meat in the Pharisee's house. It was "a woman in the city, that was a sinner," a Gentile, I doubt a harlot, known to be so, and infamous; "she knew that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house," and having been converted from her wicked course of life by his preaching, she came to acknowledge her obligations to him, having no opportunity of doing it any other way, by washing his feet, and anointing them with some sweet ointment that she brought with her for that purpose. The way of sitting at table then was such as that their feet were partly behind them: now this woman did not look Christ in the face, but came behind him, and did the part of the maidservant, whose office it was to wash the feet of the guests, 1 Sam. xxv. 41. and to prepare the ointments, 1 Sam. viii. 13. Now in what this good woman did, we may observe,

First, Her deep humiliation for sin; she stood behind him weeping; her eyes had been the inlets and outlets of sin, and now she makes them fountains of tears; her face is now blubbered, that perhaps used to be painted; her hair now made a towel of, which before had been plaited and adorned. We have reason to think she had before sorrowed for sin; but now she had an opportunity of coming into the presence of Christ, the wound bled afresh, and her sorrow renewed. Note, It well becomes penitents, upon all their approaches to Christ, to renew their godly sorrow and shame for sin, when he is pacified, Eze. xvi. 63.

Secondly, Her strong affection to the Lord Jesus: this was it that our Lord Jesus took special notice of, that she loved much, ver. 42, 47. She washed his feet, in token of her ready submission to the meanest office in which she might do him honour; nay, she washed them with her tears, tears of joy; she was in a transport to find herself so near her Saviour, whom her soul loved; she kissed his feet, as one unworthy of the kisses of his mouth, which the spouse coveted, Cant. i. 2.; it was a kiss of adoration, as well as affection; she wiped them with her hair, as one entirely devoted to his honour; her eyes shall yield water to wash them, and her hair be a towel to wipe them; and she anointed his feet with the ointment, owning him hereby to be the Messiah, the anointed; she anointed his feet, in token of her consent to God's design in anointing his head with the oil of gladness. Note, All true penitents have a dear love to the Lord Jesus.

III. The offence which the Pharisee took at Christ, for admitting the respects which this poor penitent paid him, ver. 39; "he spake within himself," little thinking that Christ knew what he thought, "This man, if he were a prophet," would then have so much knowledge as to perceive that this woman is a sinner, is a Gentile, is a woman of ill fame; and so much sanctity as therefore not to suffer her to come so near him, for can one of such a character approach a prophet, and his heart not rise at it? See how apt proud and narrow souls are to think that others should be as haughty and censorious as themselves. Simon, if she had touched him, would have said, "Stand by thyself, come not near me; I am holier than thou!" Isa. lvi. 5.; and he thought Christ should say so too.

IV. Christ's justification of the woman, in what she did to him, and of himself, in admitting it. Christ knew what the Pharisee spake within himself, and made answer to it: "Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee," ver. 41. Though he was kindly entertained at his table, yet even there he reproved him for what he saw amiss in him, and would not suffer sin upon him. Those whom Christ hath something against, he hath something to say to, for his Spirit shall reprove. Simon is willing to give him the hearing; "he saith, Master, say on." Though he could not believe him to be a prophet, because he was not so nice and precise as he was, yet he can compliment him with the title of Master, among those that cry, "Lord, Lord," but do not the things which he saith. Now Christ in his answer to the Pharisee reasons thus: it is true this woman has been a sinner, he knows it; but she is a pardoned sinner, which supposeth her to be a penitent sinner; that what she did to him was an expression of her great love to her Saviour, by whom her sins were forgiven; that if she was pardoned, who had been so great a sinner, it might reasonably be expected that she should love her Saviour more than others, and should give greater proofs of it than others; and if this was the fruit of her love, and flowing from a sense of the pardon of her sins, it became him to accept of it, and it ill became the Pharisee to be offended at it. Now Christ has a further reach in this; the Pharisee doubted whether he was a prophet or no; nay, he did in effect deny it; but Christ shews that he was more than a prophet, for he is one that has power on earth to forgive sins, and to whom are owing the affections

vii. 18, 19. The reference to John the Baptist shows that the occurrence recorded in the preceding verses took place at an early period in our Lord's ministry. Verse 19 shows that the time corresponds with the message detailed in Matt. xi. 2, &c. For "Jesus," in verse 19, the Vatican MS. reads "the Lord."

vii. 18. The word "for" should probably be omitted, as it is in the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS. The Sinaitic has, "Verily, I say." In what follows, both Sinaitic and Vatican read, "there is none greater than John, but he that is least," &c. The word "prophet" is omitted by several old authorities.

vii. 37. A very questionable tradition identifies this woman with Mary Magdalene, and many writers have sought to show that she could not be the person intended. It is conjectured by some that the woman was a Gentile, which may or may not be true; but, as Dr. Hammond says, "That this woman, whosoever she was, was not Mary Magdalene is probable, first, by the no-argument on that side, and thankful acknowledgments of penitent, pardoned sinners. Now in his answer,

First. He doth, by a parable, force Simon to acknowledge that the greater sinner this woman had been, the greater love she ought to shew to Jesus Christ when her sins were pardoned, ver. 41-43. A man had two debtors that were both insolvent; but one of them owed him ten times more than the other; he very freely forgave them both, and did not take the advantage of the law against them, did not order them and their children to be sold, or "deliver them to the tormentors." Now they were both sensible of the great kindness they had received, but "which of them will love him most?" Certainly, saith the Pharisee, "he to whom he forgave most;" and herein he rightly judged. Now we being obliged to forgive, as we are and hope to be forgiven, we may from hence learn the duty between debtor and creditor. 1. The debtor, if he have any thing to pay, ought to make satisfaction to his creditor. No man can reckon that his own, or have any comfortable enjoyment of it, but that which is so when all his debts are paid. 2. If God in his providence hath disabled the debtor to pay his debt, the creditor ought not to be severe with him, nor to go to the utmost rigour of the law with him, but freely to forgive him: summum jus est summa injuria,—"the law stretched into rigour becomes unjust." Let the unmerciful creditor read that parable, Mat. xviii. 23, &c., and tremble; for they shall have judgment without mercy that shew no mercy. 3. The debtor that has found his creditors merciful ought to be very grateful to them; and, if he cannot otherwise recompense them, ought to love them. Some insolvent debtors, instead of being grateful, are spiteful to their creditors that lose by them, and cannot give them a good word, only because they complain, whereas losers may have leave to speak. But this parable speaks of God as the creditor, or rather the Lord Jesus himself, for he it is that forgives, and is beloved by the debtor; and sinners are the debtors. And so we may learn here,

1st. That sin is a debt, and sinners are debtors to God Almighty. As creatures, we owe a debt of obedience to the precept of the law; and for non-payment of that, as sinners, we become liable to the penalty. We have not paid our rent; nay, we have wasted our Lord's goods, and so we become debtors. God has an action against us for the injury we have done him, and the omission of our duty to him.

2nd. That some are deeper in debt to God, by reason of sin, than others are; "one owed five hundred pence, and the other fifty." The Pharisee was the less debtor; yet he was a debtor too, which was more than he thought himself, but rather that God was his debtor, Luz. xviii. 10, 11; this woman, that had been a scandalous, notorious sinner, was the greater debtor. Some sins are in themselves greater debts than others; and some sinners, by reason of divers aggravating circumstances, greater debtors; as those that have sinned most openly and scandalously, that have sinned against greater light and knowledge, more convictions and warnings, and more mercies and means.

3rd. That whether our debt be more or less, it is more than we are able to pay; "they had nothing to pay," nothing at all to make a composition with; for the debt is great, and we have nothing at all to pay it with; silver and gold will not pay our debt, nor will sacrifice and offering; no, not "thousands of rams." No righteousness of our own will pay it; no, not our repentance and obedience for the future, for it is what we are already bound to, and it is God that works it in us.

4th. That the God of heaven is ready to forgive, frankly to forgive, poor sinners upon Gospel terms, though their debt be never so great. If we repent and believe in Christ, our iniquity shall not be our ruin, it shall not be laid to our charge. God has proclaimed his name gracious and merciful, and ready to forgive sin; and his Son having purchased pardon for penitent believers, his Gospel promiseth it to them, and his Spirit seals it, and gives them the comfort of it.

5th. That those who have their sins pardoned are obliged to love him that pardoned them; and the more is forgiven them, the more they should love him. The greater sinners any have been before their conversion the greater saints they should be after; the more they should study to do for God, and the more their hearts should be enlarged in obedience. When a persecuting Saul became a preaching Paul, he laboured more abundantly.

Secondly. He applies this parable to the different temper and carriage of the Pharisee and the sinner towards Christ. Though the Pharisee would not allow Christ to be a prophet, Christ seems ready to allow him to be in a justified state; and that he was one forgiven, though to him less was forgiven. He did indeed shew some love to Christ in inviting him to his house, but nothing to what this poor woman shewed. "Look thee, saith Christ to him, 'she is one that has much forgiven her; and therefore, according to thine own judgment, it might be expected she should love much more than thou dost; and so it appears, ver. 41: "Seest thou this woman?" Thou lookest upon her with contempt; but consider what a kinder friend she is to me than thou art; should I then accept thy kindness, and refuse hers? 1. Thou didst not so much as order a basin of water to be brought to wash my feet in, when I came in weary and dirtied with my walk, which would have been some refreshment to me; but she has done much more, "she hath washed my feet with tears," tears of affection to me, tears of affliction for sin, and has "wiped them with the hairs of her head," in token of her great love to me. 2. Thou didst not so much as kiss my cheek, which was a usual expression of a hearty and affectionate welcome to a friend, but "this woman hath not ceased to kiss my feet," ver. 45, thereby expressing both a humble and an affectionate love. 3. Thou didst not provide me a little common oil, as usual, to anoint my head with; but she has bestowed a box of precious ointment upon my feet, ver. 46; so far hath she outdone thee." The reason why some people blame the pains and expense of zealous Christians in religion is, because they are not willing themselves to come up to it, but resolve to rest in a cheap and easy religion.

Thirdly. He silenced the Pharisee's cavil: ver. 47, "I say unto thee, Simon, her sins, which are many, are forgiven." He owns she had been guilty of many sins, but they are forgiven her, and therefore it is no way unbecoming in me to accept her kindness. "They are forgiven, for she loved much." It should be rendered, therefore she loved much; for it is plain, by the tenor of Christ's discourse, that her loving much was not the cause, but the effect, of her pardon, and of her comfortable sense of it; for "we love God because he first loved us;" he did not forgive us because we first loved him. But "to whom little is forgiven," as is to thee, "the same loveth little," as thou dost. Hereby he intimates to the Pharisee that his love to Christ was so little, that he had reason to question whether he loved him at all in sincerity; and consequently, whether indeed his sins, though comparatively little, were forgiven him. Instead of grudging great sinners the mercy they find with Christ upon their repentance, we should be stirred up by their example to examine ourselves, whether we be indeed forgiven, and do love Christ.

Fourthly. He silenced her fears, who probably was discouraged by the Pharisee's offence, and yet would not so far yield to the discouragement as to fly off. 1. Christ said unto her, "Thy sins are forgiven," ver. 48. Note, The more we express our sorrow for sin, and our love to Christ, the clearer evidence we have of the forgiveness of our sins; for it is by the experience of a work of grace wrought in us, that we obtain the assurance of an act of grace wrought for us. How well was she paid for her pains and cost when she was dismissed with this word from Christ, "Thy sins are forgiven," and what an effectual prevention would this be of her return to sin again. 2. Though there were those present who quarrelled with Christ in their own minds for presuming to forgive sin and pronounce sinners absolved, ver. 40, as those had done, Mat. ix. 3, yet he stood to what he had said; for as he had there proved that he had power to forgive sin, by curing the man sick of the palsy, and therefore would not here take notice of the cavil, so he would now shew that he had pleasure in forgiving sin, and it was his delight; he loves to speak pardon and peace to penitents, ver. 50: "He said to the woman, Thy faith hath saved thee." This would confirm and double her comfort in the forgiveness of her sin, that she was justified by her faith. All these expressions of sorrow for sin, and love to Christ, were the effects and products of faith; and therefore, as faith of all graces doth most honour God, so Christ doth of all graces put most honour upon faith. Note, They who know their faith hath saved them may go in peace, may go on their way rejoicing.

CHAPTER VIII.

Most of this chapter is a repetition of divers passages of Christ's preaching and miracles, which we had before in Matthew and Mark, and they are all of such weight that they are worth repeating, and therefore they are repeated, that out of the mouth, not only of two, but of three witnesses, every word may be established. Here is, I. A general account of Christ's preaching, and how he had subsistence for himself and his numerous family by the charitable contributions of good people, ver. 1-3. II. The parable of the sower and the four sorts of ground, with the exposition of it, and some inferences from it, ver. 4-18. III. The preference which Christ gave to his obedient disciples before his nearest relations according to the flesh, ver. 19-21. IV. His stilling a storm at sea with a word's speaking, ver. 22-25. V. His casting a legion of devils out of a man that was possessed of them, ver. 26-40. VI. His healing the woman that had the bloody issue, and raising Jairus' daughter to life, ver. 41-56.

AND it came to pass afterward, that he went throughout every city and village, preaching and shewing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God: and the twelve were with him, 2 And certain women, which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities, Mary called Magdalene, out of whom went seven devils, 3 And Joanna the wife of Chuza Herod's steward, and Susanna, and many others, which ministered unto him of their substance.

We are here told,

First. What Christ made the constant business of his life, and that was preaching; in that work he was indefatigable, and went about doing good, ver. 1 "afterward," ἐν τῷ κατεῖναι, ordine,—"in the proper time or method." Christ took his work before him, and went about it regularly; he observed a series, or order of business, so as that the end of one good work was the beginning of another. Now observe here,

1. Where he preached. He "went about," διὰ δόξου, peragrabat. He was an itinerant preacher, did not confine himself to one place, but diffused the beams of his light. Circuibat,—"he went his circuit" as a judge, having found his preaching perhaps most acceptable where it was new. He went about "through every city," that none might plead ignorance. Hereby he set an example to his disciples; they must traverse the nations of the earth, as he did the cities of Israel. Nor did he confine himself to the cities, but went into the villages among the plain country people to preach, to the inhabitants of the villages, Jud. v. 11.

2. What he preached. He shewed "the glad tidings of the kingdom of God," that it was now set up among them. Tidings of the kingdom of God are glad tidings, and those Jesus Christ came to bring; to tell the children of men that God was willing to take all those under his protection that were willing to return to their allegiance; it was glad tidings to the world, that there were hopes of its being reformed and reconciled.

3. Who were his attendants. "The twelve were with him;" not to preach, if he were present, but to learn of him what and how to preach hereafter; and if occasion were, to be sent to places where he could not go. Happy were these his servants that heard his wisdom.

Secondly. Whence he had the necessary supports of life. He lived upon the kindness of his friends. There were "certain women" who frequently attended his ministry, that "ministered to him of their substance," ver. 23. Some of them are named, but there were "many others," who were zealously affected to the doctrine of Christ, and thought themselves bound in justice to encourage it, having themselves found benefit, and in charity hoping that many others might find benefit by it too.

1. They were such for the most part as had been Christ's patients, and were the monuments of his power and mercy; they "had been healed" by him "of evil spirits and infirmities." Some of them had been troubled in mind, and melancholy, others of them afflicted in body, and he had been to them a powerful healer. He is the physician both of body and soul, and those who have been healed by him ought to study what they shall render to him. We are bound in interest to attend him, that we may be ready to apply ourselves to him for help in case of a relapse; and we are bound in gratitude to serve him and his Gospel, who hath served us and saved us by it.

2. One of them was "Mary, Magdalene, out of whom had been cast seven devils;" a certain number for an uncertain. Some think she was one that had been very wicked; and then we may suppose her to be the woman that was a sinner, mentioned just before, ch. vii.; and Dr. Lightfoot, finding in some of the Talmudists' writings that Mary Magdalene signified Mary the plaiter of hair, thinks it applicable to her, she having been noted, in the days of her iniquity and infamy, for that plaiting of hair which is opposed to modest apparel, 1 Tim. ii. 9;

but only the mention of the name of Mary in John xii. 3, which presently shall appear to be Martha's and Lazarus's sister, and that another story; secondly, by the words in the chapter here following (chap. viii. 2), where, when it is said that Mary Magdalene was with Christ, she is described by another character, taken from that remarkable mercy wrought on her by Christ, that she had seven devils cast out of her, the very mark which is again given her, Mark xvi. 9, &c. What is here called an alabaster-box by our translators is the same as that in Matt. xxvi. 7. In both cases we understand it to have been a bottle-shaped vessel, with a narrow neck, and that its form more nearly corresponds with what we call a flask or cruse. The vessel was wont to be closed with a stopper, and the contents were either poured out or removed by means of a spatula or little stick. The oils and perfumes were not always liquid, though such was probably the state of that mentioned in the text. It was the custom of several ancient nations to apply perfumed but though she had been an immodest woman, upon her repentance and reformation, she found mercy, and became a zealous disciple of Christ. Note, The greatest of sinners must not despair of pardon; and the worse any have been before their conversion, the more they should study to do for Christ after. Or rather, she was one that had been very melancholy; and then probably it was Mary the sister of Lazarus, who was a woman of a sorrowful spirit; might be originally of Magdala, but removed to Bethany. This Mary Magdalene was attending on Christ's cross and his sepulchre, and if she were not Mary the sister of Lazarus, either that particular friend and favourite of Christ's did not attend then, or the evangelists did not take notice of her, neither of which we can suppose; thus Dr. Lightfoot argues; yet there is this to be objected against it, that Mary Magdalene is reckoned among the women that followed Jesus from Galilee, Mat. xxvii. 55, 56; whereas Mary the sister of Lazarus had her residence in Bethany.

3. Another of them was Joanna the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward; she had been his wife, so some, but was now a widow, and left in good circumstances; if she was now his wife, we have reason to think that her husband, though preferred in Herod's court, had received the Gospel, and was very willing that his wife should be both a hearer of Christ and a contributor to him.

4. There were many of them that "ministered to Christ of their substance." It was an instance of the meanness of that condition to which our Saviour humbled himself that he needed it, and his great humility and condescension that he accepted it. "Though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor," and lived upon alms. Let none say they scorn to be beholden to the charity of their neighbours, when Providence has brought them into straits; but let them ask it, and be thankful for it as a favour. Christ would rather be beholden to his known friends for a maintenance for himself and his disciples, than be burdensome to strangers in the cities and villages whither he came to preach. Note, It is the duty of those who are taught in the Word, to communicate to them who teach them, in all good things; and those who are herein liberal and cheerful, honour the Lord with their substance, and bring a blessing upon it.

4 And when much people were gathered together, and were come to him out of every city, he spake by a parable: 5 A sower went out to sow his seed: and as he sowed, some fell by the way side; and it was trodden down, and the fowls of the air devoured it. 6 And some fell upon a rock; and as soon as it was sprung up, it withered away, because it lacked moisture. 7 And some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprang up with it, and choked it. 8 And other fell on good ground, and sprang up, and bare fruit an hundredfold. And when he had said these things, he cried, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. 9 And his disciples asked him, saying, What might this parable be? 10 And he said, Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God: but to others in parables; that seeing they might not see, and hearing they might not understand. 11 Now the parable is this: The seed is the word of God. 12 Those by the way side are they that hear; then cometh the devil, and taketh away the word out of their hearts, lest they should believe and be saved. 13 They on the rock are they, which, when they hear, receive the word with joy; and these have no root, which for a while believe, and in time of temptation fall away. 14 And that which fell among thorns are they, which, when they have heard, go forth, and are choked with cares and riches and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection. 15 But that on the good ground are they, which in an honest and good heart, having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience. 16 No man, when he hath lighted a candle, covereth it with a vessel, or putteth it under a bed; but setteth it on a candlestick, that they which enter in may see the light. 17 For nothing is secret, that shall not be made manifest; neither any thing hid, that shall not be known and come abroad. 18 Take heed therefore how ye hear: for whosoever hath, to him shall be given; and whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he seemeth to have. 19 Then came to him his mother and his brethren, and could not come at him for the press. 20 And it was told him by certain which said, Thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to see thee. 21 And he answered and said unto them, My mother and my brethren are these which hear the word of God, and do it.

The former paragraph began with an account of Christ's industry in preaching, ver. 1; this begins with an account of the people's industry in hearing, ver. 4. He went into every city to preach; so they, one would think, should have contented themselves to hear him when he came to their own city; we know those that would: but there were those here that came to him out of every city, would not stay till he came to them, nor think they had had enough when he left them, but met him when he was coming towards them, and followed him when he was going from them. Nor did he excuse himself with this from going to the cities, that there were some from the cities that came to him; for though there were, yet the most had not zeal enough to bring them to him; and therefore, such is his wonderful condescension, that he will go to them; for "he is found of those that sought him not," Isa. lvi. 1. Here was, it seems, a vast concourse; "much people were gathered together;" abundance of fish to cast the net among; and he was as ready and willing to teach as they were to be taught. Now in these verses we have,

First. Necessary and excellent rules and cautions for hearing the Word, in the parable of the sower, and the reddition and application of it, all which we had twice before more largely. When Christ had put forth this parable, 1st. The disciples were inquisitive concerning the meaning of it, ver. 9; they asked him, "What might this parable be?" Note, We should covet earnestly to know the true intent and full extent of the Word we hear, that we may neither be mistaken in our own knowledge, nor defective in it. 2nd. Christ made them sensible of what great advantage it was to them, that they had opportunity of acquainting themselves with the mystery and meaning of his word, which others had not; ver. 10, "Unto you it is given." Note, Those who would receive instruction from Christ must know and consider what a privilege it is to be instructed by him, what a distinguishing privilege to be led into the light, such a light, when others are left in darkness, such a darkness. Happy are we, and for ever indebted to free grace, if the same thing that is a parable to others, with which they are only amused, is a plain truth to us, by which we are enlightened and governed, and into the mould of which we are delivered. Now from the parable itself, and the explication of it, observe,

1. The heart of man is as soil to the seed of God's Word; it is capable of receiving it, and bringing forth the fruits of it; but, unless that seed be sown in it, it will bring forth nothing valuable; our care therefore must be to bring the seed and the soil together. To what purpose have we the seed in the Scripture, if it be not sown? and to what purpose have we the soil in our own hearts, if it be not sown with that seed?

2. The success of the seedness is very much according to the nature and temper of the soil, and as that is or is not disposed to receive the seed. The Word of God is to us as we are; a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death.

3. The devil is a subtle and spiteful enemy, that makes it his business to hinder our profiting by the Word of God. He takes the Word out of the hearts of careless hearers, ver. 12, "lest they should believe and be saved." That is added here to teach us, 1st. That we cannot be saved unless we believe: the word of the Gospel will not be a saving word to us, unless it be mixed with faith. 2nd. That therefore the devil doth all he can to keep us from believing, to make us not heed the Word when we read and hear it; or if we heed it for the present, to make us forget it again, and let it slip, (Heb. ii. 1;) or, if we remember it, to create prejudices in our minds against it, or divert our minds from it to something else; and all is, "lest we should believe and be saved," lest we should believe and rejoice, while he believes and trembles.

4. Where the Word of God is heard carelessly, there is commonly a contempt put upon it too. It is added here in the parable, that the seed which fell by the way side was trodden down, ver. 5. They that wilfully shut their ears against the Word, do in effect trample it under their feet; they "despise the commandment of the Lord."

5. Those on whom the Word makes some impressions, but they are not deep and durable ones, will shew their hypocrisy in a time of trial, as the seed sown upon the rock, where it gains no root, ver. 13; these for a while believe, a little while; their profession promiseth something, but "in time of temptation they fall away," from their good beginnings; whether the temptation arise from the smiles or from the frowns of the world, they are easily overcome by it.

6. That the "pleasures of this life" are as dangerous and mischievous thorns to choke the good seed of the Word as any other. That is added here, ver. 14, which was not in the other evangelists. Those that are not entangled in the cares of this life, nor inveigled with the deceitfulness of riches, but boast that they are dead to them, yet may be kept from heaven by an affected indolence and the love of ease and pleasure. The delights of sense may ruin the soul, even lawful delights indulged, and too much delighted in.

7. That it is not enough that the fruit be brought forth, but it must be brought to perfection, it must be fully ripened; if it be not, it is as if there were no fruit at all brought forth; for that which in Matthew and Mark is said to be "unfruitful," is the same that here is said to bring forth none to perfection: for factum non dicitur quod non perseverat, — "perseverance is necessary to the perfection of a good work."

8. The good ground which brings forth good fruit, is "an honest and good heart," well disposed to receive instruction and commandment, ver. 19; a heart free from sinful pollutions, and firmly fixed for God and duty; an upright heart, a tender heart, and a heart that trembles at the Word, is an honest and good heart; that having heard the Word, understands it, so it is in Matthew; receives it, so it is in Mark; and keeps it, so it is here, as the soil not only receives but keeps the seed; and the stomach not only receives but keeps the food or physic.

9. Where the Word is well kept, there is fruit brought forth with patience; that also is added here. There must be both bearing patience, and waiting patience; patience to suffer the tribulation and persecution which may arise because of the Word; patience to continue to the end in well-doing.

10. In consideration of all this we ought to take heed how we hear, ver. 18; take heed of those things that will hinder our profiting by the Word we hear oils, &c., to their persons, on a variety of occasions, festivities among the rest.

vii. 44. The washing of the feet of guests is a custom as old as the days of Abraham, and is still known in the East. Mr. Jowett says of his reception at a house in Lebanon, "Before supper the master of the house directed his servant to bring in a large brass pan, full of warm water, in which, for the first and indeed the only time that I ever experienced such attention, he illustrated the ancient custom of washing the feet of strangers, and no compliment could have been more seasonable." Dr. Robinson speaks of a case in which he experienced the same hospitable attentions; and several other travellers have left similar records.

vii. 45. In modern times it is usual for the Orientals to salute each other with a kiss, as Mr. Carne says the Arabs do.

viii. 3. This is the first place in which mention is made of Joanna, whose husband, Chuza, was or had been the steward of Herod. It watch over our hearts in hearing, and take heed lest they betray us; take heed lest we hear carelessly and slightly, lest we entertain prejudices against the Word we hear upon any account; and take heed to the frame of our spirits after we have heard the Word, lest we lose what we have gained.

Secondly, Needful instructions given to those that are appointed to preach the Word, and to those also that have heard it.

1. Those that have received the gift must minister the same. Ministers that have the dispensing of the Gospel committed to them, people that have profited by the Word, and are thereby qualified to profit others, must look upon themselves as lighted candles; ministers must, in solemn, authoritative preaching, and people in brotherly, familiar discourse, diffuse their light; for a candle must not be covered with a vessel, or put under a bed, ver. 16. Ministers and Christians are to be lights in the world, "holding forth the Word of life;" their light must shine before men; they must not only be good, but do good.

2. We must expect that what is now done in secret, and from unseen springs, will shortly be manifested and made known, ver. 17. What is committed to you in secret should be made manifest by you; for your Master did not give you talents to be buried, but to be traded with. Let that which is now hid be made known, for if it be not manifested by you, it will be manifested against you, will be produced in evidence of your treachery.

3. The gifts we have will either be continued to us or taken from us, according as we do or do not make use of them, for the glory of God and the edification of our brethren, ver. 18; "whosoever hath, to him shall be given;" he that hath gifts, and doth good with them, shall have more; he that buries his talent shall lose it. From him that has shall not be taken away even "that which he hath," so it is in Mark; that which he "seemeth to have," so it is in Luke. Note. The grace that is lost was but seeming grace, was never true. Men do but seem to have what they do not use, and shows of religion will be lost and forfeited; "they went out from us because they were not of us," 1 Jno. ii. 19. Let us see to it that we have grace in sincerity, the root of the matter found in us; and that is a good part which shall never be taken away from those that have it.

Thirdly, Great encouragement given to those that prove themselves faithful hearers of the Word by being doers of the work, in a particular instance of Christ's respect to his disciples, in preferring them even before his nearest relations, ver. 19—21, which passage of story we had twice before. Observe,

1. What crowding there was after Christ; there was no coming near for the throng of people that attended him; who, though they were crowded never so much, would not be crowded out from his congregation. 2. That some of his nearest kindred were least solicitous to hear him preach. Instead of getting within, as they might easily have done if they had come in time, desiring to hear him, they stood without desiring to see him; and probably, out of a foolish fear, lest he should spend himself with too much speaking, designing nothing but to interrupt him, and oblige him to break off. 3. That Jesus Christ would rather be busy at his work than conversing with his friends. He would not leave his preaching to speak with his mother and his brethren, for it was his meat and drink to be so employed. 4. That Christ is pleased to own those as his nearest and dearest relations "that hear the Word of God, and do it;" they are to him more than his mother and brethren.

22 Now it came to pass on a certain day, that he went into a ship with his disciples: and he said unto them, Let us go over unto the other side of the lake. And they launched forth. 23 But as they sailed he fell asleep: and there came down a storm of wind on the lake; and they were filled with water, and were in jeopardy. 24 And they came to him, and awoke him, saying, Master, master, we perish. Then he arose, and rebuked the wind and the raging of the water: and they ceased, and there was a calm. 25 And he said unto them, Where is your faith? And they being afraid wondered, saying one to another, What manner of man is this! for he commandeth even the winds and water, and they obey him. 26 And they arrived at the country of the Gadarenes, which is over against Galilee. 27 And when he went forth to land, there met him out of the city a certain man, which had devils long time, and ware no clothes, neither abode in any house, but in the tombs. 28 When he saw Jesus, he cried out, and fell down before him, and with a loud voice said, What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God most high? I beseech thee, torment me not. 29 (For he had commanded the unclean spirit to come out of the man. For oftentimes it had caught him: and he was kept bound with chains and in fetters; and he brake the bands, and was driven of the devil into the wilderness.) 30 And Jesus asked him, saying, What is thy name? And he said, Legion: because many devils were entered into him. 31 And they besought him that he would not command them to go out into the deep. 32 And there was there an herd of many swine feeding on the mountain: and they besought him that he would suffer them to enter into them. And he suffered them. 33 Then went the devils out of the man, and entered into the swine: and the herd ran violently down a steep place into the lake, and were choked. 34 When they that fed them saw what was done, they fled, and went and told it in the city and in the country. 35 Then they went out to see what was done; and came to Jesus, and found the man, out of whom the devils were departed, sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed, and in his right mind: and they were afraid. 36 They also which saw it told them by what means he that was possessed of the devils was healed. 37 Then the whole multitude of the country of the Gadarenes round about besought him to depart from them; for they were taken with great fear: and he went up into the ship, and returned back again. 38 Now the man out of whom the devils were departed besought him that he might be with him: but Jesus sent him away, saying, 39 Return to thine own house, and shew how great things God hath done unto thee. And he went his way, and published throughout the whole city how great things Jesus had done unto him.

We have here two illustrious proofs of the power of our Lord Jesus, which we had before; his power over the winds, and his power over the devils.

First. His power over the winds, those powers of the air that are so much a terror to men, especially upon sea, and occasion the death of such multitudes. Observe.

1. Christ ordered his disciples to put to sea, that he might shew his glory upon the water in stilling the waves, and might do an act of kindness to a poor possessed man on the other side of the water, ver. 22; "he went into a ship with his disciples." They that observe Christ's orders may assure themselves of his presence. If Christ sends his disciples, he goes with them; and those may safely and boldly venture any whither that have Christ accompanying them. "He said, Let us go over unto the other side," for he had a piece of good work to do there. He might have gone by land, a little way about, but he chose to go by water, that he might shew his wonders in the deep.

2. Those that put to sea in a calm, yea, and at Christ's word, yet must prepare for a storm, and for the utmost peril in that storm; ver. 23, "there came down a storm of wind on the lake," as if it were there, and no where else; and presently their ship was so tossed that it was filled with water, and they were in jeopardy of their lives. Perhaps the devil, who is "the prince of the power of the air," and who raiseth winds by the permission of God, had some suspicion, perhaps from some words that Christ might let fall, that he was coming over the lake now on purpose to cast that legion of devils out of the poor man on the other side; and therefore poured this storm upon the ship he was in, designing, if possible, to have sunk him, and prevented that victory.

3. Christ was asleep in the storm, ver. 23. Some bodily refreshment he must have, and chose to take it then, when it would be least a hindrance to him in his work. The disciples of Christ may really have his gracious presence with them at sea, and in a storm, and yet he may seem as if he were asleep; may not presently appear for their relief, no, not when things seem to be brought even to the last extremity. Thus he will try their faith and patience, and quicken them by prayer to awake, and make their deliverance the more welcome when it comes at last.

4. A complaint to Christ of our danger, and the distress his church is in, is enough to engage him to awake, and appear for us, ver. 24. They cried, "Master, master, we perish." The way to have our fears silenced is to bring them to Christ, and lay them before him. Those that in sincerity call Christ Master, and with faith and fervency call upon him as their Master, may be sure he will not let them perish. No relief for poor souls that are under sense of guilt and fear of wrath like this, to go to Christ and call him Master, and say, "I am undone if thou do not help me."

5. Christ's business is to lay storms, as it is Satan's business to raise them. He can do it, he has done it, he delights to do it, for he came to proclaim peace on earth; ver. 24, "he rebuked the wind and the raging of the waters," and immediately "they ceased;" not, as at other times, by degrees; but all of a sudden "there was a great calm." Thus Christ shewed, that though the devil pretends to be the prince of the power of the air, yet even there he has him in a chain.

6. When our dangers are over, it becomes us to take to ourselves the shame of our own fears, and to give to Christ the glory of his power. When Christ had turned the storm into a calm, "then were they glad, because they were quiet," Ps. cvii. 30. And then, 1. Christ gives them a rebuke for their inordinate fear, ver. 25, "Where is your faith?" Note, Many that have true faith, have it to seek when they have occasion to use it; they tremble, and are discouraged if second causes frown upon them; a little thing disheartens them, and where is their faith then? 2. They gave him the glory of his power; "they being afraid wondered." Those that had feared the storm, now the danger is thought that she was a widow by some, but by others that her husband may have been the nobleman mentioned in John iv. 46, whose son was healed by the Saviour. Joanna may have been an old acquaintance of Mary Magdalene, with whom she is again named in chap. xxiv. 10, after the resurrection. For "ministered unto him" we prefer another and better reading, "ministered unto them." From this circumstance it may be inferred that the little band of women who so early combined to show their confidence and affection were not in reduced circumstances. They contributed to the support of Jesus and the twelve. The Greek word for "ministered," however, often conveys the idea of service, and especially of waiting upon guests at table.

viii. 14. The phrase "bring no fruit to perfection" signifies "do not mature their fruit, but let it fall or wither while yet unripe."

viii. 16. In the corresponding passage of Mark, the word "bushel" is used where "vessel" is introduced here. There is no reason to

was over, with good reason feared him that had stilled it; and "said one to another, What manner of man is this?" They might as well have said, "Who is a God like unto thee?" For it is God's prerogative to "still the noise of the sea, the noise of the waves," Ps. lxxvii.

Secondly, His power over the devil, "the prince of the power of the air." In the next passage of story he comes into a closer grapple with him than he did when he commanded the winds. Presently after the winds were stilled, they were brought to their desired haven, and "arrived at the country of the Gadarenes," and there went ashore, ver. 26, 27; and he soon met with that which was his business over, and thought it worth his while to go through a storm to it. We may learn a great deal out of this story concerning the world of infernal, malignant spirits, which, though not working now, ordinarily, in the same way as here, yet we are all concerned at all times to stand upon our guard against.

1. These malignant spirits are very numerous. They that had taken possession of this one man called themselves Legion, ver. 20, "because many devils were entered into him;" he had "had devils a long time," ver. 27. But perhaps those that had been long in possession of him, upon some foresight of our Saviour's coming to make an attack upon them, and finding they could not prevent it by the storm they had raised, sent for recruits, intending this to be a decisive battle, and hoping now to be too hard for him that had cast out so many unclean spirits, and to give him a defeat; and either were, or at least would be thought to be, a legion of them, formidable as an army with banners; and now at least, to be what the twentieth legion of the Roman army, which was long quartered at Chester, was styled, legio victrix,—"a victorious legion."

2. They have an inveterate enmity to man, and all his conveniences and comforts. This man in whom the devils had got possession, and kept it long, being under his influence, "wore no clothes, neither abode in any house," ver. 27, though clothing and a habitation are two of the necessary supports of this life; nay, and because man has a natural dread of the habitations of the dead, he forced this man to abide in the tombs, to make him so much the more a terror to himself and to all about him; so that his soul had as much cause as ever any man's had to be weary of his life, and to choose strangling and death rather.

3. They are very strong, and fierce, and unruly, and hate and scorn to be restrained; ver. 29, "he was kept bound with chains and in fetters," that he might not be mischievous either to others or to himself; but he "broke the bands." Note, Those that are ungovernable by any other, thereby shew that they are under Satan's government; and this is the language of those that are so, even concerning God and Christ, their best friends, that would not either bind them from, or bind them to, any thing but for their own good. "Let us break their bands in sunder." "He was driven of the devils." Those that are under Christ's government are sweetly led with the cords of a man and the bands of love; those that are under the devil's government are furiously driven.

4. They are much enraged against our Lord Jesus, and have a great dread and horror of him. "When the man" whom they had possession of, and who spake as they would have him, "saw Jesus," he roared out as one in an agony, and "fell down before him" to deprecate his wrath, and owned him to be "the Son of God most high," that was infinitely above him, and quite too hard for him; but protested against having any league or confederacy with him, (which might sufficiently have silenced the blasphemous cavils of the scribes and Pharisees), "What have I to do with thee?" The devils have neither inclination to do service to Christ, nor expectation to receive benefit by him: "What have we to do with thee?" But they dreaded his power and wrath: "I beseech thee, torment me not." They do not say, "I beseech thee, save me," but only, "torment me not." See whose language they speak that have only a dread of hell as a place of torment, but no desire of heaven as a place of holiness and love.

5. They are perfectly at the command and under the power of our Lord Jesus, and they knew it, for they "besought him that he would not command them to go (εἰς τὸν ἄβυσσον), into the deep," the place of their torment, which they acknowledge he could easily and justly do. O what a comfort is this to the Lord's people, that all the powers of darkness are under the check and control of the Lord Jesus! He has them all in a chain. He can send them to their own place when he pleaseth.

6. They delight in doing mischief. When they found there was no remedy, but they must quit the hold of this poor man, they begged they might have leave to take possession of a herd of swine, ver. 32. When the devil at first brought man into a miserable state, he brought a curse likewise upon the whole creation, and that became subject to enmity; and here, as an instance of that extensive enmity of his, when he could not destroy the man, he would destroy the swine. If he could not hurt them in their bodies, he would hurt them in their goods, which sometimes proves a great temptation to men to draw them from Christ, as here. Christ "suffered them to enter into the swine," to convince the country what mischief the devil could do in it, if he should suffer him. No sooner had the devils leave, but they entered into the swine; and no sooner had they entered into them, but the herd ran violently "down a steep place into the lake, and were drowned." For it is a miracle of mercy, if those whom Satan possesseth are not brought to destruction and perdition. This and other instances shew that that roaring lion and red dragon seeks what and whom he may devour.

7. When the devil's power is broke in any soul, that soul recovers itself, and returns into a right frame; which supposeth that those whom Satan gets possession of, are put out of the possession of themselves. "The man out of whom the devils were departed sat at the feet of Jesus," ver. 35; while he was under the devil's power, he was ready to fly in the face of Jesus; but now he sits at his feet, which is a sign that he is come to his right mind. If God have possession of us, he preserves to us the government and enjoyment of ourselves; but if Satan have possession of us, he robs us of both; let his power therefore in ourselves be overturned, and let Him come whose right our hearts are, and give them him; for we are never more our own than when we are his.

Let us now see what was the effect of this miracle of casting the legion of devils out of this man.

1. What effect it had upon the people of that country, who had lost their swine by it; "the swineherds went and told it both in city and country," ver. 34; perhaps with a design to incense people against Christ; they told "by what means he that was possessed of the devils was healed," ver. 36; that it was by sending the devils into the swine, which was capable of an invidious representation, as if Christ could not otherwise have delivered the man out of their hands, but by delivering the swine into them. "The people came out to see what was done," and to inquire into it, "and they were afraid," ver. 35; "they were taken with great fear," ver. 37; they were surprised and amazed at it, and knew not what to say to it. They thought more of the destruction of the swine than of the deliverance of their poor afflicted neighbour, and of the country from the terror of his frenzy, for it was become a public nuisance; and therefore "the whole multitude besought Christ to depart from them," for fear he should bring some other judgment upon them; whereas indeed none need to be afraid of Christ that are willing to forsake their sins, and give up themselves to him. But Christ took them at their word; he "went up into the ship, and returned back again." Those lose their Saviour, and their hopes in him, that love their swine better.

2. What effect it had upon the poor man who had recovered himself by it; he desired Christ's company as much as others dreaded it; he besought Christ that "he might be with him," as others were, "that had been healed by him of evil spirits and infirmities," ver. 2; that Christ might be to him a protector and teacher, and that he might be to Christ for a name and a praise. He was loath to stay among those rude and brutish Gadarenes, that desired Christ to depart from them: "O gather not my soul with these sinners!" But Christ would not take him along with him, but sent him home, to publish among those that knew him the great things God had done for him, and so might be a blessing to his country, as he had been a burthen to it. We must sometimes deny ourselves the satisfaction even of spiritual benefits and comforts, to gain an opportunity of being serviceable to the souls of others. Perhaps Christ knew that when the resentment of the loss of their swine was a little over, they would be better disposed to consider the miracle, and therefore left the man among them, to be a standing monument and monitor to them of it.

40 And it came to pass, that, when Jesus was returned, the people gladly received him: for they were all waiting for him. 41 And, behold, there came a man named Jairus, and he was a ruler of the synagogue: and he fell down at Jesus' feet, and besought him that he would come into his house: 42 For he had one only daughter, about twelve years of age, and she lay a dying. But as he went the people thronged him. 43 And a woman having an issue of blood twelve years, which had spent all her living upon physicians, neither could be healed of any, 44 Came behind him, and touched the border of his garment: and immediately her issue of blood stanch'd. 45 And Jesus said, Who touched me? When all denied, Peter and they that were with him said, Master, the multitude throng thee and press thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me? 46 And Jesus said, Somebody hath touched me: for I perceive that virtue is gone out of me. 47 And when the woman saw that she was not hid, she came trembling, and falling down before him, she declared unto him before all the people for what cause she had touched him, and how she was healed immediately. 48 And he said unto her, Daughter, be of good comfort: thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace. 49 While he yet spake, there cometh one from the ruler of the synagogue's house, saying to him, Thy daughter is dead; trouble not the Master. 50 But when Jesus heard it, he answered him, saying, Fear not: believe only, and she shall be made whole. 51 And when he came into the house, he suffered no man to go in, save Peter, and James, and John, and the father and the mother of the maiden. 52 And all wept, and bewailed her: but he said, Weep not; she is not dead, but sleepeth. 53 And they laughed him to scorn, knowing that she was dead. 54 And he put them all out, and took her by the hand, and called, saying, Maid, arise. 55 And her spirit came again, and she arose straightway: and he commanded to give her meat. 56 And her parents were astonished: but he charged them that they should tell no man what was done.

Christ was driven away by the Gadarenes: they were weary of him, and willing to be rid of him; but when he had crossed the water, and returned to the Galileans, they "gladly received him," wished and waited for his return, and welcomed him with all their hearts when he did return, ver. 40. If some suppose that candles, in the modern sense, were in use in Palestine. The Greek word merely means a light, more commonly a lamp or lantern. The household lamp was placed upon a stand, here called a candlestick, which appears to have been varied in form, and often rendered ornamental as well as useful. Sometimes the lamp was suspended from the ceiling like a modern chandelier, and consisted of one or several lights. One of the common portable lamps might easily have been placed under a bed, or rather couch, which was frequently supported at some height above the ground, like a modern bedstead or sofa.

viii. 22. It is noticeable that Luke uses the word "lake" three times in this chapter and twice elsewhere, where the other evangelists regularly use the word "sea." They wrote in accordance with Hebrew ideas, which gave the name of "sea" to any capacious reservoir of water, whether natural or artificial; hence they called even the great laver of the temple "a sea."

will not accept the favours Christ offers them, others will: if the Gadarenes be not gathered, yet there are many among whom Christ shall be glorious. When Christ had done his work on the other side of the water, he returned and found work to do in the place whence he came, fresh work. They that will lay out themselves to do good shall never want occasion for it; the wanting you have always with you.

We have here two miracles interwoven, as they were in Matthew and Mark: the raising of Jairus' daughter to life, and the cure of the woman that had an issue of blood, as he was going in a crowd to Jairus' house. We have here,

First. A public address made to Christ by "a ruler of the synagogue," whose name was Jairus, on the behalf of a little daughter of his that was very ill, and in the apprehension of all about her, lay a dying. This address was very humble and reverent: Jairus, though a ruler, "fell down at Jesus' feet," as owning him to be a ruler above him. It was very importunate; he "besought him that he would come into his house;" not having the faith, at least not having the thought of the centurion, that desired Christ only to speak the healing word at a distance. But Christ complied with his request—he went along with him; strong faith shall be applauded, and yet weak faith shall not be rejected. In the houses where sickness and death is, it is very desirable to have the presence of Christ. When Christ was going, "the people thronged him;" some out of curiosity to see him, others out of an affection to him. Let us not complain of a crowd, and a throng, and a hurry, as long as we are in the way of our duty and doing good; but otherwise, it is what every wise man will keep himself out of as much as he can.

Secondly. Here is a secret application made to Christ by a woman ill of a bloody issue, which had been the consumption of her body, and the consumption of her purse too, for "she had spent all her living upon physicians," and was never the better, ver. 43. The nature of her disease was such, that she did not care for making a public complaint of it; it was agreeable to the modesty of her sex to be very shy of speaking of it; and therefore she took this opportunity of coming to Christ in a crowd; and the more people were present, the more likely she thought it was that she should be concealed. Her faith was very strong, for she doubted not but, by the touch of the hem of his garment, she should derive from him healing virtue sufficient for her relief: looking upon him, to be such a full fountain of mercies that she could steal a cure, and he not miss it. Thus there is many a poor soul healed, and helped, and saved by Christ, that is lost in a crowd, and that nobody takes notice of. The woman found an immediate change for the better in herself, and that her disease was cured, ver. 44. As believers have comfortable communion with Christ, so they have comfortable communications from him, incognito,—secretly; meat to eat that the world knows not of, and joy that a stranger doth not intermeddle with.

Thirdly. Here is a discovery of this secret cure, to the glory both of the physician and the patient.

1. Christ takes notice that there is a cure wrought: "virtue is gone out of me," ver. 46. Those that have been healed by virtue derived from Christ must own it, for he knows it. He speaks of it here not in a way of complaint, as if he were hereby either weakened or wronged, but in a way of complacency; it was his delight that virtue was gone out of him to do any good, and he did not grudge it to the meanest; they were as welcome to it as to the light and heat of the sun; nor had he the less virtue in him for the going out of virtue from him, for he is an overflowing fountain.

2. The poor patient owns her case, and the benefit she had received, ver. 47: "when she saw that she was not hid, she came and fell down before him." Note, The consideration of this, that we cannot be hid from Christ, should engage us to pour out our hearts before him, and to shew before him all our sin, and all our trouble. "She came trembling," and yet her faith saved her, ver. 48. Note, There may be trembling where yet there is saving faith. She "declared before all the people for what cause she had touched him," because she believed that a touch would cure her, and it did so. Christ's patients should communicate their experiences one to another.

3. The great Physician confirms her cure, and sends her away with the comfort of it, ver. 48: "Be of good comfort; thy faith hath made thee whole." Jacob got the blessing from Isaac clandestinely, and by a wife; but when the fraud was discovered, Isaac ratified it designedly; and was obtained surreptitiously and underhand, but it was secured and seconded above board; so was the cure here. "He is blessed, and he shall be blessed;" so here, she is healed, and she shall be healed.

Fourthly. Here is an encouragement to Jairus not to distrust the power of Christ, though his daughter was now dead, and they that brought him the tidings advised him not to give the Master any farther trouble about her. "Fear not," saith Christ; "believe only." Note, Our faith in Christ should be bold and daring, as well as our zeal for him. And they that are willing to do any thing for him, may depend upon his doing great things for them, above what they are able to ask or think. When the patient is dead there is no room for prayer, or the use of means; but here, though the child is dead, yet believe, and all shall be well. Post mortem medicus,—a physician after death, is an absurdity; but not, Post mortem Christus,—Christ after death.

Fifthly. The preparatives for the raising of her to life again. 1. The choice Christ made of witnesses that should see the miracle wrought. A crowd followed him; but perhaps they were rude and noisy. However, it was not fit to let such a multitude come into a gentleman's house, especially now they were all in sorrow, and therefore he sent them back; and not because he was afraid to let the miracle pass their scrutiny, for he raised Lazarus and the widow's son publicly. He took none with him but Peter and James, and John, that triumvirate of his disciples that he was most intimate with, designing them three, with the parents, to be the only spectators of the miracle; they being a competent number to attest the truth of it. 2. The check he gave to the mourners; "they all wept and bewailed her." For it seems she was a very agreeable, hopeful child, and dear not only to the parents, but to all the neighbours. But Christ bade them weep not, for "she is not dead, but sleepeth." He means, as to her peculiar case, that she was not dead for good and all, but that she should now shortly be raised to life, so that it would be to her friends but as if she had been but a few hours asleep. But it is applicable to all that die in the Lord; therefore we should not sorrow for them as those that have no hope; because death is but a sleep to them; not only as it is a rest from all the toils of the days of time, but as there will be a resurrection—a waking and rising again to all the glories of the days of eternity. This was a comfortable word which Christ said to these mourners, yet they wickedly ridiculed it, and "laughed him to scorn" for it; here was a pearl cast before swine. They were ignorant of the Scriptures of the Old Testament who bantered it as an absurd thing to call death a sleep; yet this good came out of that evil, that hereby the truth of the miracle was evinced, for they knew "that she was dead;" they were certain of it, and therefore nothing less than a Divine power could restore her to life. We find not any answer that he made them; but he soon explained himself, I hope to their conviction, and that they would never again laugh at any word of his. But "he put them all out," ver. 54. They were unworthy to be the witnesses of this work of wonder; they who in the midst of their mourning were so merrily disposed as to laugh at him for what he said would, it may be, have found something to laugh at in what he did, and therefore are justly shut out.

Sixthly. Her return to life, after a short visit to the congregation of the dead, ver. 55. "He took her by the hand," as we do by one that we would awake out of sleep, and help up, "and he called, saying, Maid, arise." Thus the hand of Christ's grace goes along with the calls of his Word, to make them effectual. Here it is expressed what was only implied in the other evangelists,—that "her spirit came again;" her soul returned again to animate her body. This plainly proves that the soul exists and acts in a state of separation from the body, and therefore is immortal; that death doth not extinguish this candle of the Lord, but take it out of a dark lantern. It is not, as Grotius well observes, the κράσις, or 'temperament' of the body, or any thing that dies with it; but it is ὑψιότατον τι,—something that subsists by itself, which after death is somewhere else than where the body is. Where the soul of this child was in this interval we are not told: it was in the hand of the Father of spirits, to whom all souls at death return. When her spirit came again, she arose, and made it appear she was alive by her motion, as she did also by her appetite, for Christ "commanded to give her meat." As babes newborn, so those that are newly raised desire spiritual food, that they may grow thereby. In the last verse we need not wonder to find "her parents astonished;" but if that implies that they only were so, and not the other bystanders, who had laughed Christ to scorn, we may well wonder at their stupidity, which perhaps was the reason why Christ would not have it proclaimed, as well as to give an instance of his humility.

CHAPTER IX.

In this chapter we have, I. The commission Christ gave his twelve apostles to go out for some time to preach the Gospel, and confirm it by miracles, ver. 1—6. II. Herod's terror at the growing greatness of our Lord Jesus, ver. 7—9. III. The apostles' return to Christ; his retirement with them into a place of solitude; the great resort of people to them notwithstanding, and his feeding five thousand men with five loaves and two fishes, ver. 10—17. IV. His discourse with his disciples concerning himself, and his own sufferings for them, and theirs for him, ver. 18—27. V. Christ's transfiguration, ver. 28—36. VI. The cure of a lunatic child, ver. 37—42. VII. The repeated notice Christ gave his disciples of his approaching sufferings, ver. 43—45. VIII. His check to the ambition of his disciples, ver. 46—48; and to their monopolizing of their power over devils to themselves, ver. 49, 50. IX. The rebuke he gave them for an overdue resentment of an affront given him by a village of the Samaritans, ver. 51—56. X. The answers he gave to several that were inclined to follow him, but not considerably, or not zealously and heartily so inclined, ver. 57—62.

WHEN he called his twelve disciples together, and gave them power and authority over all devils, and to cure diseases. 2 And he sent them to preach the kingdom of God, and to heal the sick. 3 And he said unto them, Take nothing for your journey, neither staves, nor scrip, neither bread, neither money; neither have two coats apiece. 4 And whatsoever house ye enter into, there abide, and thence depart. 5 And whosoever will not receive you, when ye go out of that city, shake off the very dust from your feet for a testimony against them. 6 And they departed, and went through the towns, preaching the gospel, and healing every where. 7 Now Herod the tetrarch heard of all that was done by him: and he was perplexed, because that it was said of some, that John was risen from the dead; 8 And of some, that Elias had appeared; and of others, that one of the old prophets was risen again. 9 And Herod said, John have I beheaded: but who is this, of whom I hear such things? And he desired to see him.

Here is, I. The method Christ took to spread his Gospel—to diffuse and enforce the light of it. He had travelled about himself, preaching and healing; but he could be only in one place at a time; and therefore now he sent his twelve disciples abroad, who by this time were pretty well instructed in the nature of the present dispensation, and able to instruct others, and to deliver to them what they had received from the Lord. Let them disperse themselves, some one way, and some another, "to preach the kingdom of God," as it was now about to be set up by the Messiah; to bring people acquainted with the spiritual nature and tendency of it, and to persuade them to come into the interests and measures of it. And for the confirming of their doctrine, because it was new and surprising, and very different from what they had been taught by the scribes and Pharisees, and because so much depended upon men's receiving or not receiving it, he empowered them to confirm it by miracles, ver. 1, 2. He "gave them authority over all devils," to dispossess them, and cast them out, though never so numerous, so subtle, so fierce, so obstinate, viii. 31. The demons besought Jesus not to "command them to go out into the deep," which some say means here "the pit of hell." That the word "abyss," which is here used, usually means as much in the New Testament, will be admitted, and some of our critical interpreters maintain that as its sense in this place. The only ancient version which certainly conveys such an idea is the Ethiopic in Walton's Polyglott. Tartarus was regarded as the proper home of evil spirits, though sometimes they were found on earth. Erasmus

viii. 37. Both here and in verse 26 there are various readings, and modern critics prefer "Gerasenes" for "Gadarenes" in each case. The people were afraid of Jesus, but it does not appear that they made any formal complaint against him for causing or permitting the destruction of the swine. It is worthy of note that only on two occasions was the Lord's power shown in the destruction of anything.

Christ designed a total rout and ruin to the kingdom of darkness, and therefore gave them power over all devils. He authorized and appointed them likewise "to cure diseases and to heal the sick," which would make them welcome wherever they came; and not only convince people's judgments, but gain their affections. This was their commission. Now observe,

First. What Christ directed them to do, in prosecution of this commission, at this time, when they were not to go far, or be out long.

1. They must not be solicitous to recommend themselves to people's esteem by their outward appearance. Now they begin to set up for themselves, they must have no dress, nor study to make any other figure than what they had made while they followed him; they must go as they were, and not change their clothes, or so much as put on a pair of new shoes.

2. They must depend upon Providence, and the kindness of their friends, to furnish them with what was convenient for them. They must not take with them either bread or money, and yet believe they should not want. Christ would not have his disciples shy of receiving the kindnesses of their friends, but rather to expect them. Yet St. Paul saw cause not to go by this rule, when he laboured with his hands rather than be burthensome.

3. They must not change their lodgings, as suspecting that those that entertained them were weary of them; they have no reason to be so, for the ark is a guest that always pays well for its entertainment; ver. 4, "Whatsoever house ye enter into, there abide," that people may know where to find you; that your friends may know you are not backward to serve them, and your enemies may know you are not ashamed or afraid to face them; there abide, till you depart out of that city: stay with those you are used to.

4. They must put on authority, and speak warning to those who refused them, as well as comfort to those that received them, ver. 5. If there be any place that will not entertain you; if the magistrates deny you admission, and threaten to treat you as vagrants, leave them; do not force yourselves upon them, nor run yourselves into danger among them; but at the same time bind them over to the judgment of God for it: "shake off the dust of your feet, for a testimony against them;" that will, as it were, be produced in evidence against them, that the messengers of the Gospel had been among them to make a fair offer of grace and peace, for this dust they left behind there; so that when they perish at last in their infidelity, this will lay and leave their blood upon their own heads. "Shake off the dust of your feet;" as much as to say you abandon their city, and will have no more to do with them.

Secondly. What they did in prosecution of this commission; ver. 6, "they departed," though from their Master's presence, yet having still his spiritual presence with them, — his eye and his arm going along with them; and thus borne up in their work, they went through the towns, some or other of them, all the towns within the circuit appointed them, preaching the Gospel, and healing every where: their work was the same with their Master's, doing good, both to souls and bodies.

11. Here is Herod's perplexity and vexation at this. The deriving of Christ's power to those who were sent forth in his name, and acted by authority from him, was an amazing and convincing proof of his being the Messiah, above any thing else; that he could not only work miracles himself, but empower others to work miracles too; this spread his fame more than any thing, and made the rays of this Sun of Righteousness the stronger by the reflection of them, even from the earth, from such mean, illiterate men as the apostles were, who had nothing else to recommend them, or to raise any expectations from them, but "that they had been with Jesus," Acts iv. 13. When the country sees such as these healing the sick in the name of Jesus, it gives it an alarm. Now observe,

First. The various speculations it raised among the people; who, though they thought not rightly, yet could not but think honourably, of our Lord Jesus, and that he was an extraordinary person — one come from the other world; that either John Baptist, who was lately persecuted and slain for the cause of God, or one of the old prophets, that had been persecuted and slain long since in that cause, was risen again, to be recompensed for his sufferings by this honour put upon him; or that Elias, who was taken alive to heaven in a fiery chariot, had appeared as an express from heaven, ver. 7, 8.

Secondly. The great perplexity it created in the mind of Herod: when he had "heard of all that was done by Christ," his guilty conscience flew in his face, and he was ready to conclude with them that said "John was risen from the dead." He thought he had got clear of John, and should be never more troubled with him; but it seems he is mistaken; either John is come to life again, or here is another in his spirit and power, for God will never leave himself without witness. "What shall I do now?" saith Herod, "John have I beheaded, but who is this?" Is he carrying on John's work, or is he come to avenge John's death? John baptized, but he doth not: "John did no miracle," but he doth; and therefore appears more formidable than John. Note, Those who oppose God will find themselves more and more embarrassed. However, "he desired to see him," whether he resembled John or no; but he might soon have been put out of this pain, if he would but have informed himself of that which thousands knew, that Jesus preached and wrought miracles a great while before John was beheaded, and therefore could not be John raised from the dead. "He desired to see him;" and why did he not go and see him? It is likely because he thought it below him either to go to him, or to send for him; he had enough of John Baptist, and cared not for having to do with any more such reprovers of sin. He desired to see him, but we do not find that ever he did, till he saw him at his bar, and then he "and his men of war set him at nought," Lu. xxiii. 11. Had he prosecuted his convictions now, and gone to see him, who knows but a happy change might have been wrought in him? but delaying it now, his heart was hardened; and when he did see him he was as much prejudiced against him as any other.

10 And the apostles, when they were returned, told him all that they had done. And he took them, and went aside privately into a desert place belonging to the city called Bethsaida. 11 And the people, when they knew it, followed him: and he received them, and spake unto them of the kingdom of God, and healed them that had need of healing. 12 And when the day began to wear away, then came the twelve, and said unto him, Send the multitude away, that they may go into the towns and country round about, and lodge, and get victuals: for we are here in a desert place. 13 But he said unto them, Give ye them to eat. And they said, We have no more but five loaves and two fishes; except we should go and buy meat for all this people. 14 For they were about five thousand men. And he said to his disciples, Make them sit down by fifties in a company. 15 And they did so, and made them all sit down. 16 Then he took the five loaves and the two fishes, and looking up to heaven, he blessed them, and brake, and gave to the disciples to set before the multitude. 17 And they did eat, and were all filled: and there was taken up of fragments that remained to them twelve baskets.

Here is, I. The account which the twelve gave their Master of the success of their ministry. They were not long out, but "when they returned, they told him all that they had done," as became servants who were sent on an errand; they told him "what they had done," that if they had done any thing amiss they might mend it next time.

II. Their retirement for a little breathing. "He took them, and went aside privately into a desert place," that they might have some relaxation from business, and not be always upon the stretch. Note, He that hath appointed our man servant and maid servant to rest, would have his servants to rest too. Those in the most public stations, and that are most publicly useful, yet must sometimes go aside privately, both for the repose of their bodies, to recruit them, and for the furnishing of their minds, by meditation, for farther public work.

III. The resort of the people to him, and the kind reception he gave them. They followed him, though it were in a desert place; for that is no desert where Christ is; and though they hereby disturbed the repose he designed here for himself and his disciples, yet he welcomed them, ver. 11. Note, Pious zeal may excuse a little rudeness; it did with Christ, and should with us: though they came unseasonably, yet Christ gave them what they came for. 1. He "spoke unto them of the kingdom of God," the laws of that kingdom, with which they must be bound, and the privileges of that kingdom, with which they might be blessed. 2. He "healed them that had need of healing," and in a sense of their need made their application to him. Though the disease was never so inveterate, and incurable by the physicians, though the patient were never so poor and mean, yet Christ healed them. There is healing in Christ for all that need it, whether for soul or body. Christ hath still a power over bodily diseases, and heals his people that need healing. Sometimes he sees that we need the sickness for the good of our souls, more than the healing for the ease of our bodies; and then we must be willing for a season, because there is need, to be in heaviness; but when he sees we need healing, we shall have it. Death is his servant, to heal the saints of all diseases. He heals spiritual maladies by his grace, by his comforts, and has for each what their case calls for: relief for every exigence.

IV. The plentiful provision Christ made for the multitude that attended him: with five loaves of bread and two fishes he fed five thousand men. This story we had twice before, and shall meet with again; and it is the only miracle of our Saviour's that is recorded by all the four evangelists. Let us only observe, out of it,

First. That those who diligently attend upon Christ in the way of duty, and deny, or expose themselves, or are made to forget themselves and their outward conveniences, by their zeal for God's house, are taken under his particular care, and may depend upon Jehovah-jireh, "the Lord will provide." He will not see those that fear him, and serve him faithfully, want any good thing.

Secondly. That our Lord Jesus was of a free and generous spirit. His disciples said, "Send them away, that they may get victuals;" but Christ said, "No, 'give ye them to eat,'" let what we have go as far as it will reach, and they are welcome to it. Thus he has taught both ministers and Christians to "use hospitality without grudging," 1 Pet. iv. 9. Those that have but a little, let them do what good they can with that little, and that is the way to make it more. "There is that scatters, and yet increases."

Thirdly. Jesus Christ has not only physic, but food, for all those that by faith apply themselves to him; he not only heals them that need healing, cures the diseases of the soul, but feeds them too that need feeding, supports the spiritual life, relieves the necessities of it, and satisfies the desires of it. Christ has provided not only to save the soul from perishing by its diseases, but to nourish the soul unto life eternal, and strengthen it for all spiritual exercises.

Fourthly. All the gifts of Christ are to be received by the church in a regular orderly manner; "make them sit down by fifties in a company." The number of each company is taken notice of here, ver. 14, which Christ appointed for the better distribution of the meat, and the easier computation of the number of the guests.

Fifthly. When we are receiving our creature comforts, we must look up to Heaven; Christ did so, to teach us to do so. We must acknowledge that we receive them from God, and that we are unworthy to receive them; that we owe them all, and all the comfort we have in them, to the mediation of Christ, by whom the curse is removed, and the covenant of peace settled; that we depend upon God's blessing upon them, to make them serviceable to us, and desire that blessing.

Sixthly. The blessing of Christ will make a little to go a great way, and the "little that the righteous man has, better than the riches of many wicked; a dinner of herbs better than a stalled ox."

Seventhly. Those whom Christ feeds, he fills; to whom he gives, he gives enough; as there is in him enough for all, so there is enough for each. He replenishes every hungry soul, abundantly satisfies it with the goodness of his house. Here were fragments taken up, to assure us that in our Father's house there is bread enough, and to spare. We are not straitened or stinted in him.

18 And it came to pass, as he was alone praying, his disciples were with him: and he asked them, once upon the inanimate, when the fig-tree withered; and once upon the irrational and unclean, when the swine rushed into the sea. Hence the remark is just that the word of Jesus, that he came not to destroy but to save, applies to men, but not to animals.

viii. 48. The words "be of good comfort" are omitted by many ancient authorities, and Alford says were probably inserted from Matt. ix. 22. There is a story, which is recorded by Eusebius, that this woman was a native of Paneas, and that she erected a monument to commemorate her cure. It represented a woman on her bended knee, and stretching out her hands on the one side; and on the other a man standing, and holding out his hand towards the woman. The images were of brass; and Eusebius says that he himself saw the statue of Christ, as it was called. Sozomen says the statue of Jesus was thrown down and broken by Julian and the pagans, and that his own statue was set up instead of it. From this story the Papists infer the use of images in the early Church, but it contains saying, Whom say the people that I am? 19 They answering said, John the Baptist; but some say, Elias; and others say, that one of the old prophets is risen again. 20 He said unto them, But whom say ye that I am? Peter answering said, The Christ of God. 21 And he straitly charged them, and commanded them to tell no man that thing; 22 Saying, The Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be slain, and be raised the third day. 23 And he said to them all, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me. 24 For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it. 25 For what is a man advantaged, if he gain the whole world, and lose himself, or be cast away? 26 For whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels. 27 But I tell you of a truth, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the kingdom of God.

In these verses we have Christ discoursing with his disciples about the great things that pertained to the kingdom of God; and one circumstance of this discourse is taken notice of here, which we had not in the other evangelists, that Christ was alone praying, and his disciples with him when he entered into this discourse, ver. 18. Observe, 1st. Though Christ had much public work to do, yet he found some time to be alone in private, for converse both with himself, and with his Father, and with his disciples. 2nd. When Christ was alone he was praying. It is good for us to improve our solitudes for devotion, that when we are alone we may not be alone, but may have the Father with us. 3rd. When Christ was alone praying, his disciples were with him, to join with him in his prayer; so that this was a family prayer. Housekeepers ought to pray with their households, parents with their children, masters with their servants, teachers and tutors with their scholars and pupils. 4th. Christ prayed with them before he examined them, that they might be directed and encouraged to answer him, by his prayers for them. Those we give instructions to, we should put up prayers for and with. He discoursed with them, 1. Concerning himself; and inquires,

First. What the people said of him: "Whom say the people that I am?" Christ knew better than they did, but would have his disciples made sensible, by the mistakes of others concerning him, how happy they were that were led into the knowledge of him, and of the truth concerning him. We should take notice of others' ignorances and errors, that we may be the more thankful to Him who has manifested himself to us, and not unto the world, and may pity them, and do what we can to help them, and to teach them better. They tell him what conjectures concerning him they had heard in their converse with the common people: and ministers would know how the better to suit their instructions, reproofs, and counsels to the case of ordinary people, if they did but converse more frequently and familiarly with them; they would then be the better able to say what is proper to rectify their notions, and correct their irregularities, and remove their prejudices. The more conversant the physician is with his patient, the better he knows what to do for him. Some said he was John Baptist, who was beheaded but the other day; others Elias, or one of the old prophets; any thing but what he was.

Secondly. What they said of him. "Now see what an advantage you have by your discipleship, you know better things." "So we do," saith Peter, "thanks be to our Master for it; we know that thou art 'the Christ of God,' the anointed of God, the Messiah promised." It is matter of unspeakable comfort to us that our Lord Jesus is God's anointed, for thus he has an unquestionable authority and ability for his undertaking; for his being anointed signifies his being both appointed to it, and qualified for it. Now one would have expected that Christ should have charged his disciples, who were so fully apprised and assured of this truth, to publish it to every one they met with; no, he straitly charged them to tell no man that thing, as yet, because there is a time for all things: after his resurrection, which completed the proof of it, Peter made the temple ring of it, that "God has made this same Jesus both Lord and Christ," Acts ii. 36; but as yet the evidence was not ready to be summed up, and therefore it must be concealed; and while it was so, we may conclude that the believing of it was not necessary to salvation.

III. Concerning his own sufferings and death, of which he had yet said little; but, now his disciples were well established in the belief of his being the Christ, and able to bear it, he speaks to them expressly, and with great assurance, ver. 22. It comes in as a reason why they must not yet preach that he was the Christ, because the wonders that would attend his death and resurrection would be the most convincing proof of his being "the Christ of God." It was by his exaltation to the right hand of the Father, that he was fully declared to be the Christ, and by the sending of the Spirit thereupon, Acts ii. 33; and therefore wait till that is done.

First. We must accustom ourselves to all instances of self-denial and patience, ver. 23. This is the best preparative for martyrdom: we must live a life of self-denial, and mortification, and contempt of the world; we must not indulge our ease and appetite for then it will be hard to bear toil, and wear-ness, and want, for Christ. We are daily subject to affliction, and we must accommodate ourselves to it, and acquiesce in the will of God in it, and must learn to endure hardship. We frequently meet with crosses in the way of duty; though we must not pull them upon our own heads, yet when they are laid for us, we must take them up, carry them after Christ, and make the best of them.

Secondly. We must prefer the salvation and happiness of our souls before any secular concern whatsoever. Reckon upon it, 1. That he who, to preserve his liberty or estate, his power or preferment, nay, or to save his life, denies Christ and his truths, wilfully wrongs his conscience, and sins against God; will not only be not a sinner, but an unspeakable loser in the issue, when profit and loss come to be balanced: "He that will save his life," upon those terms, "will lose it," shall lose that which is of infinitely more value, his precious soul. 2. We must firmly believe also, that if we lose our lives for cleaving to Christ and our religion, we shall save them, to our unspeakable advantage; for it shall be abundantly recompensed in the resurrection of the just, when we shall have it again, a new and eternal life. 3. That the gain of all the world, if we should forsake Christ, and fall in with the interests of the world, would be so far from countervailing the eternal loss and ruin of the soul, that it would bear no manner of proportion to it, ver. 25. If we could be supposed to gain all the wealth, honour, and pleasure in the world, by denying Christ, yet when by so doing we lose ourselves to all eternity, and are cast away at last, what good will our worldly gain do us? Observe, in Matthew and Mark the dreadful issue is a man's "losing his own soul," here it is losing "himself," which plainly intimates that our souls are ourselves; animus cuiusque est corpusque,—"the soul is the man;" and it is well or ill with us, according as it is well or ill with our souls. If they perish for ever under the weight of their own guilt and corruption, it is certain we are undone; the body cannot be happy, if the soul be miserable, in the other world; but the soul may be happy though the body be greatly afflicted and oppressed, in this world. If a man be himself cast away, ἢ ἐμυώσεται,—"if he be damaged;" or if he be punished; ἢ μολέσεται,—"if he have a mulet" put upon his soul by the righteous sentence of Christ, whose cause and interest he has treacherously deserted; if it be adjudged a forfeiture of all his blessedness, and the forfeiture be taken, where is his gain? what is his hope?

Thirdly. We must therefore never be ashamed of Christ and his Gospel, nor of any disgrace or reproach that we may undergo for our faithful adherence to him and it. For, ver. 26, "whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed," and justly. When the service and honour of Christ called for his testimony and agency, he denied them, because the interest of Christ was a despised interest, and every where spoken against; and therefore he can expect no other but that in the great day, when his case calls for Christ's appearance on his behalf, Christ will be ashamed to own such a cowardly, worldly, sneaking spirit, and will say, "He is none of mine, he belongs not to me." As Christ had, so his cause has, a state of humiliation and of exaltation; they, and they only, that are willing to suffer with it when it suffers, shall reign with it when it reigns; but those that cannot find in their hearts to share with it in its disgrace, and to say, "If this be to be vile, I will be yet more vile," it is certain they shall have no share with it in its triumphs.

Observe here, how Christ, to support himself and his followers under present disgraces, speaks magnificently of the lustre of his second coming, in prospect of which he "endured the cross, despising the shame." 1. "He shall come in his own glory." This was not mentioned in Matthew and Mark. He shall come in the glory of the Mediator; all that glory which the Father restored to him, which he had with God before the worlds were; which he had deposited and put in pledge as it were, for the accomplishing of his undertaking, and demanded up again, when he had gone through it: "Now, O Father, glorify thou me," Jno. xvii. 4, 5. He shall come in all that glory which the Father conferred upon him when he set him at his own right hand, and gave him to be head over all things to the church; in all the glory that is due to him, as the assessor of the glory of God, and the author of the glory of all the saints. This is his own glory. 2. He shall come in his Father's glory; the Father will judge the world by him, having committed all judgment to him, and therefore will publicly own him in the judgment, as "the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person." 3. He shall come in the glory of the holy angels; they shall all attend him, and minister to him, and add every thing they can to the lustre of his appearance. What a figure will the blessed Jesus make in that day! Did we believe it, we would never be ashamed of him or his words now.

Lastly. To encourage them in suffering for him, he assures them that the kingdom of God would now shortly be set up, notwithstanding the great opposition that was made to it, ver. 27. Though the second coming of the Son of man is at a great distance, the kingdom of God shall come in its power in the present age, while some here present are alive. They saw the kingdom of God when the Spirit was poured out, when the Gospel was preached to all the world, and nations brought to Christ by it; they saw the kingdom of God triumph over the Gentile nations in their conversion, and over the Jewish nation in its destruction.

28 And it came to pass about an eight days after these sayings, he took Peter and John and James, and went up into a mountain to pray. 29 And as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glistering. 30 And, behold, there talked with him two men, which were Moses and Elias: 31 Who appeared in glory, and spake of his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem. 32 But Peter and they that were with him were heavy with sleep: and when they were awake, they saw his glory, and the two men that stood with him. 33 And it came to pass, as they departed from him, Peter said unto Jesus, Master, it is good for us to be here: and let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and nothing to indicate more than that the woman superstitiously erected the memorial. The fact that the narrative stands alone proves the absence of such images as the Romish Church now upholds. The woman figures in some of the Apocryphal books under the name of Veronica, as in the so-called Gospel of Nicodemus, where she declares the innocence of Jesus.

ix. 1. For "his twelve disciples" some copies read "the twelve," and the Sinaitic MS. and others have "the twelve apostles."

ix. 3. Matthew, Mark, and Luke all give the instructions to the apostles, but with sundry differences of detail. As Oosterzee says, "The spirit of the command is, however, the same in all. The Lord is speaking of what they must provide for their journey. If they already had a staff, they were at liberty to take it (Mark); if they had none they were not now to buy one."

ix. 5. The shaking off the dust was a symbolical action, as a witness against them, as it is said in Theophylact. Some sceptical one for Elias: not knowing what he said. 34 While he thus spake, there came a cloud, and overshadowed them: and they feared as they entered into the cloud. 35 And there came a voice out of the cloud, saying, This is my beloved Son: hear him. 36 And when the voice was past, Jesus was found alone. And they kept it close, and told no man in those days any of those things which they had seen.

We have here the story of Christ's transfiguration, which was designed for a specimen of that glory of his in which he will come to judge the world, of which he had lately been speaking, and consequently an encouragement to his disciples to suffer for him, and never to be ashamed of him. We had this story before in Matthew and Mark, and it is well worthy to be repeated to us, and reconsidered by us, for the confirmation of our faith in the Lord Jesus, as the brightness of his Father's glory, and the light of the world; for the filling of our minds with high and honourable thoughts of him, notwithstanding his being clothed with a body; and the giving of us some idea of the glory which he entered into at his ascension, and in which he now appears within the veil; and the raising and encouraging of our hopes and expectations concerning the glory reserved for all believers in the future state.

First. Here is one circumstance of the story that seems to differ from the other two evangelists that related it. They said it was six days after the foregoing sayings; Luke saith it was "about eight days after;" that is, it was that day or night, six whole days intervening, and it was the eighth day. Some think it was in the night that Christ was transfigured, because the disciples were sleepy, as in his agony, and in the night his appearance in splendour would be the more illustrious; and if in the night, the computation of the time would be the more doubtful and uncertain; probably in the night, between the seventh and eighth day, and so about eight days.

Secondly. Here are divers circumstances added and explained, which are very material.

1. We are here told, that Christ had this honour put upon him when he was praying: "He went up into the mountain to pray," as he frequently did, ver. 28; and as he prayed he was transfigured; when Christ humbled himself to pray, he was thus exalted. He knew before that this was designed for him at this time, and therefore seeks it by prayer. Christ himself must sue out the favours that were purposed for him and promised to him: "Ask of me, and I will give thee," Ps. ii. 8. And thus he intended to put an honour upon the duty of prayer, and to recommend it to us. It is a transfiguring, transforming duty; if our hearts be elevated and enlarged in it, so as in it to behold the glory of the Lord, we shall be "changed into the same image, from glory to glory," 2 Cor. iii. 18. By prayer we fetch in that wisdom, and grace, and joy, which make the face to shine.

2. Luke doth not use the word transfigured, μεταμορφώθη, which Matthew and Mark used, perhaps because it had been used so much in the pagan theology, but makes use of a phrase equivalent, τὸ εἶδος τοῦ προσώπου ἑτέρον, 'the fashion of his countenance was another thing from what it had been;' his face shone far beyond what Moses did when he came down from the mount; and "his raiment was white and glistening;" it was ἐξαστράπτειν, a word used only here; 'bright like lightning;' so that he seemed to be arrayed all with light, to "cover himself with light as with a garment."

3. It was said in Matthew and Mark, that Moses and Elias appeared to them; here it is said, they "appeared in glory;" to teach us that saints departed are in glory; are in a glorious state; they shine in glory; he being in glory, they "appeared with him in glory," as all the saints shall shortly do.

4. We are here told what was the subject of the discourse between Christ and the two great prophets of the Old Testament; "they spake of his decease, which he should accomplish at Jerusalem." ἔλεγον τὴν ἔξοδον αὐτοῦ, 'his exodus, his departure; that is, his death.' The death of Christ is here called his exit, his going out, his leaving the world. Moses and Elias spoke of it to him under that notion, to reconcile him to it, and to make the foresight of it the more easy to his human nature. The death of the saints is their exodus, their departure out of the Egypt of this world, their release out of a house of bondage. Some think the ascension of Christ is included here in his departure; for the departure of Israel out of Egypt was a departure in triumph; so was his, when he went from earth to heaven. 2nd. This departure of his he must accomplish, for thus it was determined, the matter was immutably fixed in the counsel of God, and could not be altered. 3rd. He must accomplish it at Jerusalem, though his residence was mostly in Galilee; for his most spiteful enemies were at Jerusalem, and there the Sanhedrim sat, that took upon them to judge of prophets. 4th. Moses and Elias spake of this, to intimate that the sufferings of Christ, and his entrance into his glory, was what Moses and the prophets had spoken of; see Ch. xxiv. 26, 27; 1 Pet. i. 11. 5th. Our Lord Jesus, even in his transfiguration, was willing to enter into a discourse concerning his death and sufferings; to teach us that meditations on death, as it is our departure out of this world to another, are never unseasonable, but in a special manner seasonable when at any time we are advanced, lest we should be lifted up above measure. In our greatest glories on earth, let us remember that here "we have no continuing city."

5. We are here told, which we were not before, that the disciples "were heavy with sleep," ver. 32. When the vision first began, Peter and James and John were drowsy, and inclined to sleep: either it was late, or they were weary, or had been disturbed in their rest the night before; or perhaps a charming, composing air, or some sweet, melodious sounds which disposed them to soft and gentle slumbers, were a preface to the vision; or perhaps it was owing to a sinful carelessness; when Christ was at prayer with them, they did not regard his prayer as they should have done; and to punish them for that, they were left to sleep on now, when he began to be transfigured, and so slipped an opportunity of seeing how that work of wonder was wrought. These three were now asleep, when Christ was in his glory, as afterwards they were, when he was in his agony; see the weakness and frailty of human nature, even in the best, and what need they have of the grace of God. Nothing could be more affecting to these disciples, one would think, than the glories and the agonies of their Master, and both in the highest degree, and yet neither the one nor the other would serve to keep them awake. What need have we to pray to God for quickening grace, to make us not only alive, but lively! Yet that they might be competent witnesses of this sign from heaven, to those that demanded one, after a while they recovered themselves, and became perfectly awake; and then they took an exact view of all those glories, so that they were able to give a particular account, as we find one of them doth, of all that passed when they "were with Christ in the holy mount," 2 Pet. i. 17.

6. It is here observed, that it was when Moses and Elias were now about to depart, that Peter said, "Lord, it is good to be here: let us make three tabernacles." Thus many times we are not sensible of the worth of our mercies till we are about to lose them; nor covet and court their continuance till they are upon the departure. Peter said this, "not knowing what he said." Those know not what they say, that talk of making tabernacles on earth for glorified saints in heaven, who have better mansions in the temple there, and long to return to them.

7. It is here added concerning the cloud that overshadowed them, that "they feared as they entered into the cloud." The cloud was a token of God's more peculiar presence; it was in a cloud that God of old took possession of the tabernacle and temple, and when the cloud covered the tabernacle, Moses was not able to enter, Ex. xl. 34, 35; and when it filled the temple, the priests could not stand to minister by reason of it, 2 Chr. v. 14; such a cloud was this; and then no wonder the disciples were afraid to enter into it. But never let any be afraid to enter into a cloud with Jesus Christ, for he will be sure to bring them safe through it.

8. The voice which came from heaven is here, and in Mark, related not so fully as in Matthew: "This is my beloved Son, hear him." Though these words "in whom I am well pleased," which we have both in Matthew and Peter, are not expressed, they are implied in that, "this is my beloved Son;" for whom he loves, and in whom he is well pleased, comes all to one; "we are accepted in the beloved."

Lastly. The apostles are here said to have kept this vision private; they "told no man in those days;" reserving the discovery of it for another opportunity, when the evidences of Christ's being the Son of God were completed, in the pouring out of the Spirit, and that doctrine was to be published to all the world. As there is a time to speak, so there is a time to keep silence. Every thing is beautiful and useful in its season.

37 And it came to pass, that on the next day, when they were come down from the hill, much people met him. 38 And, behold, a man of the company cried out, saying, Master, I beseech thee, look upon my son: for he is mine only child. 39 And, lo, a spirit taketh him, and he suddenly crieth out; and it teareth him that he foameth again, and bruising him hardly departeth from him. 40 And I besought thy disciples to cast him out; and they could not. 41 And Jesus answering said, O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you, and suffer you? Bring thy son hither. 42 And as he was yet a coming, the devil threw him down, and tare him. And Jesus rebuked the unclean spirit, and healed the child, and delivered him again to his father.

This passage of story in Matthew and Mark follows immediately upon that of Christ's transfiguration, and his discourse with his disciples after it; but here it is said to be "on the next day, as they were coming down from the hill;" which confirms the conjecture that Christ was transfigured in the night; and it should seem, though they did not make tabernacles, as Peter proposed, yet they found some shelter to repose themselves in all night, for it was not till next day that they came down from the hill; and then he found things in some disorder among his disciples, though not so bad as Moses did when he came down from the mount. When wise and good men are in their beloved retirements, they would do well to consider whether they are not wanted in their public stations. In this story here, observe,

First. How forward the people were to receive Christ at his return to them; though he had been but a little while absent, "much people met him," as at other times much people followed him; for so it was foretold concerning him, that "to him should the gathering of the people be."

Secondly. How importunate the father of the lunatic child was with Christ, for help for him, ver. 38: "I beseech thee, look upon my son," that is his request, and it is a very modest one; one compassionate look from Christ is enough to set every thing to rights. Let us bring ourselves and our children to Christ to be looked upon. His plea is, "he is mine only child." They that have many children may balance their affliction in one with their comfort in the rest; yet if it be an only child that is a grief, the affliction in that may be balanced with the love of God in giving his only begotten Son for us.

Thirdly. How deplorable the case of the child was, ver. 39: he was under the power of an evil spirit, that took him; and diseases of that nature are more frightful than such as arise merely from natural causes; when the fit seized him, without any warning given, he suddenly cried out, and many a time his shrieks had pierced the heart of his tender father. This malicious spirit tare him, and bruised him, and departed not from him, but with great difficulty, and a deadly gripe at parting. O the afflictions of the afflicted in this world! And what mischief doth Satan do, where he gets possession! But happy they that have access to Christ.

Fourthly. How defective the disciples were in their faith. Though Christ had given them power over unclean spirits, yet they could not cast out this evil spirit, ver. 40. Either they distrusted the power they were to fetch in strength from, or the commission given to them, or did not exert themselves in prayer as they ought; for this Christ reproved them: "O faithless and perverse generation." Dr. Clark understands this as spoken to his disciples; 'will ye be yet so faithless and full of distrust, that ye cannot execute the commission I have given you?'

Fifthly. How effectual the cure was which Christ wrought upon this child, ver. 42. Christ can do that for us which his disciples cannot. "Jesus rebuked the unclean spirit," then when he raged most. The devil "threw the child down and tare him," distorted him, so as if he would have pulled him to pieces; but one word from Christ "healed the child," and made good the damage the writers have fancied a spirit of persecution in this precept, but without cause, as it is not persecution to leave the company of the wicked, and even to publicly declare one's repudiation of communion with them. Once only do we find the apostles doing this literally.

ix. 7. This Herod is the one mentioned in chap. iii. 1. His anxiety is indicated by St. Matthew (chap. xiv. 1, 2), and in Mark vi. 14, &c.

ix. 10. "A desert place of a city called Bethsaida" (for so the Greek is literally rendered) refers to a locality near Bethsaida, which is said to be not the western, but another town of the name, on the north-eastern shore of the lake. Some copies read that Jesus "went aside privately into the city called Bethsaida." This place was, we are told, "in the jurisdiction of Philip, who beautified it considerably, and gave it the name of Julias." Matthew and Mark state that Jesus went there by ship, but Luke does not mention this fact.

ix. 13. The fish were naturally derived from the lake of Genne-

devil had done him. And it is here added, that he "delivered him again to his father." Note, When our children are recovered from sickness, we must receive them as delivered to us again, receive them as life from the dead, and as when we first received them. It is comfortable to receive them from the hand of Christ, to see him delivering them to us again: 'Here, take this child and be thankful; take it, and bring it up for me, for thou hast it again from me; take it, and do not set thy heart too much upon it.' With such cautions as these parents should receive their children from Christ's hands, and then with comfort put them again into his hands.

43 And they were all amazed at the mighty power of God. But while they wondered every one at all things which Jesus did, he said unto his disciples, 44 Let these sayings sink down into your ears: for the Son of man shall be delivered into the hands of men. 45 But they understood not this saying, and it was hid from them, that they perceived it not: and they feared to ask him of that saying. 46 Then there arose a reasoning among them, which of them should be greatest. 47 And Jesus, perceiving the thought of their heart, took a child, and set him by him, 48 And said unto them, Whosoever shall receive this child in my name receiveth me: and whosoever shall receive me receiveth him that sent me: for he that is least among you all, the same shall be great. 49 And John answered and said, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name; and we forbid him, because he followeth not with us. 50 And Jesus said unto him, Forbid him not: for he that is not against us is for us.

We may observe here,

First. The impression which Christ's miracles made upon all that beheld them, ver. 43; "they were all amazed at the mighty power of God," which they could not but see in all the miracles Christ wrought. Note, The works of God's almighty power are amazing, especially those that were wrought by the hand of the Lord Jesus; for he is the power of God, and his name is Wonderful. Their wonder was universal,—"they wondered every one;" and so were the causes of it,—"they wondered at all things which Jesus did;" all his actions had something uncommon and surprising in them.

Secondly. The notice Christ gave to his disciples of his approaching sufferings; "the Son of man shall be delivered into the hands of men," wicked men, men of the worst character; they shall be permitted to abuse him at their pleasure. That is here implied which is expressed by the other evangelists, "they shall kill him." But that which is peculiar here is,

1. The connexion of this with what goes next before, of the admiration with which the people were struck, at beholding of Christ's miracles, ver. 43. While they all wondered at all things which Jesus did, he said this to his disciples. They had a fond conceit of his temporal kingdom, and that he should reign, and they with him, in secular pomp and power; and now they thought this mighty power of his would easily effect the thing, and his interest gained by his miracles in the people would contribute to it; and therefore Christ, who knew what was in their hearts, takes this occasion to tell them again, what he told them before, that he was so far from having men delivered into his hands, that he must "be delivered into the hands of men;" so far from living in honour, that he must die in disgrace; and all his miracles, and the interest he has by them gained in the hearts of the people, will not be able to prevent it.

2. The solemn preface with which it is introduced: "Let these sayings sink down into your ears;" that is, "take special notice of what I say, and mix faith with it; let not the notions you have of the temporal kingdom of the Messiah stop your ears against it, nor make you unwilling to believe it. Admit what I say, and submit to it." Let it sink down into your hearts; so the Syriac and Arabic read it. The word of Christ doth us no good unless we let it sink down into our heads and hearts.

3. The unaccountable stupidity of the disciples, with reference to this prediction of Christ's sufferings. It was said in Mark, "they understood not that saying;" it was plain enough; but they would not understand it in the literal sense, because it agreed not with their notions; and they could not understand it in any other, "and were afraid to ask him," lest they should be undeceived and awakened out of their pleasing dream; but it is here added, that "it was hid from them, that they perceived it not," through the weakness of faith and the power of prejudice. We cannot think it was in mercy hid from them, lest they should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow at the prospect of it; but that it was a paradox, because they made it so to themselves.

Thirdly. The rebuke Christ gave to his disciples for their disputing among themselves which should be greatest, ver. 46-48. This passage we had before, and the more is the pity, shall meet with the like again. Observe here,

1. That ambition of honour, and strife for superiority and precedence, is a sin that doth most easily beset the disciples of our Lord Jesus, for which they deserve to be severely rebuked; and it flows from corruptions which they are highly concerned to subdue and mortify, ver. 46. They that expect to be great in this world commonly aim high, and nothing will serve them short of being greatest, which exposeth them to a great deal of temptation and trouble, which they are safe from that are content to be little, to be least, to be less than the least.

2. That Jesus Christ is perfectly acquainted with the thoughts and intents of our hearts, ver. 47; he perceived their thoughts; they are words to him, and whispers, loud cries. It is a good reason why we should keep up a strict government of our thoughts, because Christ takes a strict cognizance of them.

zaret. Dr. Tristram says, in his "Natural History of the Bible," "Very similar in character to the fishes of the Nile are the species of the Jordan and its affluents, abounding most of all in the lake of Galilee. Josephus remarks upon this fact (Bell. Jud. iii. 10, 8), and says that the country people thought it to be connected with the Nile, because of the identity of the coracine (sheat-fish) found in it. The density of the shoals of fish in the sea of Galilee can scarcely be conceived by those who have not witnessed it. Frequently these

3. That Christ will have his disciples to aim at that honour that is to be obtained by a quiet and condescending humility, and not at that which is to be obtained by a restless and aspiring ambition. Christ "took a child and set him by him;" ver. 47; for he always expressed a tenderness and kindness for little children; and he proposed this child to them for an example. 1st. Let them be of the temper of this child,—humble, and quiet, and easy to itself; let them not affect worldly pomp, or grandeur, or high titles, but be as dead to them as this child; let them bear no more malice to their rivals and competitors than this child did; let them be willing to be the least, if that would contribute any thing to their usefulness, to stoop to the meanest office whereby they might do good. 2nd. Let them assure themselves that this was the way to preferment, for this would recommend them to the esteem of their brethren; they that loved Christ would therefore receive them in his name, because they did most resemble him; and they would likewise recommend themselves to his favour; for Christ would take the kindnesses done to them as done to himself: "Who-soever shall receive one such child," a preacher of the Gospel that is of such a disposition as this, he placeth his respects aright, and receiveth me; and who-soever receiveth me," in such a minister, "receiveth him that sent me." And what greater honour can any man attain to in this world, than to be received by men as a messenger of God and Christ, and to have God and Christ own themselves received and welcomed in him? This honour have all the humble disciples of Jesus Christ; and thus they shall be truly great that are least among them.

Fourthly. The rebuke Christ gave to his disciples for discouraging one that honoured him, and served him, but was not of their communion; not only not one of the twelve, or one of the seventy, but not one of those that ever associate with them, or attend on them; but upon occasional hearing of Christ believed in him, and made use of his name with faith and prayer, in a serious manner, for the casting out of devils. Now,

1. This man they rebuked and restrained; they would not let him pray and preach, though it was to the honour of Christ, though it did good to men, and weakened Satan's kingdom, because he did not follow Christ with them; he separated from their church, was not ordained as they were, paid them no respect, nor gave them the right hand of fellowship. Now if ever any society of Christians in this world had reason to silence those that were not of their communion, the twelve disciples at this time had; and yet,

2. Jesus Christ chid them for what they did, and warned them not to do the like again, nor any that profess to be the successors of the apostles; "Forbid him not," ver. 50; but rather encourage him, for he is carrying on the same design that you are, though, for reasons best known to himself, he doth not follow with you; and he will meet you in the same end, though he do not accompany you in the same way. You do well to do as you do; but it doth not therefore follow that he doth ill to do as he doth, and that you do well to put him under an interdict, for "he that is not against us is for us," and therefore ought to be countenanced by us. We need not lose any of our friends, while we have so few, and so many enemies. Those may be found faithful followers of Christ, and as such may be accepted of him, though they do not follow with us: see Mar. ix. 38, 39. O what a great deal of mischief to the church, even from those that boast of relation to Christ, and pretend to envy for his sake, would be prevented, if this passage of story were but duly considered.

51 And it came to pass, when the time was come that he should be received up, he stedfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem, 52 And sent messengers before his face: and they went, and entered into a village of the Samaritans, to make ready for him. 53 And they did not receive him, because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem. 54 And when his disciples James and John saw this, they said, Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did? 55 But he turned, and rebuked them, and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. 56 For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. And they went to another village.

This passage of story we have not in any other of the evangelists, and it seems to come in here, for the sake of its affinity with that next before, for in this also Christ rebuked his disciples, because they envied for his sake; there, under colour of zeal for Christ, they were for silencing and restraining separatists; here, under the same colour, they were for putting infidels to death; and as for that, so for this also, Christ reprimanded them; for a spirit of bigotry and persecution is directly contrary to the spirit of Christ and Christianity. Observe here,

First. The readiness and resolution of our Lord Jesus in prosecuting his great undertaking for our redemption and salvation. Of this we have an instance, ver. 51; "when the time was come that he should be received up, he stedfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem." Observe,

1. There was a time fixed for the sufferings and death of our Lord Jesus, and he knew well enough when it was, and had a clear and certain foresight of it, and yet was so far from keeping out of the way, that then he appeared most publicly of all, and was most busy, knowing that his time was short.

2. When he saw his death and sufferings approaching, he looked through them, and beyond them, to the glory that should follow; he looked upon it as the time when he should be "received up into glory," 1 Tim. iii. 16, received up into the highest heavens, to be enthroned there. Moses and Elias spoke of his death as his departure out of this world, which made it not formidable; but he went farther, and looked upon it as his translation to a better world, which made it very desirable. All good Christians may frame to themselves the same notion of death, and may call it their being received up, to be with Christ where he is; and when the time of their being received up is at hand, let them lift up their heads, knowing that their redemption draws nigh.

3. On this prospect of the joy set before him, "he stedfastly set his face to go to shoals cover an acre or more of the surface. . . . We obtained fourteen species of fishes in the lake, and probably the number inhabiting it is at least three times as great."

ix. 19. There was a prevalent opinion, based on Micah iv. v., &c., that in the time of the Messiah some of the prophets would appear again.

ix. 28. What Luke calls "about an eight days" is defined by Matthew and Mark as six days. There is no contradiction, as Luke Jerusalem," the place where he was to suffer and die. He was fully determined to go, and would not be dissuaded. He went directly to Jerusalem, because there now his business lay, and he did not go about to other towns, or fetch a compass, which if he had done, as commonly he did, he might have avoided going through Samaria. He went cheerfully and courageously thither, though he knew the things which should befall him there. He did not fail, nor was discouraged, but set his face as a flint, knowing that he should be not only justified, but glorified, Isa. l. 7; not only not run down, but received up. How should this shame us for, and shame us out of, our backwardness to do and suffer for Christ: we draw back, and turn our faces another way from his service who steadfastly set his face against all opposition to go through with the work of our salvation.

Secondly. The rudeness of the Samaritans in a certain village, not named, nor deserving to be so, who would not receive him, nor suffer him to bait in their town, though his way lay through it. Observe here.

1. How civil he was to them: "he sent messengers before his face," some of his disciples, that went to take up lodgings, and to know whether he might have leave to accommodate himself and his company among them; for he would not come to give offence; or if they took any umbrage at the number of his followers. He sent some "to make ready for him," not for state, but convenience, and that his coming might be no surprise.

2. How uncivil they were to him, ver. 53: they did not receive him, would not suffer him to come into their village, but ordered their watch to keep him out. He would have paid for all he bespoke, and been a generous guest among them; would have done them good, and preached the Gospel to them, as he had done some time ago to another city of the Samaritans, Jno. iv. 41. He would have been, if they pleased, the greatest blessing that ever came to their village, and yet they forbade him entrance: Such treatment his Gospel and ministers have often met with. Now the reason was, "because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem:" they observed by his motions that he was steering his course that way. The great controversy between the Jews and the Samaritans was about the place of worship, whether Jerusalem or mount Gerizim near Sychar; see Jno. iv. 20; and so hot was the controversy between them, that "the Jews would have no dealings with the Samaritans," nor they with them, Jno. iv. 9. Yet we may suppose they did not deny other Jews lodgings among them; no, not when they went up to the feasts; for if that had been their constant practice, Christ would not have attempted it; and it would have been a great way about for some of the Galileans to go to Jerusalem any other way but through Samaria. But they were particularly incensed against Christ, who was a celebrated teacher, for owning and adhering to the temple at Jerusalem, when the priests of that temple were such bitter enemies to him, which they hoped would have driven him to come and worship at their temple, and bring that unto reputation; but when they saw he would go forward to Jerusalem notwithstanding this, they would not shew him the common civility which probably they used formerly to shew him in his journey thither.

Thirdly. The resentment which James and John had of this affront, ver. 54. When these two heard this message brought, they were all in a flame presently, and nothing will serve them but Sodom's doom upon this village; "Lord," say they, "give us leave to command fire to come down from heaven, not to frighten them only, but 'to consume them.'" Here indeed they shewed,

1. A great confidence in the power they had received from Jesus Christ; though this had not been particularly mentioned in their commission, yet they could with a word's speaking fetch fire from heaven; Θέλεις ἐπιταμεν,—"wilt thou that we speak the word, and the thing, will be done."

2. A great zeal for the honour of their Master; they took it very heinously that he who did good wherever he came, and found hearty welcome, should be denied the liberty of the road by a parcel of paltry Samaritans; they could not think of it without indignation that their Master should be thus slighted.

3. A submission, notwithstanding, to their Master's good will and pleasure; they will not offer to do such a thing, unless Christ give leave; "Wilt thou that we do it?"

4. A regard to the examples of the prophets that were before them: it is doing "as Elias did;" they would not have thought of such a thing, if Elijah had not done it upon the soldiers that came to take him, once and again, 2 Kin. i. 10, 12; they thought this precedent would be their warrant; so apt are we to misapply the examples of good men, and to think to justify ourselves by them in the irregular liberties we give ourselves, when the case is not parallel.

But though there was something well in what they said, yet there was much more amiss. 1st. This was not the first time, by a great many, that our Lord Jesus had been in like manner affronted; witness the Nazarenes thrusting him out of their city, and the Gadarenes desiring him to depart out of their coast, and yet he never called for any judgment upon them, but patiently put up the injury. 2nd. These were Samaritans, from whom better was not to be expected; and perhaps they had heard that Christ had forbidden his disciples to enter into any of the cities of the Samaritans, Mat. x. 5; and therefore it was not so bad in them as in others, that knew more of Christ, and had received so many favours from him. 3rd. Perhaps it was only some few of the town that knew any thing of the matter, or that sent that rude message to him; while, for aught they knew, there were many in the town who, if they had heard of Christ's being so near them, would have gone to meet him, and welcomed him. And must the whole town be laid in ashes for the wickedness of a few? Will they have the righteous destroyed with the wicked? 4th. Their Master had never yet upon any occasion called for fire from heaven; nay, he had refused to give the Pharisees any sign from heaven when they demanded it, Mat. xvi. 1, 2; and why should they think to introduce it? James and John were the two disciples whom Christ had called "Boanerges, sons of thunder," Mar. iii. 17; and will not that serve them, but they must be sons of lightning too? 5th. The example of Elias did not reach the case. Elijah was sent to display the terrors of the law, and to give proof of that, and to witness as a bold reprover against the idolatries and wickednesses of the court of Ahab; and it was agreeable enough to him to have his commission thus proved; but it is a dispensation of grace that is now to be introduced, to which such a terrible display of Divine justice will not be at all agreeable. Archbishop Tillotson suggests that their being now near Samaria, where Elijah called for fire from heaven, that might help to put it in their heads; perhaps at the very place; but though the place was the same, the times were altered.

Fourthly. The reproach he gave to James and John for their fiery, furious zeal, ver. 55. "He turned" with a just displeasure, ver. 55, "and rebuked them;" for as many as he loves he rebukes and chastens, particularly for what they do that is irregular and unbecoming them under the colour of zeal for him.

1. He shews them in particular their mistake: "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of," that is, 1st. Ye are not aware what an evil spirit and disposition ye are of; how much there is of pride and passion and personal revenge covered under this pretence of zeal for your Master. Note, There may be much corruption lurking—nay, and stirring too—in the hearts of good people, and they themselves not be sensible of it. 2nd. Ye do not consider what a good spirit, directly contrary to this, ye should be of. Surely you are yet to learn, though you have been so long learning, "what the spirit of Christ and Christianity is. Have you not been taught to 'love your enemies,'" and to "bless them that curse you," and to call for grace from heaven, not fire from heaven, upon them? You know not how contrary your disposition herein is to that which it was the design of the Gospel you should be delivered into. You are not now under the dispensation of bondage, and terror, and death, but under the dispensation of love, and liberty, and grace, which was ushered in with a proclamation of "peace on earth," and "good will towards men," to which you ought to accommodate yourselves, and not by such imprecations as these oppose yourselves.

2. He shews them the general design and tendency of his religion, ver. 56: "The Son of man is not 'himself' 'come,' and therefore doth not send you abroad, 'to destroy men's lives, but to save them.'" He designed to propagate his holy religion by love and sweetness, and every thing that is inviting and endearing, not by fire and sword, and blood and slaughter; by miracles of healing, not by plagues and miracles of destruction, as Israel was brought out of Egypt. Christ came to slay all enmities, not to foster them. Those are certainly destitute of the spirit of the Gospel that are for anathematizing and rooting out by violence and persecution all that are not of their mind and way, that cannot in conscience say as they say, and do as they do. Christ came not only to save men's souls, but to save their lives too: witness the many miracles he wrought for the healing of diseases that would otherwise have been mortal. By which, and a thousand other instances of beneficence, it appears that Christ would have his disciples do good to all, to the utmost of their power, but hurt to none; to draw men into his church with the cords of a man, and the bands of love, but not think to drive men into it with a rod of violence, or the scourge of the tongue.

Fifthly. His retreat from this village. Christ would not only not punish them for their rudeness, but would not insist upon his right of travelling the road, which was as free to him as to other his neighbours; would not attempt to force his way, but quietly and peaceably "went to another village," where they were not so stingy and bigoted, and there refreshed himself and went on his way. Note, When a stream of opposition is strong, it is wisdom to get out of the way of it, rather than to contend with it. If some be more rude, instead of revenging it, we should try whether others will not be more civil.

57 And it came to pass, that, as they went in the way, a certain man said unto him, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. 58 And Jesus said unto him, Foxes have holes, and birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head. 59 And he said unto another, Follow me. But he said, Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. 60 Jesus said unto him, Let the dead bury their dead: but go thou and preach the kingdom of God. 61 And another also said, Lord, I will follow thee; but let me first go bid them farewell, which are at home at my house. 62 And Jesus said unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God.

We have here an account of three several persons that offered themselves to follow Christ, and the answers that Christ gave to each of them; the two former we had an account of, Mat. xix. 21.

First. Here is one that is extremely forward to follow Christ immediately; but seems to have been too rash, and hasty, and inconsiderate, and not to have sitten down and counted the cost.

1. He makes Christ a very large promise, ver. 57: "as they went in the way," going up to Jerusalem, where it was expected Christ would first appear in his glory, one said to him, "Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest." This must be the resolution of all that will be found Christ's disciples indeed; they "follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes," Rev. xiv. 4, though it be through fire and water, to prisons and deaths.

2. Christ gives him a necessary caution, not to promise himself great things in the world in following him; but on the contrary to count upon poverty and meanness, for "the Son of man hath not where to lay his head."

We may look upon this, 1st. As setting forth the very low condition that our Lord Jesus was in in this world. He not only wanted the delights and ornaments that great princes use to have, but even such accommodations for mere necessity as the foxes have, and the birds of the air. See what a depth of poverty our Lord Jesus submitted to for us, to increase the worth and merit of his satisfaction, and to purchase for us a larger allowance of grace, "that we through his poverty might be rich," 2 Cor. viii. 8, 9. He that made all, did not make a dwelling-place for himself, not a house of his own to put his head in, but what he was beholden to others for. He here calls himself the Son of man, a son of Adam, partaker of flesh and blood. He glories in his condescension towards us, not only to the meanness of our nature, but to the meanest condition in that nature, to testify his love to us, and to teach us a holy contempt of the world, and of great things in it; and a continual regard to another world. Christ was thus poor to sanctify and sweeten poverty to his people; the apostles had no certain dwelling-place, 1 Cor. iv. 11: which they might the better bear, when they knew their Master had not: see 2 Sam. xi. 11. We may well be content to fare as Christ did.

2nd. As proposing this to the consideration of those who intend to be his disciples. If we mean to follow Christ, we must lay aside the thoughts of great things in the world, and not reckon upon making any thing more than heaven of our religion, as we must resolve not to take up with any thing less. Let us not go about to compound the profession of Christianity with secular advantages; Christ has put them asunder, let not us think of joining them together. On the contrary, we must expect to enter into the kingdom of heaven through many tribulations, must deny ourselves and take up our cross. Christ tells this man what he must count upon if he followed him—to lie cold and uneasy, to fare hard, and live in contempt; if he could not submit to that, let may include the first and last days of the series, which the other two evangelists appear to omit in their accounts.

ix. 31. The word for "decease" here is exodos, which bears the sense of "departure" in its various acceptations. It is the same word as is used by Peter (2 Pet. i. 15), and by Paul in Heb. xi. 22, where, instead of being translated "departing," it might have been retained "the exodus."

ix. 37. The word rendered "hill" here is the same which in verse 286

28 is translated "mountain," and more in accordance with common usage.

ix. 44. The connection of the two clauses of this verse is not at first sight apparent. Probably the idea is, "Listen attentively to what I say, for I shall not be long with you; in a little time you will not hear my voice, as I shall soon be betrayed and taken away."

ix. 45. Kuinoel says, "The words of Christ were obscure to them; they did not see how to make this prediction agree with the pre-him not pretend to follow Christ. This word sent him back, for aught appears; but it will be no discouragement to any that know what there is in Christ and heaven to set in the scale against this.

Secondly. Here is another that seems resolved to follow Christ, but he begs a day, ver. 55. To this man Christ first gave the call; he said to him, "Follow me." He that proposed the thing of himself, fled off when he heard of the difficulties that attended it; but this man, to whom Christ gave a call, though he hesitated at first, yet as it should seem afterwards yielded: so true was that of Christ, "You have not chosen me, but I have chosen you," Jno. xv. 16. "It is not of him that willeth and of him that runneth," as that forward spark in the foregoing verses, "but of God that sheweth mercy," that gives the call, and makes it effectual, as to this man here. Observe.

1. The excuse he made: "Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father." "I have an aged father at home, who cannot live long, and will need me while he doth live; let me go and attend on him till he is dead, and I have performed my last office of love to him, and then I will do any thing." We may here see three temptations by which we are in danger of being drawn and kept from following Christ; which therefore we should guard against: 1st. We are tempted to rest in a discipleship at large, in which we may be at a loose end, and not to come close and give up ourselves to be strict and constant. 2nd. We are tempted to defer the doing of that which we know to be our duty, and to put it off to some other time. When we have got clear of such a care and difficulty, when we have despatched such a business, raised an estate to such a pitch, then we will begin to think of being religious; and so we are cozened of all our time, by being cozened of the present time. 3rd. We are tempted to think that our duty to our relations will excuse us from our duty to Christ. It is a plausible excuse indeed, "Let me go bury my father, let me take care of my family, and provide for my children, and then I will think of serving Christ;" whereas the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, must be sought and minded in the first place.

2. Christ's answer to it, ver. 60: "Let the dead bury their dead." Suppose, which is not likely, that there were none but the dead to bury their dead, or none but those that are themselves aged and dying, who are as good as dead, and fit for no other service, yet thou hast other work to do, "Go thou and preach the kingdom of God." Not that Christ would have his followers or his ministers to be unnatural; our religion teaches us to be kind and good in every relation, to shew piety at home, and to requite our parents; but we must not make these offices an excuse from our duty to God. If the nearest and dearest relation we have in the world stand in our way to keep us from Christ, it is necessary we have a zeal that will make us forget father and mother, as Levi did, Deut. xxxiii. 9. This disciple was called to be a minister, and therefore must not entangle himself with the affairs of this world, 2 Tim. ii. 4. And it is a rule, that whenever Christ calls to any duty, we must not consult with flesh and blood, Gal. i. 15, 16. No excuses must be admitted against a present obedience to the call of Christ.

Thirdly. Here is another that is willing to follow Christ, but he must have a little time to talk with his friends about it. Observe,

1. His request for a dispensation, ver. 61: he said, "Lord, I will follow thee," I design no other, I am determined to do it, "but let me first go bid them farewell that are at home." This seemed reasonable; it was what Elisha desired when Elijah called him, "Let me kiss my father and my mother;" and it was allowed him: but the ministry of the Gospel is preferable, and the service of it more urgent than that of the prophets, and therefore here it would not be allowed. Suffer me, ἀφαισθήτω τοῖς εἰς οἶκόν μου,—"let me go and set in order my household affairs," and give direction concerning them; so some understand it. Now that which was amiss in this is, 1st. That he looked upon his following Christ as a melancholy, troublesome, dangerous thing; it was to him as if he were going to die; and therefore he must take dear leave of all his friends, never to see them again, or never with any comfort; whereas, in following Christ, he might be more a comfort and blessing to them than if he had continued with them. 2nd. That he seemed to have his worldly concerns more upon his heart than he ought to have, and than would consist with a close attendance to his duty as a follower of Christ. He seemed to hanker after his relations and family concerns, and he could not part easily and cleverly from them, but they stuck to him. It may be he had bidden them farewell once; but loath to depart bids off farewell; and therefore he must bid them farewell once more, for they "are at home, at my house." 3rd. That he was willing to enter into a temptation from his purpose of following Christ. To go bid them farewell that were at home at his house, would be to expose himself to the strongest solicitations imaginable to alter his resolution, for they would all be against it, and would beg and pray that he would not leave them. Now it was presumption in him to thrust himself into such a temptation. Those that resolve to walk with their Maker, and follow their Redeemer, must resolve that they will not so much as parley with their tempter.

2. The rebuke which Christ gave him for this request; ver. 62, "No man, having put his hand to the plough," and designing to make good work of his ploughing, will look back, or look behind him, for then he makes balks with his plough, and the ground he ploughs is not fit to be sown; so thou, if thou hadst designed to follow me, and to reap the advantages of those that do so, if thou lookest back to a worldly life again, and hankerest after that, if thou lookest back as Lot's wife did to Sodom, which seems to be alluded to here, "thou art not fit for the kingdom of God." 1st. Thou art not soil fit to receive the good seed of the kingdom of God, if thou art thus ploughed by halves, and not gone through with. 2nd. Thou art not a sower fit to scatter the good seed of the kingdom, if thou canst hold the plough no better. Ploughing is in order to sowing. As those are not fit to be sown with Divine comforts whose fallow ground is not first broken up, so those are not fit to be employed in sowing that know not how to break up the fallow ground, but when they have laid their hand to the plough, upon every occasion look back, and think of quitting it. Note, Those who begin with the work of God must resolve to go on with it, or they will make nothing of it. Looking back inclines to drawing back, and drawing back is to perdition. Those are not fit for heaven who, having set their faces heavenward, face about; but he, and he only, that endures to the end shall be saved.

CHAPTER X.

In this chapter we have, I. The ample commission which Christ gave to the seventy disciples to preach the Gospel, and to confirm it by miracles; and the full instructions he gave them how to manage themselves in the execution of their commissions, and great encouragements therein, ver. 1—6. II. The reports which the seventy disciples made to their Master of the success of their negotiation, and his discourse thereupon, ver. 17—24. III. Christ's discourse with a lawyer concerning the way to heaven, and the instructions Christ gave him, by a parable, to look upon every one as his neighbour whom he had occasion to shew kindness to, or receive kindness from, ver. 25—37. IV. Christ's entertainment at Martha's house, the reproof he gave to her for her care about the world, and his commendation of Mary for her care about her soul, ver. 38—42.

conceived opinions which they entertained concerning the Messiah and his dignity."

ix. 46. It is supposed by some that the "reasoning" here referred to was not an open discussion, but the inward thought of their hearts. In favour of this view the language of the next verse is appealed to: Jesus perceived the thought of their hearts. Some, however, think there was an actual discussion between them. This view certainly seems to be justified by the form of the narrative in Mark ix. 33, 34.

AFTER these things the Lord appointed other seventy also, and sent them two and two before his face into every city and place, whither he himself would come. 2 Therefore said he unto them, The harvest truly is great, but the labourers are few: pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth labourers into his harvest. 3 Go your ways: behold, I send you forth as lambs among wolves. 4 Carry neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes: and salute no man by the way. 5 And into whatsoever house ye enter, first say, Peace be to this house. 6 And if the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon it: if not, it shall turn to you again. 7 And in the same house remain, eating and drinking such things as they give: for the labourer is worthy of his hire. Go not from house to house. 8 And into whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you, eat such things as are set before you: 9 And heal the sick that are therein, and say unto them, The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you. 10 But into whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you not, go your ways out into the streets of the same, and say, 11 Even the very dust of your city, which cleaveth on us, we do wipe off against you: notwithstanding be ye sure of this, that the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you. 12 But I say unto you, that it shall be more tolerable in that day for Sodom, than for that city. 13 Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon, which have been done in you, they had a great while ago repented, sitting in sackcloth and ashes. 14 But it shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon at the judgment, than for you. 15 And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, shalt be thrust down to hell. 16 He that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you despiseth me; and he that despiseth me despiseth him that sent me.

We have here the sending forth of seventy disciples, two and two, into divers parts of the country, to preach the Gospel, and to work miracles in those places which Christ himself designed to visit, to make way for his entertainment. This is not taken notice of by the other evangelists; but the instructions here given them are much the same with those given to the twelve. Observe,

I. Their number: they were seventy. As in the choice of twelve apostles Christ had an eye to the twelve patriarchs, the twelve tribes, and the twelve princes of those tribes, so here he seems to have an eye to the seventy elders of Israel. So many went up with Moses and Aaron to the mount, and "saw the glory of the God of Israel," Ex. xxiv. 1, 9; and so many were afterwards chosen to be assisting to Moses in the government, in order to which the spirit of prophecy came upon them, Num. xi. 24, 25. The twelve wells of water, and the seventy palm trees that were at Elim, were a figure of the twelve apostles and the seventy disciples, Ex. xv. 27. They were seventy elders of the Jews that were employed by Ptolemy, king of Egypt, in turning the Old Testament into Greek, whose translation is thence called the Septuagint. The great Sanhedrim consisted of this number. Now,

First. We are glad to find that Christ had so many followers fit to be sent forth. His labour was not altogether in vain, though he met with much opposition. Note, Christ's interest is a growing interest, and his followers, like Israel in Egypt, though afflicted, shall multiply. These seventy, though they did not attend him so closely and constantly as the twelve did, yet they were the constant hearers of his doctrine, and witnesses of his miracles, and believed in him. Those three mentioned in the close of the foregoing chapter might have been of the seventy, if they would have applied themselves in good earnest to their business. These seventy were those whom Peter speaks of, as "the men which

ix. 51. The translation of the first part of this verse is somewhat doubtful. More literally it might be rendered, "Now it came to pass, when the days were being fulfilled for his taking up," i.e., when the time for his being taken up was at hand. The question has been raised whether the allusion is to the ascension or to the crucifixion, or simply to his going up to Jerusalem. We think the ascension is meant.

ix. 53. If the Samaritans did not receive Jesus because he was accompanied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us," and were part of the one hundred and twenty there spoken of, Acts i. 15, 21. Many of those that were the companions of the apostles, whom we read of in the Acts and the Epistles, we may suppose were of these seventy disciples.

Secondly. We are glad to find there was work for so many ministers—hearers for so many preachers. Thus the grain of mustard seed began to grow, and the savour of the heaven to diffuse itself in the meal, in order to the leavening of the whole.

III. Their work and business. He "sent them two and two," that they might strengthen and encourage one another: if one fall, the other will help to raise him up. He sent them, not to all the cities of Israel, as he did the twelve, but only to every city and place whither he himself would come" ver. 1, as his harbingers; and we must suppose, though it be not recorded, that Christ did soon after come to all those places whither he now sent them, though he could stay but a little while in a place. Two things they were ordered to do, the same that Christ did wherever he came: 1st. They must heal the sick, ver. 9; heal them in the name of Jesus; which would make people to long to see that Jesus, and ready to entertain him whose name was so powerful. 2nd. They must publish the approach of the kingdom of God, its approach to them. Tell them this, "The kingdom of God is come nigh to you," and you now stand fair for an admission into it, if you will but look about you. Now is the day of your visitation, know and understand it. It is good to be made sensible of our advantages and opportunities, that we may lay hold on them. When the kingdom of God comes nigh us, it concerns us to go forth to meet it.

III. The instructions he gives them.

First. They must set out with prayer, ver. 2; and in prayer, 1st. They must be duly affected with the necessities of the souls of men, which called for their help. They must look about and see how great the harvest was, what abundance of people there were that wanted to have the Gospel preached to them, and were willing to receive it; nay, that had at this time their expectations raised of the coming of the Messiah, and of his kingdom. There was corn ready to shed and be lost for want of hands to gather it in. Note, Ministers should apply themselves to their work under a deep concern for precious souls, looking upon them as the riches of this world, which ought to be secured for Christ. They must likewise be concerned that the labourers were so few. The Jewish teachers were indeed many, but they were not labourers; they did not gather in souls to God's kingdom, but to their own interest and party. Note, These that are good ministers themselves wish there were more good ministers, for there is work for more. It is common for tradesmen not to care how few there are of their own trade; but Christ would have the labourers in his vineyard reckon it a matter of complaint when the labourers are few. 2nd. They must earnestly desire to receive their mission from God, that he would send them forth as "labourers into his harvest," who is "the Lord of the harvest," and that he would send others forth; for if God send them forth, they may hope he will go along with them, and give them success. Let them therefore say as the prophet, Isa. vi. 8, "Here am I; send me." It is desirable to receive our commission from God, and then we may go on boldly.

Secondly. They must set out with an expectation of trouble and persecution: "Behold, I send you forth as lambs among wolves" but, go your ways, and resolve to make the best of it. Your enemies will be as wolves, bloody and cruel, and ready to pull you to pieces; in their threatenings and revilings they will be as howling wolves to terrify you; in their persecutions of you, they will be as ravening wolves to tear you. But you must be as lambs, peaceable and patient, though made an easy prey of. It would have been very hard thus to be sent forth as sheep among wolves, if he had not endued them with his spirit and courage.

Thirdly. They must not encumber themselves with a load of provisions, as if they were going a long voyage, but depend upon God and their friends to provide what was convenient for them. Carry neither a purse for money, nor a scrip or knapsack for clothes or victuals, nor new shoes, as before to the twelve, ch. ix. 3; and "salute no man by the way." This command Elisha gave to his servant when he sent him to visit the Shunamite's dead child, 2 Kin. iv. 29. Not that Christ would have his ministers to be rude, and morose, and unmannered; but, 1st. They must go as men in haste, that had their particular places assigned them where they must deliver their message, and in their way directly to those places must not hinder or retard themselves with needless ceremonies or compliments. 2nd. They must go as men of business, business that relates to another world, which they must be intent in, and intent upon, and therefore must not entangle themselves with conversation about secular affairs. Minister verbi es, hoc age,—"You are a minister of the Word; attend to your office." 3rd. They must go as serious men, and men in sorrow. It was the custom of mourners, in the seven first days of their mourning, not to salute any, Job ii. 13. Christ was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; and it was fit that, by this and other signs, his messengers should resemble him, and likewise shew themselves affected with the calamities of mankind, which they came to relieve, and touched with a feeling of them.

Fourthly. They must shew not only their good will, but God's good will, to all to whom they came, and leave the issue and success to him that knows the heart, ver. 5, 6.

1st. The charge given them was, whatsoever house they entered into, they must say, "Peace be to this house." Here, 1st. They are supposed to enter into private houses, for being not admitted into the synagogues, they were forced to preach where they could have liberty. And as their public preaching was driven into houses, so thither they carried it: like their Master, wherever they visited, they preached from house to house, Acts v. 42; xx. 20. Christ's church was at first very much a church in the house. 2nd. They are instructed to say, "Peace be to this house," to all under this roof, to this family, and all that belong to it. "Peace be to you," was the common form of salutation among the Jews; they must not use it in formality, according to custom, to those they meet on the way, because they must use it with solemnity to those whose houses they entered into; "salute no man by the way" in compliment, but those into whose house ye enter, say to them, "Peace be to you," with seriousness and in reality; for this is intended to be more than a compliment. Christ's ministers go into all the world, to say, in Christ's name, "Peace be unto you." First. We are to propose peace to all; to preach peace by Jesus Christ, to proclaim the Gospel of peace, the covenant of peace, "peace on earth," and to invite the children of men to come and take the benefit of it. Secondly. We are to pray for peace to all. We must earnestly desire the salvation of the souls of those we preach to, and offer up those desires to God in prayer; and it may be well to let them know we do thus pray for them, and bless them, in the name of the Lord.

2. The success was different, according to the different disposition of those they preached to and prayed for. According as the inhabitants are sons of peace or not, accordingly our peace will, or will not, rest upon the house; recipitur ad modum recipientis,—"the quality of the receiver determines the nature of the reception." 1st. You will meet with some that are the sons of peace, that by the operations of the Divine grace, pursuant to the designations of the Divine counsel, are ready to admit the Word of the Gospel in the light and love of it, and have their hearts made as soft wax to receive the impressions of it. Those are qualified to receive the comforts of the Gospel in whom there is a good work of grace wrought; and as to those, your peace shall find them out, and rest upon them; your prayers for them shall be heard, the promises of the Gospel shall be confirmed to them, the privileges of it conferred on them, and the fruit of both shall remain and continue with them; a good part, that shall not be taken away. 2nd. You will meet with others that are no ways disposed to hear or heed your message; whole houses that have not one son of peace in them. Now it is certain our peace shall not come upon them; they have no part or lot in the matter; the blessing that rests upon the sons of peace shall never come upon the sons of Belial; nor can any expect the blessings of the covenant that will not come under the bonds of it. But it shall return to us again; that is, we shall have the comfort of having done our duty to God, and discharged our trust. Our prayers, like David's, shall return into our own bosom, Psa. xxxv. 13, and we shall have commission to go on in the work. Our peace shall return to us again, not only to be enjoyed by ourselves, but to be communicated to others, to the next we meet with, them that are sons of peace.

Fifthly. They must receive the kindnesses of those that did entertain them, and bid them welcome, ver. 7, 8. Those that receive the Gospel will receive you that preach it, and give you entertainment. You must not think to raise estates, but you may depend upon a subsistence; and, 1. Be not shy; do not suspect your welcome, nor be afraid of being troublesome, but "eat and drink" heartily "such things as they give;" for whatever kindness they shew you, it is but a small return for the kindness you do them, in bringing the glad tidings of peace. You well deserve it, for "the labourer is worthy of his hire," the labourer in the work of the ministry is so, if he be indeed a labourer; and it is not an act of charity, but of justice, in them who are taught in the Word to communicate to them that teach them. 2. Be not nice and curious in your diet; "eat and drink such things as they give," ver. 7; "such things as are set before you," ver. 8. Be thankful for plain food, and do not find fault though it be not dressed according to art. It ill becomes Christ's disciples to be desirous of dainties. As he has not tied them up to the Pharisees' superstitious fasts, so he has not allowed them the luxurious feasts of the epicures. Probably Christ here refers to the traditions of the elders about their meat, which were so many that those who observed them were extremely critical, you could hardly set a dish of meat before them but there was some scruple or other concerning it; but Christ would not have them to regard those things, but eat what was given them, "asking no question for conscience sake."

Sixthly. They must denounce the judgments of God against those who rejected them and their message. If you enter into a city, and they do not receive you, if there be none there disposed to hearken to your doctrine, leave them, ver. 10. If they will not give you welcome into their houses, do you give them warning in their streets; he orders them to do, as ch. ix. 5, he had ordered the apostles to do,—say to them, not with rage, or scorn, or resentment, but with compassion to their poor perishing souls, and a holy dread of the ruin which they are bringing upon themselves, "Even the dust of your city, which cleaveth on us, we do wipe off against you," ver. 11; from them do not receive any kindnesses at all; be not beholden to them: it cost that prophet of the Lord dear who accepted a meal's meat with a prophet in Bethel, 1 Kin. xiii. 21, 22. Tell them you will not carry away with you the dust of their city; let them take it to themselves, for dust they are. It shall be a witness for Christ's messengers, that they had been there according to their Master's order; tender and refusal was a discharge of their trust: but it shall be a witness against the recusants, that they would not give Christ's messengers any entertainment, no, not so much as water to wash their feet with, but they were forced to wipe off the dust. But tell them plainly, and bid them be sure of it, "the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you." Here is a fair offer made you; if you have not the benefit of it, it is your own fault. The Gospel is brought to your doors; if you shut your doors against it, your blood is upon your own head. Now "the kingdom of God is come nigh to you;" if you will not come up to it, and come into it, your sin will be inexcusable, and your condemnation intolerable. Note, The fairer offers we have of grace and life by Christ, the more we shall have to answer for another day, if we slight these offers. "It shall be more tolerable for Sodom, and for that city," ver. 12. The Sodomites indeed rejected the warning given them by Lot; but rejecting the Gospel is a more heinous crime, and will be punished accordingly in that day; he means the day of judgment, ver. 14; but calls it, by way of emphasis, that day, because it is the last and great day, the day when we must account for all the days of time, and have our state determined for the days of eternity.

Upon this occasion the evangelist repeats,

1. The particular doom of those cities wherein most of Christ's mighty works were done, which we had Mat. xi. 21, &c. Chorazin, and Bethsaida, and Capernaum, all bordering upon the sea of Galilee, where Christ was most conversant, are the places here mentioned. 1st. They enjoyed greater privileges; Christ's mighty works were done in them, and they were all gracious works, works of mercy. They were hereby exalted to heaven; not only dignified and honoured, but put into a fair way of being happy; they were brought as near heaven as external means could bring them. 2nd. God's design in favouring them thus was to bring them to repentance and reformation of life; to sit in sackcloth and ashes, both in humiliation for the sins they had committed, and in humility, and a meek subjection to God's government. 3rd. Their frustrating this design, and their receiving the grace of God therein in vain; it is implied that they repented not, they were not wrought upon by all the miracles of Christ to think the better of him, or the worse of sin. They did not bring forth fruits agreeable to the advantages they enjoyed. 4th. There was reason to think, morally speaking, that if Christ had come to Tyre and Sidon, Gentile cities, and had preached the same doctrine to them, and wrought the same miracles among them, that he did in these cities of Israel, they would have repented long ago, so speedy would their repentance have been, and that in sackcloth and ashes, so deep would it have been. Now to understand the wisdom of God, in giving the means of grace to those who would not improve them, and denying them to those that would, we must wait for the great day of discovery. 5th. The doom of those who thus received the grace of God in vain will be very fearful; they that were thus exalted, not making use of their elevation, will be thrust down to hell, thrust down with disgrace and dishonour: they will thrust in to get into heaven, in the crowd of professors, but in vain; they shall be thrust down, to their everlasting grief and disappointment, into the lowest hell, and hell will be hell indeed to them. 6th. In the day of judgment Tyre and Sidon will fare better, and it will be more tolerable for them than for these cities.

2. The general rule which Christ would go by, as to those to whom he sent his ministers; he will reckon himself treated according as they treated his ministers, ver. 16. What is done to the ambassador is done as it were to the prince that sends him. 1st. "He that heareth you," and regardeth what you say, "heareth me," and therein doth me honour. But, 2nd, "He that despiseth you," doth in effect despise me, and shall be reckoned with as having put an affront upon me; nay, he "despiseth Him that sent me." Note, Those that condemn the Christian religion do in effect put a slight upon natural religion, resolved to proceed to Jerusalem, the explanation is obvious. It was not so much because of the known antipathy between Samaritans and Jews; it was rather because, by his decision to go to Jerusalem in his Messianic character, he refused to recognise their pretensions in favour of Gerizim, where their temple was. Their temper and opinions are fairly represented in the Bereshith Rabba, where we read, "Rabbi Ishmael, son of Rabbi Joseph, when going to Jerusalem to pray, passed by this mountain (Gerizim). A certain Samaritan seeing him said to him, Would it not be better to pray in this blessed mountain than in that cursed one?" (See also John iv. 20, &c.; Josephus, "Antiquities," xx. 5.)

ix. 62. Our Lord's words here are in the form of a proverb. To put the hand to the plough is to enter upon an undertaking. To look back is in heart to abandon an undertaking, to lose faith. For a fine illustration of the opposite virtue, see St. Paul's words in Phil. iii. 13, 14.

which it is perfective of. And they who despise the faithful ministers of Christ, who, though they do not hate and persecute them, yet think meanly of them, look scornfully upon them, and turn their backs upon their ministry, will be reckoned with as despisers of God and Christ.

17 And the seventy returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name. 18 And he said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven. 19 Behold, I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy: and nothing shall by any means hurt you. 20 Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rather rejoice, because your names are written in heaven. 21 In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes: even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight. 22 All things are delivered to me of my Father: and no man knoweth who the Son is, but the Father; and who the Father is, but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him. 23 And he turned him unto his disciples, and said privately, Blessed are the eyes which see the things that ye see: 24 For I tell you, that many prophets and kings have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them.

Christ sent forth the seventy disciples as he was going up to Jerusalem to the feast of the tabernacles, when he went up not openly, but as it were in secret, Jno. vii. 10, having sent abroad so great a part of his ordinary retinue: and Dr. Lightfoot thinks it was before his return from that feast, and while he was yet at Jerusalem or Bethany, which was hard by, (for there he was, ver. 38.) that they, or at least some of them, returned to him. Now here we are told,

First. What account they gave him of the success of their expedition, ver. 17; they "returned again with joy;" not complaining of the fatigue of their journeys, or of the opposition and discouragement they met with, but rejoicing in their success, especially in casting out unclean spirits: "Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name." Though the healing of the sick only was mentioned in their commission, ver. 9, yet no doubt the casting out of devils was included; and in this they had wonderful success.

1. They give Christ the glory of this; it is "through thy name." Note, All our victories over Satan are obtained by power derived from Jesus Christ. We must in his name enter the lists with our spiritual enemies, and whatever advantages we gain, he must have all the praise; if the work be done in his name, the honour is due to his name.

2. They entertain themselves with the comfort of it; they speak of it with an air of exultation; "even the devils," those potent enemies, "are subject to us." Note, The saints have no greater joy or satisfaction in any of their triumphs than in those over Satan. If devils are subject to us, what can stand before us?

Secondly. What acceptance they found with him, and how he entertained this account.

1. He confirmed what they said, as agreeing with his own observation, ver. 18. "My heart and eye went along with you; I took notice what success you had, and 'I saw Satan fall as lightning from heaven.'" Note, Satan and his kingdom fell before the preaching of the Gospel. "I see how it is," saith Christ; "as you get ground, the devil loseth ground;" he falls as lightning falls from heaven; so suddenly, so irrecoverably, so visibly, that all may perceive it, and say, "See how Satan's kingdom totters, see how it tumbles." They triumphed in the casting of devils out of the bodies of people; but Christ sees and rejoiceth in the fall of the devil, from the interest he has in the souls of men, which is called his power in high places, Eph. vi. 12. He foresees this to be but an earnest of what should now be shortly done, and was already begun—the destroying of Satan's kingdom in the world, by the extirpating of idolatry, and the turning of the nations to the faith of Christ. Satan falls from heaven when he falls from the throne in men's hearts, Acts xxvi. 18. And Christ foresaw that the preaching of the Gospel, which would fly like lightning through the world, would, wherever it went, pull down Satan's kingdom: "Now is the prince of this world cast out." Some have given another sense of this, as looking back to the fall of the angels, and designed for a caution to these disciples, lest their success should puff them up with pride: "I saw angels turned into devils by pride; that was the sin for which Satan was cast down from heaven, where he had been an angel of light; I saw it, and give you an intimation of it, lest you, being lifted up with pride, should fall into that condemnation of the devil, who fell by pride," 1 Tim. iii. 6.

2. He repeated, ratified, and enlarged their commission, ver. 19: "Behold, I give you power to tread on serpents." Note, To him that hath, and useth well what he hath, more shall be given. They had employed their power vigorously against Satan, and now Christ intrusts them with greater power. 1st. An offensive power: "power to tread on serpents and scorpions," that is, devils, malignant spirits, the old serpents: you shall bruise their heads in my name, according to the first promise, Gen. iii. 15. Come, set your feet on the necks of these enemies; you shall tread upon these lions and adders, wherever you meet with them, you shall trample them under foot, Ps. xci. 13. You shall tread upon "all the power of the enemy," and the kingdom of the Messiah shall be every where set up upon the ruins of the devil's kingdom; as the devils have now been subject to you, so they shall still be. 2nd. A defensive power. "nothing shall by any means hurt you;" not serpents or scorpions, if you should be chastised with them, or thrown into prisons or dungeons among them; you shall be unhurt by the most venomous creatures, as St. Paul was, Acts xviii. 5, and as is promised, Mat. xvi. 18. If wicked men be as serpents to you, and you dwell among those scorpions, as Eze. ii. 6, you may despise their rage, and tread upon it; it need not disturb you, for they have no power against you but what is given them from above; they may hiss, but they cannot hurt. You may play upon the hole of the asp, for death itself shall not hurt or destroy, Isa. xi. 8, 9; xv. 8.

3. He directed them to turn their joy into the right channel, ver. 20: "Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you;" that they have been so, and shall be still so. Do not rejoice in this only as it is your honour, and a confirmation of your mission, and as it sets you a degree above other good people; do not rejoice in this only, or in this chiefly, "but rather rejoice, because your names are written in heaven," that is, because you are chosen of God to eternal life, and are the children of God through faith. Christ, who knew the counsels of God, could tell them that their names were written in heaven, for it is the Lamb's book of life that they are written in. All believers are through grace entitled to the inheritance of sons, and have received the adoption of sons, and the spirit of adoption, which is the earnest of that inheritance, and so are enrolled among his family; now this is matter of joy, greater joy than casting out devils. Note, Power to become the children of God is to be valued more than a power to work miracles; for we read of those who did in Christ's name cast out devils, as Judas did, and yet will be disowned by Christ in the great day; but they whose names are written in heaven shall never perish; they are Christ's sheep, to whom he will give eternal life. Saving graces are more to be rejoiced in than spiritual gifts; holy love is a more excellent way than speaking with tongues.

4. He offered up a solemn thanksgiving to his Father, for employing such mean people as his disciples were in such high and honourable services, ver. 21, 22. This we had before, Mat. xi. 25–27; only here it is prefixed, that "in that hour Jesus rejoiced." It was fit particular notice should be taken of that hour, because there were so few such, for he was a man of sorrows; in that hour he saw Satan fall, and heard of the good success of his ministers; "in that hour he rejoiced." Note, Nothing rejoiceth the heart of the Lord Jesus so much as the progress of the Gospel, and its getting ground of Satan, by the conversion of souls to Christ. Christ's joy was a solid, substantial joy, an inward joy; "he rejoiced in spirit;" but his joy, like deep waters, made no noise; it was joy that a stranger did not intermeddle with. Before he applied himself to thank his Father, he stirred up himself to rejoice; for as thankful praise is the genuine language of holy joy, so holy joy is the root and spring of thankful praise. Two things he gives thanks for:

1st. For what was revealed by the Father through the Son, ver. 21: "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth." In all our adorations of God, we must have an eye to him both as the Maker of heaven and earth, and as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in him our Father. Now that which he gives thanks for is, First. That the counsels of God concerning man's reconciliation to himself were revealed to some of the children of men, who might be fit also to teach others; and it is God that by his Son hath spoken these things to us, and by his Spirit hath revealed them in us; he hath revealed that which had been kept secret from the beginning of the world. Secondly. That they were revealed to babes, to those that were of mean parts and capacities, whose extraction and education had nothing in it promising, who were but children in understanding, till God by his Spirit elevated their faculties, and furnished them with this knowledge, and an ability to communicate it. We have reason to thank God, not so much for the honour he has hereby put upon the babes, as for the honour he has hereby done himself in perfecting strength out of weakness. Thirdly. That at the same time when he revealed them unto babes he hid them from the wise and prudent, the Gentile philosophers, the Jewish rabbins. He did not reveal the things of the Gospel to them, nor employ them in preaching up his kingdom. Thanks be to God that the apostles were not fetched from their schools; for, 1st. They would have been apt to mingle their notions with the doctrine of Christ, which would have corrupted it, as afterwards it proved; for Christianity was much corrupted by the Platonists' philosophy, in the first ages of it, and by the Peripatetic in its latter ages, and by the Judaizing teachers at the first planting of it. 2nd. If rabbins and philosophers had been made apostles, the success of the Gospel would have been ascribed to their learning and wit, and the force of their reasonings and eloquence; and therefore they must not be employed, lest they should have taken too much to themselves, and others should have attributed too much to them; they were passed by for the same reason that Gideon's army was reduced, "the people are yet too many," Jud. vii. 4. Paul indeed was bred a scholar, among the wise and prudent, but he became a babe when he became an apostle, and laid aside the "enticing words of man's wisdom," forgot them all, and made neither show nor use of any other knowledge but that of Christ and him crucified, 1 Cor. ii. 2, 4. Fourthly. That God herein acted in it by way of sovereignty; "even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight." If God gives his grace and the knowledge of his Son to some that are less likely, and do not give it to others, who we would think better able to deliver it with advantage, this must satisfy—so it pleaseth God, whose thoughts are infinitely above ours. He chooseth to intrust the dispensing of his Gospel in the hands of those who with a Divine energy will give it the setting on, rather than in theirs who with human art will give it the setting off.

2nd. For what was secret between the Father and the Son, ver. 22. First. The vast confidence that the Father puts in the Son: "All things are delivered to me of my Father;" all wisdom and knowledge; all power and authority; all that grace and comfort which is intended for the chosen remnant; it is all

x. 1. The phrase "other seventy" conveys an erroneous idea to the popular mind. The Greek should be rendered, "Now after these things the Lord also appointed seventy others," i.e., seventy more, or in addition to the twelve. There are copies in which the number is given as seventy-two, but the word "two" is supposed to have been interpolated by some one who thought that the Jewish Sanhedrim consisted of seventy-two members, and that our Lord fixed the same number. Seventy is a remarkable number in Jewish history.

Seventy persons went down to Egypt as the family of Jacob; seventy elders were chosen by Moses; and seventy was the number of the Sanhedrim. It was also a popular opinion that the Septuagint version was so called because it was made by seventy translators. Although the names of the seventy appointed by Jesus are not given, attempts were made in after times to ascertain who they were, but of course with no real success. There seems to be no reason for supposing that the appointment of the seventy was a permanent delivered into the hands of the Lord Jesus; in him all fulness must dwell, and from him it must be derived. He is the great trustee that manageth all the concerns of God's kingdom. Secondly. The good understanding that there is between the Father and the Son, and their mutual consciousness, such as no creature can be admitted to: "No man knows who the Son is," nor what his mind is, "but the Father," who possessed him in the beginning of his ways, before his works of old, Pr. viii. 22: "nor who the Father is," and what his counsels are, "but the Son," who lay in his bosom from eternity, was by him as one brought up with him, and was daily his delight, Pr. viii. 20: "and he to whom the Son," by the Spirit, "will reveal him." The Gospel is the revelation of Jesus Christ, and to him we owe all the discoveries made us of the will of God for our salvation; and here he speaks of it as that which was a great pleasure to himself, and for which he was very thankful to his Father to be so intrusted.

5. He told his disciples how well it was for them that they had these things revealed to them, ver. 23, 24. Having addressed himself to his Father, he "turned him to his disciples," designing to make them sensible how much it was for their happiness, as well as for the glory and honour of God, that they knew the mysteries of the kingdom, and were employed to lead others into the knowledge of them, considering,

1st. What a step it is towards something better; though the bare knowledge of these things is not saving, yet it puts us in the way of salvation; "blessed are the eyes which see the things which ye see." God therein blesseth them, and, if it be not their own fault, it will be an eternal blessedness to them.

2nd. What a step it is above those that went before them, even the greatest saints, and those that were most the favourites of heaven; "many prophets and righteous men," so it is Mat. xiii. 17, "many prophets and kings," so it is here, have desired to see and hear those things which you are daily and intimately conversant with, and have not seen and heard them. The honour and happiness of the New Testament saints far exceeds that even of the prophets and kings of the Old Testament, though they also were highly favoured. The general ideas which the Old Testament saints had, according to the intimations given them of the graces and glories of the Messiah's kingdom, made them wish a thousand times that their lot had been reserved for those blessed days, and that they might see the substance of those things which they had faint shadows of. Note. The consideration of the great advantages which we have in the New Testament light, above what they had who lived in Old Testament times, should awaken our diligence in the improvement of it; for if it do not, it will aggravate our condemnation for the non-improvement of it.

25 And, behold, a certain lawyer stood up, and tempted him, saying, Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? 26 He said unto him, What is written in the law? how readest thou? 27 And he answering said, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself. 28 And he said unto him, Thou hast answered right: this do, and thou shalt live. 29 But he, willing to justify himself, said unto Jesus, And who is my neighbour? 30 And Jesus answering said, A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead. 31 And by chance there came down a certain priest that way: and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side. 32 And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side. 33 But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was: and when he saw him, he had compassion on him, 34 And went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. 35 And on the morrow when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee. 36 Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves? 37 And he said, He that shewed mercy on him. Then said Jesus unto him, Go, and do thou likewise.

PASS IN JUDÆA.

We have here Christ's discourse with a lawyer about some points of conscience, which we are all concerned to be rightly informed in, and are so here from Christ, though the questions were proposed with no good intention.

1. We are concerned to know what that good is which we should do in this life in order to our attaining eternal life. A question to this purpose was proposed to our Saviour, by a certain lawyer or scribe, only with a design to try him, not with a desire to be instructed by him, ver. 25; the lawyer stood up, and asked him, "Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" If Christ had any thing peculiar to prescribe, by this question he would get it out of him, and perhaps expose him for it; if not, he would expose his doctrine as needless, since it would give no other direction for obtaining happiness than what they had already received, or, perhaps he had no malicious design against Christ, as some of the scribes had, only he was willing to have a little talk with him, just as people go to church to hear what the minister will say. This was a good question, "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" but it lost all its goodness when it was proposed with an ill design, or a very mean one. Note, It is not enough to speak of the things of God, and to inquire about them, but we must do it with an agreeable concern. If we speak of eternal life, and the way to it, in a careless manner, merely as matter of discourse, especially as matter of dispute, we do but take the name of God in vain, as the lawyer here did. Now this question being started, observe,

First. How Christ turned him over to the Divine law, and bid him follow the direction of that. Though he knew the thoughts and intents of his heart, he doth not answer him according to the folly of that, but according to the wisdom and goodness of the question he asked. He answered him with a question, "What is written in the law, how readest thou?" ver. 26. He came to catechise Christ, and to know him; but Christ will catechise him, and make him know himself. He talks to him as a lawyer; as one conversant in the law, the studies of his profession would inform him; let him practise according to his knowledge, and he should not come short of eternal life. Note, It will be of great use to us, in our way to heaven, to consider what is written in the law, and what we read there. We must have recourse to our Bibles, to the law, as it is now in the hand of Christ, and walk in the way that is shewed us there. It is a great mercy that we have the law written, that we have it thereby reduced to a certainty, and that thereby it is capable of spreading the farther and lasting the longer. Having it written, it is our duty to read it, and to read it with understanding, and to treasure up what we read, so that when there is occasion, we may be able to tell what is written in the law, and how we read. And to this we must appeal, by this we must try doctrines, and end disputes; this must be our oracle, our touchstone, our rule, our guide, what is written in the law, how do we read. If there be light in us, it will have regard to this light.

Secondly. What a good account he gave of the law, of the principal commandments of the law, which we must bind ourselves to the observance of, if we would inherit eternal life. He did not, like a Pharisee, refer himself to the tradition of the elders; but, like a good textuary, fastened upon the two first and greatest commandments of the law, as those which he thought must be most strictly observed in order to the obtaining of eternal life, and which included all the rest, ver. 27. 1. We must love God with all our hearts; must look upon him as the best of beings in himself, most amiable, and infinitely perfect and excellent, as one whom we lie under the greatest obligations to, both in gratitude and interest. We must prize him, and value ourselves by our relation to him; must please ourselves in him, and devote ourselves entirely to him. Our love in him must be sincere, and hearty, and fervent; it must be a superlative love, a love that is as strong as death; but an intelligent love, and such as we can give a good account of the grounds and reasons of. It must be an entire love; he must have our whole souls, and must be served with all that is within us; we must love nothing beside him, but what we love for him, and in subordination to him. 2. We must love our neighbours as ourselves, which we shall easily do, if, as we ought, we love God better than ourselves. We must wish well to all, and ill to none; must do all the good we can in the world, and no hurt, and must fix it as a rule to ourselves to do to others as we would they should do to us; and this is to love our neighbour as ourselves.

Thirdly. Christ's approbation of what he said, ver. 28. Though he came to tempt him, yet what he said that was good Christ commended; "Thou hast answered right." Christ himself fastened upon those as the two great commandments of the law, Mat. xxii. 37; both sides agreed in this. Those who do well shall have praise of the same; and so should those have that speak well; so far is right; but the hardest part of this work yet remains, "This do, and thou shalt live;" thou shalt "inherit eternal life."

one, as we find no trace of their continuance as an association. The appointment was for a specific object, and the mission a temporary one, which was completed in a few days, or a few weeks at furthest.

x. 2. The resemblance between the instructions given to the seventy and those to the twelve are worthy of note, but it is observable that there are important differences. The miraculous powers of the seventy were less extensive than those of the twelve, and their commission less comprehensive.

x. 6. "The son of peace" is a peaceful man; here one who has a friendly feeling or sympathy towards the messengers, and is willing to hear and receive them. "Your peace" is "your salutation," or "the good which you desire by your salutation." He who cordially entertained them would be blessed.

x. 7. They were not to go from house to house; ordinary hospitality was all they needed, and they were not to indulge themselves in any way.

Fourthly. His care to avoid the conviction, which was now ready to fasten upon him. When Christ said, "This do, and thou shalt live," he began to be aware that Christ intended to draw from him an acknowledgment that he had not done this, and therefore an inquiry what he should do, and which way he should look, to get his sins pardoned; and likewise an acknowledgment that he could not do this perfectly, for the future, by any strength of his own, and therefore an inquiry by which way he might fetch in strength to enable him to do it: but he was "willing to justify himself," and therefore cared not for carrying on that discourse, but saith, in effect, as another did, Matt. xix. 30. "All these things have I kept from my youth up." Note, Many ask good questions with a design rather to justify themselves than to inform themselves; rather proudly to shew what is good in them than humbly to see what is bad in them.

II. We are concerned to know who is our neighbour; whom, by the second great commandment, we are obliged to love. And this is another of this lawyer's queries, which he started only that he might drop the former, lest Christ should have forced him, in the prosecution of it, to condemn himself, when he was resolved to justify himself. As to loving God he was willing to say no more of it; but, as to his neighbour, he was sure there he had come up to the rule, for he had always been very kind and respectful to all about him. Now observe,

First. What was the corrupt notion of the Jewish teachers in this matter. Dr. Lightfoot quotes their own words to this purpose; "where he saith, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour,' he excepts all Gentiles, for they are not our neighbours, but those only that are of our own nation and religion;" they would not put an Israelite to death for killing a Gentile, for he was not his neighbour. Indeed they say they ought not to kill a Gentile that they were not at war with; but if they saw a Gentile in danger of death, they thought themselves under no obligation to help to save his life. Such wicked inferences did they draw from that holy covenant of peculiarity which God had distinguished them by; and by abusing it thus, they had forfeited it; and God justly took the forfeiture, and transferred covenant favours to the Gentile world, to whom they brutishly denied common favours.

Secondly. How Christ corrected this inhuman notion, and shewed, by a parable, that whoever we have need to receive kindness from, and find ready to shew us the kindness we need, we cannot but look upon as our neighbour; and therefore ought to look upon all those as such who need our kindness, and to shew them kindness accordingly, though they be not of our own nation and religion. Now observe,

1. The parable itself; which represents to us a poor Jew, in distressed circumstances, succoured and relieved by a good Samaritan. Let us see here,

1st. How he was abused by his enemies; the honest man was travelling peaceably upon his lawful occasions, in the road, and it was a great road, that leads from Jerusalem to Jericho, ver. 30. The mentioning of those places intimates that it was matter of fact, and not a parable, and probably it happened lately, just as it is here related. The occurrences of Providence would yield us many good instructions, if we would carefully observe and improve them; and would be equivalent to parables framed on purpose for instruction, and be more affecting. This poor man "fell among thieves." Whether they were Arabians, Rapparees, that lived by spoil, or some profligate wretches of his own nation, or some of the Roman soldiers, who, notwithstanding the strict discipline of their army, did this villany, doth not appear; but they were very barbarous; they not only took his money, but stripped him of his clothes; and that he might not be able to pursue them, or only to gratify a cruel disposition, (for otherwise what profit was there in his blood?) they wounded him, and left him half dead, ready to die of his wounds. We may here conceive a just indignation at highwaymen, that have divested themselves of all humanity, and are as natural brute beasts, beasts of prey, made to be taken and destroyed; and at the same time we cannot but think with compassion on those that fall into the hands of such wicked and unreasonable men, and be ready, when it is in our power, to help them. And what reason have we to thank God for our preservation from perils by robbers!

2nd. How he was slighted by those that should have been his friends, who were not only men of his own nation and religion, but one a priest, and the other a Levite, men of a public character and station; nay, they were men of professed sanctity, whose offices obliged them to tenderness and compassion, Heb. v. 2: who ought to teach others their duty in such a case as this, which was to deliver them that were drawn unto death; yet they would not themselves do it. Dr. Lightfoot tells us that many of the courses of the priests had their residence in Jericho, and from thence came up to Jerusalem, when it was their turn to officiate there, and so back again, which occasioned abundance of passing and repassing of priests that way, and Levites, their attendants; they came this way, and saw the poor wounded man; it is likely he heard his groans; and could not but perceive that if he were not helped, he must quickly perish. The Levite not only saw him, but "came and looked on him," ver. 32; but they "passed by on the other side;" when they saw his case, they got as far off him as ever they could, as if they would have had a pretence to say, "Behold, we knew it not." It is sad when those who should be examples of charity are prodigies of cruelty, and when those who should, by displaying the mercies of God, open the bowels of others' compassion, shut up their own.

3rd. How he was succoured and relieved by a stranger; a certain Samaritan, of that nation which, of all other, the Jews despised and detested, and would have no dealings with: this man had some humanity in him, ver. 33. The priest had his heart hardened against one of his own people; but the Samaritan had his opened towards one of another people; "when he saw him, he had compassion on him," and never took into consideration what country he was of: though he was a Jew, he was a man, and a man in misery, and he has learned to honour all men. He knows not how soon this poor man's case may be his own, and therefore pities him, as he himself would desire and expect to be pitied in the like case. That so great love should be found in a Samaritan, was perhaps thought as that great faith which Christ admired in a Roman, in a woman of Canaan; but really was not so, for pity is the work of a man, but faith is the work of Divine grace.

The compassion of this Samaritan was not an idle compassion; he did not think it enough to say, Be healed, be helped, Jas. ii. 16; but when he drew out his soul, he reached forth his hand also to this poor needy creature, Isa. lviii. 7, 10; Pr. xxi. 20. See how friendly this good Samaritan was. First. He went to the poor man, whom the priest and Levite kept at a distance from; he inquired, no doubt, how he came into this deplorable condition, and condoled him. Secondly. He did the surgeon's part, for want of a better; he "bound up his wounds," making use of his own linen, it is likely, for that purpose; and poured "in oil and wine," which perhaps he had with him; wine to wash the wound, and oil to mollify it, and close it up. He did all he could to ease the pain, and prevent the peril, of his wounds, as one whose heart bled with them. Thirdly. He "set him on his own beast," and went on foot himself, and "brought him to an inn." And a great mercy it is to have inns upon the road, where we may be furnished for our money with all conveniences for food and rest. Perhaps the Samaritan, if he had not met with this hindrance, would have got that night to his journey's end; but, in compassion to that poor man, he takes up short at an inn. Some think the priest and Levite pretend they could not stay to help the poor man, because they were in haste to go and attend the temple service at Jerusalem. We suppose this Samaritan went upon business; but he understood that both his own business and God's sacrifice too must give place to such an act of mercy as this. Fourthly. He "took care of him" in the inn; got him to bed, had food for him that was proper, and due attendance, and, it may be, prayed with him. Nay, Fifthly. As if he had been his own child, or one he was obliged to look after, when he left him next morning, he left money with the landlord to be laid out for his use, and passed his word for what he should spend more. Two pence of their money was about fifteen pence of ours, which, according to the rate of things then, would go a great way; however, here it was an earnest of content to the full of all demands. Now all this was kind and generous, and as much as one could have expected from a friend or a brother; and yet here it is done by a stranger and foreigner.

Now this parable is applicable to another purpose than that for which it was intended; and doth excellently set forth the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards sinful, miserable man. We were like this poor distressed traveller; Satan, our enemy, had robbed us, stripped us, wounded us; such is the mischief that sin hath done us; we are by nature more than half dead, twice dead in trespasses and sins; utterly unable to help ourselves, for we were without strength. The law of Moses, like the priest and Levite, the ministers of that law, looks upon us, but has no compassion on us, gives us no relief; it passes by on the other side, as having neither pity nor power to help us. But then comes the blessed Jesus, that good Samaritan, (and they said of him by way of reproach, he is a Samaritan,) he has compassion on us; he binds up our bleeding wounds, Ps. cxlvii. 3; Isa. lxi. 1; pours in, not oil and wine, but that which is infinitely more precious, his own blood; he takes care of us, and bids us put all the expenses of our cure upon his account; and all this, though he was none of us, till he was pleased by his voluntary condescension to make himself so, but infinitely above us. This magnifies the riches of his love, and obligeth us all to say, "How much are we indebted, and what shall we render?"

2. The reddition or application of the parable. 1st. The truth contained in it is extorted from the lawyer's own mouth. Now tell me, saith Christ, "which of these three was neighbour to him that fell among thieves?" ver. 36, the priest, the Levite, or the Samaritan?—which of those did the neighbour's part? To this the lawyer would not answer, as he ought to have done, Doubtless the Samaritan was; but "He that sheweth mercy on him;" doubtless he was a good neighbour to him, and very neighbourly, and he could not but say it was a good work thus to save an honest Jew from perishing.

2nd. The duty inferred from it is pressed home upon the lawyer's own conscience; "Go, and do thou likewise." The duty of relations is mutual and reciprocal; the titles of friends, brethren, neighbours, &c., as Grotius here speaks, τῶν πρὸς τῷ, equally binding on both sides; if one side be bound, the other cannot be loose, as is agreed in all contracts. If a Samaritan doth well that helps a distressed Jew, certainly a Jew doth not well if he do not in like manner help a distressed Samaritan; petimusque damusque vicissim—these kind offices are to be reciprocated; and, therefore, Go thou, and do as the Samaritan did; whenever occasion offers, shew mercy to those that need thy help, and do it freely, and with concern and compassion, though they be not of thy own nation, and thy own profession, opinion, and communion in religion. Let thy charity be thus extensive before thou boastest of having conformed thyself to that great commandment of loving thy neighbour. This lawyer valued himself much upon his learning, and his knowledge of the laws, and in that he thought to have puzzled Christ himself; but Christ sends him to school to a Samaritan to learn his duty; Go, and do like him. Note, It is the duty of every one of us, in our places, and according to our ability, to succour, help, and relieve all that are in distress and necessity, and of lawyers particularly; and herein we must study to excel many that are proud of their being priests and Levites.

38 Now it came to pass, as they went, that he entered into a certain village: and a certain woman named Martha received him into her house. 39 And she had a sister called Mary, which also sat at Jesus' feet, and heard his word. 40 But Martha was cumbered about much serving, and came to him, and said, Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? bid her therefore that she help me. 41 And Jesus answered and said unto her, Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things: 42 But one thing is needful: and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her.

We may observe in this story, First. The entertainment which Martha gave to Christ and his disciples at her house, ver. 38. Observe,

1. Christ's coming to the village where Martha lived. "As they went," (Christ and his disciples together,) he, and they with him, "entered into a certain village." This village was Bethany, nigh to Jerusalem, whither Christ was now going up, and he took this in his way. Note, 1st. Our Lord Jesus went about doing good, Acts x. 38; scattering his benign beams and influences as the true light of the world. 2nd. Wherever Christ went, his disciples went along with him. 3rd. Christ honoured the country villages with his presence and favour, and not the great and populous cities only; for as he chose privacy, so he countenanced poverty.

2. His reception at Martha's house; "a certain woman named Martha received him into her house," and bade him welcome, for she was the house-keeper. Note, 1st. Our Lord Jesus, when he was here upon earth, was so poor that he was necessitated to be beholden to his friends for a subsistence. Though he was Sion's King, he had no house of his own, either in Jerusalem or near it. 2nd. There were some that were Christ's particular friends, whom he loved more than other of his friends, and them he visited most frequently. He loved this family, Jno. xi. 5, and often invited himself to them. Christ's visits are the tokens of his love, Jno. xiv. 22. 3rd. There were those who kindly received Christ into their houses, when he was here upon earth. It is called Martha's house, for probably she was a widow, and was the housekeeper. Though it was chargeable to entertain Christ, for he did not come alone, but

x. 11. To wipe off the dust was to indicate by a symbolical action that there was no fellowship possible with such as rejected the Gospel. (See Note on chap. ix. 5.)

x. 13—15. This denunciation also occurs in Matt. xi. 20—24, but it is not there intimated exactly under what circumstances it was uttered.

x. 17. The fact that the seventy returned so soon quite favours the opinion that their appointment was not a permanent one.

x. 20. "Written in heaven," or, as the Greek is, "written in the heavens," is an allusion to the well-known idea which represents the names of good men as inscribed in a book, the book of life. God will not lose sight of one of his faithful servants; all are registered in his book of remembrance.

x. 26. Instead of answering the question directly, our Lord put a question to the lawyer, who rehearsed a passage from the Old Testament (Deut. vi. 4) which the Jews were wont to repeat twice a day.

brought his disciples with him, yet she would not stick at the expense of it. How can we spend what we have better than in Christ's service! Nay, though at this time it was grown dangerous to entertain him, especially so near Jerusalem, yet she cared not what hazard she ran for his name's sake; though there were many that rejected him, and would not entertain him, yet there was one that bade him welcome. Though Christ is every where spoken against, yet there is a remnant to whom he is dear, and that are dear to him.

Secondly. The attendance which Mary, the sister of Martha, gave upon the word of Christ, ver. 20. 1. She "heard his word." It seems our Lord Jesus, as soon as he came into Martha's house, even before entertainment was got for him, addressed himself to his great work of preaching the Gospel. He presently took the chair with solemnity, for Mary sat to hear him, which intimates that it was a continued discourse. Note, A good sermon is never the worse for being preached in a house; and the visits of our friends should be so managed as to make them turn to spiritual advantage. Mary having this price put into her hands, set herself to improve it, not knowing when she should have such another. Since Christ is forward to speak, we should be swift to hear. 2. She sat to hear, which notes a close attention; her mind was composed, and she resolved to abide by it; not to catch a word now and then, but to receive all that Christ delivered. She sat at his feet, as scholars at the feet of their tutors, when they read their lectures; hence Paul is said to be "brought up at the feet of Gamaliel." Our sitting at Christ's feet, when we hear his word, signifies a readiness to receive his word, and a submission and entire resignation of ourselves to the conduct of it. We must either sit at Christ's feet, or be made his footstool; but if we sit with him at his feet now, we shall sit with him on his throne shortly.

Thirdly. The care of Martha about her domestic affairs; "but Martha was cumbered about much serving," ver. 40; and that was the reason why she was not where Mary was,—sitting at Christ's feet to hear his word. She was providing for the entertainment of Christ, and those that came with him. Perhaps she had no notice before of his coming, and she was unprovided; but was in care to have every thing handsome upon this occasion: she had not such guests every day; and housekeepers know what care and bustle there must be when a great entertainment is to be made. Observe here,

1. Something commendable, which must not be overlooked. 1st. Here was a commendable respect to our Lord Jesus; for we have reason to think it was not for ostentation, but purely to testify her good will to him, that she made this entertainment. Note, Those who truly love Christ, will think that well bestowed that is laid out for his honour. 2nd. Here was a commendable care of her household affairs. It appears, by the respects shewed to this family among the Jews, Jno. xi. 19, that they were persons of some charity and distinction; and yet Martha herself did not think it a disparagement to her to lay her hand even to the service of the family, when there was occasion for it. Note, It is the duty of those who have the charge of families to look well to the ways of their household. The affectation of state, and the love of ease, makes many families neglected.

2. Here was something culpable, which we must take notice of too. 1st. She was for much serving; her heart was upon it to have a very sumptuous and splendid entertainment; great plenty, great variety, and great exactness, according to the fashion of the place. She was in care, περί πολλήν διακονίαν,—"concerning much attendance." Note, It doth not become the disciples of Christ to affect much serving—to affect varieties, dainties, and superfluities in eating and drinking; what needs much serving, when much less will serve? 2nd. She was cumbered about it, περισπᾶτο, she was just distracted with it. Note, Whatever cares the providence of God casts upon us, we must not be cumbered with them, nor be disquieted and perplexed by them. Care is good, and duty; but cumber is sin and folly. 3rd. She was then cumbered about much serving when she should have been with her sister, sitting at Christ's feet, to hear his word. Note, Worldly business is then a snare to us, when it hinders us from serving God, and getting good to our souls.

Fourthly. The complaint which Martha made to Christ, against her sister Mary, for not assisting her upon this occasion in the business of the house, ver. 40; "Lord, dost thou not care that my sister," who is concerned as well as I to have things done well, "has left me to serve alone?" therefore dismiss her from attending thee, and bid her come help me. Now,

1. This complaint of Martha's may be considered as a discovery of her worldliness: it was the language of her inordinate care and cumber. She speaks as one in a mighty passion with her sister, else she would not have troubled Christ with the matter. Note, The inordinacy of worldly cares and pursuits is often the occasion of disturbance in families, and of strife and contention among relations; and those that are eager upon the world themselves, are apt to blame and censure those that are not so too; and while they justify themselves in their worldliness, and judge of others by their serviceableness to them in their worldly pursuits, they are ready to condemn those who addict themselves to the exercises of religion, as if they neglected the main chance, as they call it. Martha, being angry at her sister, appealed to Christ, and would have him to say she did well to be angry: "Lord, dost thou not care that my sister has left me to serve alone?" It should seem as if Christ had sometimes expressed himself tenderly concerned for her, and her ease and comfort, and would not have her go through so much toil and trouble; and she expected he should now bid her sister take her share in it. When Martha was caring, she must have Mary, and Christ, and all, to care too, or else she is not pleased. Note, Those are not always in the right that are most forward to appeal to God: we must therefore take heed lest we at any time expect that Christ should espouse our unjust and groundless quarrels. The cares he casts upon us we may cheerfully cast upon him; but not those which we foolishly draw upon ourselves. He will be the patron of the poor and injured, but not of the turbulent and injurious.

2. It may be considered as a discouragement of Mary's piety and devotion. Her sister should have commended her for it: should have told her that she was in the right; but instead of that, she condemns her as wanting in her duty. Note, It is no strange thing for those that are zealous in religion to meet with hindrances and discouragements from those that are about them; not only with opposition from enemies, but with blame and censure from their friends. David's fasting, and his dancing before the ark, were turned to his reproach.

Fifthly. The reproof which Christ gave to Martha for her inordinate care, ver. 41; she appealed to him, and he gives judgment against her: "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things," whereas "but one thing is needful."

1. He reproved her, though he was her guest, and her fault was her oversolicitude to entertain him, and she expected he should justify her in it; yet he publicly checked her for it. Note, "As many as Christ loves he rebukes and chastens." Even those that are dear to Christ, if any thing be amiss in them, shall be sure to hear of it: "Nevertheless I have something against thee."

are not easily disentangled: to them we must call again and again, "O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord."

3. That which he reproved her for, was her being "careful, and troubled about many things." He was not pleased that she should think to please him with a rich and splendid entertainment, and with perplexing herself to prepare it for him; whereas he would teach us, as not to be sensual in using such things, so not to be selfish in being willing others be troubled, no matter who or how many, so we may be gratified. Christ reproves her both for the intemperance of her care,— "thou art careful, and troubled," divided and disturbed by thy care,—and for the extensiveness of it, "about many things;" thou dost grasp at many enjoyments, and so art troubled at many disappointments. Poor Martha, thou hast many things to fret at, and that puts thee out of humour; whereas less ado would serve. Note, Inordinate care and trouble about many things in this world is a common fault among Christ's disciples, and is very displeasing to Christ; and it is that for which they often come under the rebukes of Providence. If they fret for no just cause, it is just with him to order them something to fret at.

4. That which aggravated the sin and folly of her care was, that "but one thing is needful." It is a low construction which some put upon this, that whereas Martha was in care to provide many dishes of meat, there was occasion for but one; one would be enough. "There is need but of one thing," ἑὸς δὲ κατὰ χρειαί. If we take it so, it furnisheth us with a rule of temperance, not to affect varieties and dainties, but be content to sit down to one dish of meat; to half one, Pr. xxiii. 1—3. It is a forced construction which some of the ancients put upon it; but oneness is needful, in opposition to distractions. There is need of one heart to attend upon the Word; not divided and hurried to and fro, as Martha's was at this time. But "the one thing needful" is certainly meant of that which Mary made her choice,—sitting at Christ's feet to hear his word; she was troubled about many things, when she should have applied herself to one: godliness unites the heart, which the world had divided. The many things she was troubled about were needless; while the one thing she neglected was needful. Martha's care and work was good in its proper season and place; but now she had something else to do, which was unspeakably more needful, and therefore should be done first, and most minded. She expected Christ to have blamed Mary for not doing as she did; but he blamed her for not doing as Mary did; and we are sure the judgment of Christ is according to truth; and the day will come when Martha will wish she had sitten where Mary did.

Sixthly. Christ's approbation and commendation of Mary for her serious piety; "Mary hath chosen that good part." Mary said nothing in her own defence; but since Martha has appealed to the Master, to him she is willing to refer it, and will abide by his award; and here we have it.

1. She had justly given the preference to that which best deserved it. For "one thing is needful;" this one thing that she hath done, to give up herself to the conduct of Christ, and receive the law from his mouth. Note, Serious godliness is a needful thing; it is the one thing needful; for nothing without this will do us any real good in this world, and nothing but this will go with us into another world.

2. She had herein wisely done well for herself. Christ justified Mary against her sister's clamours. However we may be censured and condemned by men for our piety and zeal, our Lord Jesus will take our part; "but thou shalt answer, Lord, for me." Let not us, then, condemn the pious zeal of any, lest we set Christ against us; never be discouraged if we be censured for our pious zeal, for we have Christ for us. Note, Sooner or later Mary's choice will be justified; and all those who make that choice, and abide by it. But this was not all; he applauded her for her wisdom; "she hath chosen the good part," for she chose to be with Christ,—to take her part with him; she chose the better business, and the better happiness, and took the better way of honouring Christ, and of pleasing him, by receiving his Word into her heart, than Martha did by providing for his entertainment in her house. Note, 1st. A part with Christ is a good part; it is a part for the soul and eternity; the part Christ gives to his favourites, Jno. xiii. 8; who are partakers of Christ, Heb. iii. 14; and partakers with Christ, Rom. viii. 17. 2nd. It is a part that shall never be taken away from those that have it. A portion in this life will certainly be taken away from us, at the farthest, when we shall be taken away from it; but nothing shall separate us from the love of Christ, and our part in that love. Men and devils cannot take it away from us; and God and Christ will not. 3rd. It is the wisdom and duty of every one of us to choose this good part; to choose the service of God for our business, and the favour of God for our happiness, and an interest in Christ in order to both. In particular cases we must choose that which has a tendency to religion; and reckon that best for us that is best for our souls. Mary was at her choice whether she would partake with Martha in her care, and get the reputation of a fine housekeeper; or sit at the feet of Christ, and approve herself a zealous disciple; and by her choice in this particular, Christ judgeth of her general choice. 4th. Those who choose this good part shall not only have what they choose, but shall have their choice commended in the great day.

CHAPTER XI.

In this chapter, I. Christ teacheth his disciples to pray, and quickens and encourageth them to be frequent, and instant, and importunate in prayer, ver. 1—13. II. He fully answereth the blasphemous imputation of the Pharisees, who charged him with casting out devils by virtue of a compact and confederacy with Beelzebub, the prince of the devils; and shews the absurdity and wickedness of it, ver. 14—26. III. He shews the honour of obedient disciples to be greater than that of his own mother, ver. 27, 28. IV. He upbraids the men of that generation for their infidelity and obstinacy, notwithstanding all the means of conviction offered to them, ver. 29—36. V. He severely reproved the Pharisees and lawyers for their hypocrisy, pride, and their oppressing of the consciences of those that submitted to them; and their hating and persecuting those that witnessed against their wickedness, ver. 37—54.

AND it came to pass, that, as he was praying in a certain place, when he ceased, one of his disciples said unto him, Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples. 2 And he said unto them, When ye pray, say, Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy

x. 30. As Lightfoot and many since him have observed, Jericho was a considerable place in our Saviour's days. The road from Jerusalem was somewhat frequented, as it was the high road over the Jordan to Perea. Among the foot passengers would be Jewish priests, who, residing at Jericho, as many of them did, had to go to and fro on account of their duties at the Temple in Jerusalem. There was, therefore, much propriety in placing the Levite and the priest in this parable. The road was generally down-hill from Jerusalem to Jericho, and in some places through rocky and wild localities. The wilderness on the route was regarded as dangerous. (See Josephus, "Wars," iv. 8, 3; Jerome on Jeremiah iii. 2; and Stanley's "Sinai and Palestine," chap. xiii.) Dean Stanley suggests that the robbers would be Bedouins, "who from a very early time gave this road a proverbial celebrity for its deeds of blood, and who now make kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so in earth. 3 Give us day by day our daily bread. 4 And forgive us our sins; for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us. And lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil. 5 And he said unto them, Which of you shall have a friend, and shall go unto him at midnight, and say unto him, Friend, lend me three loaves; 6 For a friend of mine in his journey is come to me, and I have nothing to set before him? 7 And he from within shall answer and say, Trouble me not: the door is now shut, and my children are with me in bed; I cannot rise and give thee. 8 I say unto you, Though he will not rise and give him, because he is his friend, yet because of his importunity he will rise and give him as many as he needeth. 9 And I say unto you, Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. 10 For every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. 11 If a son shall ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent? 12 Or if he shall ask an egg, will he offer him a scorpion? 13 If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children: how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?

Prayer is one of the great laws of natural religion. That man is a brute, is a monster, that never prays,—that never gives glory to his Maker, nor feels his favour, nor owns his dependence upon him. One great design, therefore, of Christianity is to assist us in prayer, to enforce the duty upon us, and to instruct us in it, and encourage us to expect advantage by it. Now here we find Christ himself "praying in a certain place;" probably where he used to pray, ver. 1. As God he was prayed to; as man he prayed; and though he were a Son, yet learned he this obedience. This evangelist has taken particular notice of Christ's prayer often, more than other of the evangelists; when he was baptized, ch. iii. 21, he was "praying;" "he withdrew into the wilderness and prayed," ch. v. 16; "he went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer," ch. vi. 12; "he was alone praying," ch. ix. 18. And soon after he "went up into a mountain to pray, and as he prayed he was transfigured," ch. ix. 28, 29; and here "he was praying in a certain place;" thus, like a genuine son of David, he gave himself unto prayer, Ps. cix. 4. Whether Christ was now alone praying, and the disciples only knew that he was so, or whether he prayed with them, is uncertain: it is most probable they were joining with him.

Secondly, His disciples applied themselves to him for direction in prayer; when he was praying they asked, "Lord, teach us to pray." Note, The gifts and graces of others should excite us to covet earnestly the same; their zeal should provoke us to a holy imitation and emulation: why should we not do as well as they? Observe, They came to him with this request "when he ceased;" for they would not disturb him when he was at prayer; no, not with this good motion. "Every thing is beautiful in its season." "One of his disciples," in the name of the rest, and perhaps by their appointment, said, "Lord, teach us." Note, Though Christ is apt to teach, yet he will for this be inquired of, and his disciples must attend him for instruction. Now,

1. Their request is, "Lord, teach us to pray;" give us a rule or model by which to go in praying, and put words into our mouths. Note, It becomes the disciples of Christ to apply themselves to him for instruction in prayer. "Lord, teach us to pray," is itself a good prayer, and a very needful one, for it is a hard thing to pray well; and it is Jesus Christ only that can teach us by his Word and Spirit how to pray. "Lord, teach me what it is to pray; Lord, excite and quicken me to the duty; Lord, direct me what to pray for; Lord, give me praying graces, that I may serve God acceptably in prayer; Lord, teach me to pray in proper words; give me a mouth and wisdom in prayer, that I may speak as I ought; teach me what I shall say."

2. Their plea is, "as John also taught his disciples." He took care to instruct his disciples in this necessary duty, and we would be taught as they were; for we have a better Master than they had. Dr. Lightfoot's notion of this is, that whereas the Jews' prayers were generally adorations and praises of God, and doxologies, John taught his disciples such prayers as were more filled up with petitions and requests; for it is said of them that they did dehotes monein,—"make prayers," ch. v. 33. The word signifies such prayers as are properly petitionary. Now, Lord, teach us those, to be added to those benedictions of the name of God which we have been accustomed to from our childhood. And according to this sense, Christ did there teach them a prayer consisting wholly of petitions, and even omitting the doxology which had been affixed, and the Amen, which was usually said in the giving of thanks, 1 Cor. xiv. 16, and in the Psalms is added to doxologies only. This disciple needed not to have urged John Baptist's example: Christ was more ready to teach than ever John Baptist was; and particularly taught to pray better than John did or could teach his disciples.

Thirdly, Christ gave them direction; much the same that he had given them before in his sermon upon the mount, Mat. vi. 9. We cannot think that they had forgot it, but they thought to have had farther and fuller instructions, and he did not as yet think fit to give them any; when the Spirit should be poured out upon them from on high, they would find all their requests couched in these few, and would be able in words of their own to expatiate and enlarge upon them. In Matthew he had directed them to pray "after this manner;" here, "when ye pray, say;" which intimates that the Lord's prayer was intended to be used both as a form of prayer and a directory.

1. There are some differences between the Lord's prayer in Matthew and in Luke, by which it appears it was not the design of Christ that we should be tied up to these very words, for then there would have been no variation. Here is one difference in the translation only, which ought not to have been, when there is none in the original, and that is in the third petition, "as in heaven, so in earth;" whereas the words are the very same, and in the same order, as in Matthew. But there is a difference in the fourth petition; in Matthew we pray, give us daily bread "this day;" here, give us "day by day," καθ' ἡμέραν; "day by day" is, give us each day the bread which our bodies require, as they call for it; not, give us this day bread for many days to come; but, as the Israelites had manna, let us have bread to day for to day, and to morrow for to morrow, that thus we may be kept in a continual dependence upon God, as children upon their parents, and may have our mercies fresh from his hand daily, and may find ourselves under fresh obligations to do the work of every day in the day, according as the duty of the day requires, because we have from God the supplies of every day in the day, according as the necessity of the day requires. Here is likewise some difference in the fifth petition; in Matthew it is, "forgive us our debts, as we forgive;" here it is, "forgive us our sins," which proves that our sins are our debts, "for we forgive;" not that our forgiving those that have offended us can merit pardon from God, or be an inducement to him to forgive us; he forgives for his own name's sake, and his Son's sake; but this is a very necessary qualification for forgiveness; and if God have wrought it in us, we may plead that work of his grace for the enforcing of our petitions for the pardon of our sins; "Lord, forgive us, for thou hast thyself inclined us to forgive others." Here is another addition here; we plead not only in general, we forgive "our debtors," but in particular we profess "to forgive every one that is indebted to us" without exception. We so "forgive our debtors," as not to bear malice or ill-will to any, but true love to all, without any exception whatsoever. Here also the doxology in the close is wholly omitted, and the Amen; for Christ would leave them at liberty to use that or any other doxology fetched out of David's Psalms; or rather, he left a vacuum here for to be filled up by a doxology more peculiar to the Christian institutes, ascribing glory to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

2. Yet it is for substance the same; and we shall therefore here only gather up some general lessons from it.

1st. That in prayer we ought to come to God, as children to a father, a common Father to us and all mankind, but in a peculiar manner a Father to all the disciples of Jesus Christ. Let us therefore in our requests, both for others and for ourselves, come to him with a humble boldness, confiding in his power and goodness.

2nd. That at the same time, and in the same petitions wherein we address God for ourselves, we should take in with us all the children of men, as God's creatures, and our fellow-creatures. A rooted principle of catholic charity and of Christian sanctified humanity, should go along with us and dictate to us throughout this prayer, which is so worded as to be accommodated to that noble principle.

3rd. That in order to the confirming of the habit of heavenly-mindedness in us, which ought to act and govern us in the whole course of our conversation, we should, in all our devotions, with an eye of faith look heavenwards, and eye the God we pray to as our Father in heaven, that we may make the upper world more familiar to us, and may ourselves become better prepared for the future state.

4th. That in prayer, as well as in the tenor of our lives, we must "seek first the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof," by ascribing honour to his name, his holy name, and power to his government, both that of his providence in the world, and that of his grace in the church. O that both the one and the other may be more manifested, and we and others more manifestly brought into subjection to both.

5th. That the principles and practices of the upper world, the unseen world (which therefore by faith only we are apprised of), are the great original (the ἀρχή) to which we should desire the principles and practices of this lower world, both in others and in ourselves, may be more conformable. Those words, "as in heaven, so on earth," refer to all the three first petitions; "Father, let thy name be sanctified and glorified, and thy kingdom prevail, and thy will be done on this earth, that is now alienated from thy service, as it is in yonder heaven, that is entirely devoted to thy service."

6th. That those who faithfully and sincerely mind the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, may humbly hope that "all other things," as far as to Infinite Wisdom seems good, "shall be added to them;" and they may in faith pray for them. If our first and chief desire and care be that God's name may be sanctified, and his kingdom come, and his will be done, we may then come boldly to the throne of grace for our daily bread, which will then be sanctified to us when we are sanctified to God, and God is sanctified by us.

7th. That in our prayers for temporal blessings we must moderate our desires, and confine them to a competency. The expression here used of "day by day," is the very same with "our daily bread;" and therefore some think we must look for another signification of the word ἐκαστα, than that of daily, which we give it, and that it means our necessary bread; the bread that is suited to the cravings of our nature; the fruit that is brought out of the earth for our bodies, that are made of the earth, and are earthly, Ps. civ. 14.

8th. That sins are debts we are daily contracting, and which therefore we should every day pray for the forgiveness of. We are not only going behind of our rent every day, by omissions of duty, and in duty, but are daily incurring the penalty of the law, as well as the forfeiture of our bond, by our commissions; every day adds to the score of our guilt, and it is a miracle of mercy that we have so much encouragement given us to come every day to the throne of grace to pray for the pardon of our sins of daily infirmity. God multiplies to pardon beyond seventy times seven.

9th. That we have no reason to expect, nor can with any confidence pray, that God would forgive our sins against him, if we do not sincerely, and from a truly Christian principle of charity, forgive those that have at any time affronted us, or been injurious to us. Though the words of our mouth be even this prayer to God, if the meditation of our heart at the same time be, as often as it is, malice and revenge to our brethren, we are not accepted, nor can we expect an answer of peace.

10th. That temptations to sin should be as much dreaded and deprecated by us as ruin by sin; and it should be as much our care and prayer to get the power of sin broken in us, as to get the guilt of sin removed from us; and though temptation may be a charming, flattering thing, we must be as it impossible for even the vast host of pilgrims to descend to the Jordan without a Turkish guard. Sharp turns of the road, projecting spurs of rock, everywhere facilitate the attack and escape of the plunderers." The name of the place to which the incidents of the parable are traditionally assigned is Adummim, the ill-repute of which is truly recorded by Cotovius, who calls it "a place formerly, as also now, infamous for its frequent murders and robberies." Cotovius wrote this in a book published in 1619.

x. 38. A reference to John xi. will show the village of Bethany is meant here. Our Lord was now rapidly approaching Jerusalem.

xi. 2. Critics are divided in opinion as to whether our Lord gave this form of prayer on two occasions, or only on one. That St. Luke describes an actual incident is undoubted. Some MSS., as the Vatican and Sinaitic, omit the words "which art in heaven," and "thy will be done, as in heaven, so in earth;" these passages are therefore left out by some modern editors.

earnest with God that we may not be led into that, as that we may not be led by that to sin, and by sin to ruin.

11th. That God is to be depended upon, and sought unto for our deliverance from all evil; and we should pray not only that we may not be left to ourselves to run into evil, but that we may not be left to Satan to bring evil upon us. Dr. Lightfoot understands it of being delivered from the evil one, that is, the devil, and suggests that we pray particularly against the apparitions of the devil and his possessions. The disciples were employed to cast out devils, and therefore were concerned to pray that they might be guarded against the particular spite he would always be sure to have against them.

1. That importunity will go far in our dealings with men, ver. 5-8. Suppose a man upon a sudden emergency goes to borrow a loaf or two of bread of a neighbour, at an unreasonable time of night, not for himself, but for his friend that came unexpectedly to him; his neighbour will be loath to accommodate him, for he has awakened him with his knocking, and put him out of humour, and he has a great deal to say in his excuse; the door is shut and locked, his children are asleep in bed, in the same room with him, and if he make a noise he shall disturb them; his servants are asleep, and he cannot make them hear; and for his own part he shall catch cold if he riseth to give him; but his neighbour will have no nay, and therefore he continues knocking still, and tells him he will do so till he has what he comes for; so that he must give it him to be rid of him. "He will rise and give him as many as he needs, because of his importunity." He speaks this parable with the same intent that he speaks that, ch. xviii. 1, "that men ought always to pray, and not to faint;" not that God can be wrought upon by importunity, we cannot be troublesome to him, nor by being so change his counsels: we prevail with men by importunity, because they are displeased with it, but with God because he is pleased with it. Now this similitude may be of use to us,

1st. To direct us in prayer. First. We must come to God with boldness and confidence for what we need, as a man doth to the house of his neighbour or friend, who he knows loves him, and is inclined to be kind to him. Secondly. We must come for bread, for that which is needful, and which we cannot be without. Thirdly. We must come to him by prayer for others, as well as for ourselves. This man did not come for bread for himself, but for his friend. The Lord accepted Job when he prayed for his friends, Job xlii. 10. We cannot come to God on a more pleasing errand than when we come to him for grace to enable us to do good; to feed many with our lips; to entertain and edify those that come to us. Fourthly. We may come with the more boldness to God in a strait, if it be a strait that we have not brought ourselves into by our own folly and carelessness, but Providence has led us into it. This man would not have wanted bread if his friend had not come in unexpectedly. The rare which Providence casts upon us, we may with cheerfulness cast back upon Providence. Fifthly. We ought to continue instant in prayer, and watch in the same with all perseverance.

2nd. To encourage us in prayer. If importunity could prevail thus with a man, that was angry at it, much more with a God, who is infinitely more kind and ready to do good to us than we are to one another, and is not angry at our importunity, but accepts it, especially when it is for spiritual mercies that we are importunate. If he do not answer our prayers presently, yet he will in due time, if we continue to pray.

2. That God hath promised to give us what we ask of him. We have not only the goodness of his nature to take comfort from, but the word which he hath spoken, ver. 9, 10, "Ask, and it shall be given you;" either the thing itself you shall ask, or that which is equivalent; either the thorn in the flesh removed, or grace sufficient given in. We had this before, Mat. vii. 7, 8, "I say unto you;" we have it from Christ's own mouth, who knows his Father's mind, and in whom all promises are yea and amen. We must not only ask, but we must seek in the use of means, must second our prayers with our endeavours. And in asking and seeking, we must continue pressing, still knocking at the same door, and we shall at length prevail, not only by our prayers in concert, but by our particular prayers; "every one that asketh receiveth," even the meanest saint that asks in faith; "this poor man cried, and the Lord heard him," Psa. xxxiv. 6. When we ask of God those things which Christ had just now directed us to ask, that his name may be sanctified, that his kingdom may come, and his will be done; in these requests we must be importunate, must "never hold our peace day or night;" we must "not keep silence, nor give God any rest, until he establish, until he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth," Isa. lxii. 6.

Fifthly. He gives us both instruction and encouragement in prayer, from the consideration of our relation to God as a Father. Here is,

1. An appeal to the bowels of earthly fathers: "Let any of you that 'is a father,' and knows the heart of a father, a father's affection to a child, and care for a child, tell me 'if his son ask bread' for his breakfast, 'will he give him a stone' to breakfast on? 'If he ask a fish' for his dinner, (when it may be it is a fish-day,) 'will he for a fish give him a serpent,' that will poison and sting him? Or 'if he shall ask an egg' for his supper, an egg and to bed, 'will he offer him a scorpion?' You know you could not be so unnatural to your own children," ver. 11, 12.

2. An application of this to the blessings of our heavenly Father, ver. 13: "If ye then, being evil," give and know how to "give good gifts to your children, much more shall God give you the Spirit;" he shall give "good things," so it is in Matthew. Observe,

1st. The direction he gives us, what to pray for; we must ask for the Holy Spirit, not only as necessary in order to our praying well, but as inclusive of all the good things we are to pray for; we need no more to make us happy, for the Spirit is the worker of spiritual life, and the earnest of eternal life. Note, The gift of the Holy Ghost is a gift we are every one of us concerned earnestly and constantly to pray for.

2nd. The encouragement he gives us to hope that we shall speed in this prayer; "your heavenly Father will give." It is in his power to give the Spirit; he has all good things to bestow, wrapped up in that one, but that is not all, it is in his promise; the gift of the Holy Ghost is in the covenant, Acts xxiii.; and it is here inferred from parents' readiness to supply their children's needs, and gratify their desires, when they are natural and proper. If the child ask for a serpent or a scorpion, the father in kindness denies him, but not if he asks for what is needful and will be nourishing. When God's children ask for the Spirit, they do in effect ask for bread, for the Spirit is the staff of life; nay, he is the author of the soul's life. If our earthly parents, though evil, be yet so kind; if they, though weak, be yet so knowing, that they not only give, but give with discretion, give what is best, in the best manner and time, much more shall your heavenly Father, who infinitely excels the fathers of our flesh both in wisdom and goodness, give you his Holy Spirit. If earthly parents are willing to lay out for the education of their children, to whom they design to leave their estates, much more will your heavenly Father give the spirit of sons to all those whom he has predestinated to the inheritance of sons.

xi. 4. The words "but deliver us from evil" are not found in the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS., and are omitted by some editors.

xi. 7. On the words "my children are with me in bed" Harmer observes that in the East it is usual among the poor for the whole family to sleep in one room, on separate beds or mattresses laid on the ground. But the expression may only mean, "my children as well as myself are in bed," or "I and my family have retired to rest." This we think is the correct explanation of the passage.

14 And he was casting out a devil, and it was dumb. And it came to pass, when the devil was gone out, the dumb spake; and the people wondered. 15 But some of them said, He casteth out devils through Beelzebub the chief of the devils. 16 And others, tempting him, sought of him a sign from heaven. 17 But he, knowing their thoughts, said unto them, Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and a house divided against a house falleth. 18 If Satan also be divided against himself, how shall his kingdom stand? because ye say that I cast out devils through Beelzebub. 19 And if I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your sons cast them out? therefore shall they be your judges. 20 But if I with the finger of God cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you. 21 When a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace: 22 But when a stronger than he shall come upon him, and overcome him, he taketh from him all his armour wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils. 23 He that is not with me is against me: and he that gathereth not with me scattereth. 24 When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest; and finding none, he saith, I will return unto my house whence I came out. 25 And when he cometh, he findeth it swept and garnished. 26 Then goeth he, and taketh to him seven other spirits more wicked than himself; and they enter in, and dwell there: and the last state of that man is worse than the first.

The substance of these verses we had Mat. xii. 22, and Christ is here giving a general proof of his Divine mission, by a particular proof of his power over Satan; his conquest of whom was an indication of his great design in coming into the world, which was to destroy the works of the devil; and an earnest of the success of that undertaking. He is here casting out a devil that made the poor possessed man dumb; in Matthew we are told he was blind and dumb; and when the devil was forced out by the word of Christ, the dumb spake immediately, echoed to Christ's word, and the lips were opened to shew forth his praise. Now,

I. Some were affected with this miracle: "the people wondered;" they admired the power of God, and specially that it should be exerted by the hand of one who made so small a figure, that one who did the work of the Messiah should have so little of that pomp of the Messiah they expected.

II. Others were offended at it, and to justify their infidelity, suggested that it was by virtue of a league with Beelzebub the prince of the devils that he did this, ver. 15. It seems in the devil's kingdom there are chiefs, which supposeth that there are subalterns. Now they would have it thought, or said at least, that there was a correspondence settled between Christ and the devil, that the devil should have the advantage in the main, and be victorious at last; but that in order hereto, in particular instances he should yield Christ the advantage, and retire by consent. And some, to corroborate this suggestion, and confront the evidence of Christ's miraculous power, challenged him to "give them a sign from heaven," ver. 16; to confirm his doctrine by some appearance in the clouds, such as was upon mount Sinai, when the law was given; as if "a sign from heaven," not disprovable by any sagacity of theirs, could not have been given them as well by a compact and collusion with "the prince of the power of the air, who works with power and lying wonders," as the casting out of a devil; nay that would not have been any present prejudice to his interest, which this manifestly was. Note, Obstinate infidelity will never be to seek for something to say in its own excuse, though never so frivolous and absurd. Now Christ here returns a full and direct answer to this cavil of theirs; in which he shews,

First, That it can by no means be imagined that such a subtle prince as Satan is, should ever give into measures that had such a direct tendency to his own overthrow, and the undermining of his own kingdom, ver. 17, 18. What they objected they kept to themselves, afraid to speak it, lest it should be answered and baffled; but Jesus knew their thoughts, even when they industriously sought to conceal them, and he said, "You yourselves cannot but see the groundlessness, and consequently the spitefulness of this charge; for it is an allowed maxim, confirmed by every day's experience, that no interest can stand that is divided against itself; not the more public interest of a kingdom; not the private interest of a house or family; if either the one or the other be divided against itself, it cannot stand. Satan would herein act against himself, not only by the miracle, which turned him out of possession of the bodies of people, but much more in the doctrine which the miracle was wrought for the explication and confirmation of, which had a direct tendency to the ruin of Satan's interest in the minds of men, by mortifying sin, and turning men to the service of God. Now if Satan should thus be divided against

xi. 14. This miracle is not parallel with that recorded in Matt. ix. 32-34, but rather with the one in Matt. xii. 22, &c.

xi. 15. For "Beelzebub," which signifies the "fly-god," the Greek text reads "Beelzeboul," which means the "dung-hill-god." The Syriac reads "Beelzebub." It is apparent from the context and other passages that the term "Beelzebub," or "Beelzeboul," was used by the Jews as a synonym for Satan.

xi. 19. Dr. Oosterzee says, "By the 'sons' of the Pharisees we can himself, he would hasten his own overthrow, which you cannot suppose an enemy to do, that acts so subtly for his own establishment, and is so solicitous to have his kingdom stand."

Secondly. That it was a very partial, ill-natured thing for them to impute that in him to a compact with Satan, which yet they applauded and admired in others, that were of their own nation, ver. 19: "By whom do your sons cast them out?" "Some of their own kindred as Jews, nay, and some of their own followers as Pharisees, have undertaken in the name of the God of Israel to cast out devils, and they were never charged with such a hellish combination as I am charged with." Note, It is gross hypocrisy to condemn that in those who reprove us which yet we allow of in those that flatter us.

Thirdly. That in opposing the conviction of this miracle, they were enemies to themselves, stood in their own light, and put a bar in their own door, for they thrust from them the kingdom of God, ver. 20: "If I with the finger of God cast out devils," as you may assure yourselves I do, "no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you;" the kingdom of the Messiah offers itself and all its advantages to you, and if you receive it not, it is at your peril. In Matthew it is "by the Spirit of God;" here, "by the finger of God;" the Spirit is "the arm of the Lord," Isa. liii. 1. His most great and mighty works were wrought by his Spirit; but if the Spirit in this work is said to be the finger of the Lord, which perhaps may intimate how easily Christ did and could conquer Satan, even with "the finger of God," the exerting of the Divine power in a less and lower degree than in many other instances, he needed not make bare his everlasting arm; that roaring lion, when he pleaseth, is crushed like a moth with the touch of a finger. Perhaps here is an allusion to the acknowledgment of Pharaoh's magicians, when they were run aground, Ex. viii. 19; "this is the finger of God." Now if the kingdom of God be herein come to you, and you be found by those cavils and blasphemies fighting against it, it will come upon you as a victorious force, which you cannot stand before.

Fourthly. That his casting out of devils was really the destroying of them and their power, for it confirmed a doctrine which had a direct tendency to the ruining of his kingdom, ver. 21, 22. Perhaps there had been some who had cast out the inferior devils by compact with Beelzebub their chief; but that was without any real damage or prejudice to Satan and his kingdom; what he lost one way he gained another. The devil and such exorcists played booty, as we say; and while the forlorn hope of his army gave ground, the main body thereby gained ground; the interest of Satan in the souls of men was not weakened by it in the least. But when Christ cast out devils, he needed not do it by any compact with them, for he was stronger than they, and could do it by force, and did it so as to ruin Satan's power, and blast his great design by a doctrine and grace that breaks the power of sin, and so routs Satan's main body, takes from him all his armour, and divides his spoils, which no one devil ever did to another, or ever will. Now this is applicable to Christ's victories over Satan, both in the world and in the hearts of particular persons, by that power which went along with the preaching of his Gospel, and doth still. And so we may observe here,

1. The miserable condition of an unconverted sinner. In his heart, which was fitted to be a habitation of God, the devil has his palace; and all the powers and faculties of the soul, being employed by him in the service of sin, are his goods. Note, 1st. The heart of every unconverted sinner is the devil's palace, where he resides, and where he rules; he "works in the children of disobedience." The heart is a palace, a noble dwelling; but the unsanctified heart is the devil's palace; his lusts are done, his interests are served, and the militia is in his hands; he usurps the throne in the soul. 2nd. The devil, as a strong man armed, keeps this palace, doth all he can to secure it to himself, and to fortify it against Christ. All the prejudices with which he hardens men's hearts against truth and holiness are the strongholds which he erects for the keeping of his palace; this palace is his garrison. 3rd. There is a kind of peace in the palace of an unconverted soul, while the devil as a strong man armed keepeth it.

The sinner hath a good opinion of himself, is very secure and merry, has no doubt concerning the goodness of his state, nor any dread of the judgment to come; he flatters himself in his own eyes, and cries peace to himself. Before Christ appeared all was quiet, because all went one way; but the preaching of the Gospel disturbed the peace of the devil's palace.

2. The wonderful change that is made in conversion, which is Christ's victory over this usurper. Satan is as a strong man armed; but our Lord Jesus is stronger than he, as God, as Mediator; "if we speak of strength, he is strong;" more are with us than against us. Observe, 1st. The manner of this victory. He comes upon him by surprise—when his goods are in peace, and the devil thinks it is all his own for ever—and overcomes him. Note. The conversion of a soul to God is Christ's victory over the devil and his power in that soul, restoring the soul to its liberty, and recovering his own interest in it, and dominion over it. 2nd. The evidences of this victory. First. "He taketh from him all his armour wherein he trusted." The devil is a confident adversary; he trusts to his armour, as Pharaoh to his rivers, Eze. xxxix. 3; but Christ disarms him. When the power of sin and corruption in the soul is broken, when the mistakes are rectified, the eyes opened, the heart humbled and changed, and made serious and spiritual, then Satan's armour is taken away. Secondly. He divideth the spoils: he takes possession of them for himself, all the endowments of mind or body, the estate, power, interest, which before were made use of in the service of sin and Satan, are now converted to Christ's service, and employed for him: yet that is not all; he makes a distribution of them among his followers, and, having conquered Satan, gives to all believers the benefit of that victory.

Now from hence he infers, that seeing the whole drift of his doctrine and miracles was to break the power of the devil, that great enemy of mankind, it was the duty of all to join with him, and to follow his conduct, to receive his Gospel, and come heartily into the interests of it, for otherwise they would justly be reckoned as siding with the enemy, ver. 23: "he that is not with me, is against me." Those therefore who rejected the doctrine of Christ, and slighted his miracles, were looked upon as adversaries to him, and in the devil's interest.

Fifthly. That there was a vast difference between the devil's going out by compact, and his being cast out by compulsion. Those out of whom Christ cast him he never entered into again; for so was Christ's charge, Mar. ix. 25; whereas if he had gone out whenever he saw fit, he would have made a re-entry; for that is the way of the unclean spirit when he voluntarily and with design goes out of a man, ver. 24–26; the prince of the devils may give leave, nay, may give order, to his forces to retreat or make a feint, to draw the poor deluded soul into an ambush; but Christ, as he gives a total, so he gives a final defeat to the enemy. And in this part of the argument he has a farther reach, which is to represent the state of those who have had fair offers made them, among whom, and in whom, God has begun to break the devil's power, and overthrow his kingdom; but they reject his counsel against themselves, and relapse into a state of subjection to Satan. Here we have,

1. The condition of a formal hypocrite; his bright side, and his dark side: his heart still remains the devil's house; he calls it his own, and he retains his interest in it; and yet, 1st. The unclean spirit is gone out; he was not driven out by the power of converting grace, there was none of that violence which the kingdom of heaven suffers; but he went out, withdrew for a time, so that the man seems not to be under the power of Satan, as formerly, nor so followed with his temptations; Satan is gone, or has turned himself into an angel of light. 2nd. The house is swept from common pollutions, by a forced confession of sin, as Pharaoh's; a feigned contrition for it, as Ahab's; and a partial reformation, as Herod's. There are those that have escaped the pollutions of the world, and yet are still under the power of the God of this world, 2 Pet. ii. 20: the house is swept, but it is not washed, and Christ has said, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me;" the house must be washed, or it is none of his. Sweeping takes off only the loose dirt, while the sin that besets the sinner, the beloved sin, is untouched; it is swept from the filth that lies open to the eye of the world, but it is not searched and ransacked for secret filthiness, Matt. xxiii. 25; it is swept, but the leprosy is in the wall, and will be, till something more be done. 3rd. The house is garnished with common gifts and graces: it is not furnished with any true grace, but garnished with the pictures of all graces; Simon Magus was garnished with faith, Balaam with good desires, Herod with a respect for John, the Pharisees with many external performances; it is garnished, but it is like a potsherd covered with silver dross, it is all paint and varnish, not real, not lasting. The house is garnished, but the property is not altered; it was never surrendered to Christ, nor inhabited by the Spirit. Let us therefore take heed of resting in that which a man may have, and yet come short.

2. Here is the condition of a final apostate, into whom the devil returns after he had gone out, ver. 26: "Then he goeth and taketh seven other spirits, more wicked than himself;" a certain number for an uncertain, as seven devils are said to be cast out of Mary Magdalene; seven wicked spirits are opposed to the seven spirits of God, Rev. iii. 1; these are said to be "more wicked than himself." It seems even devils are not all alike wicked; probably the degrees of their wickedness, now they are fallen, are as the degrees of their holiness were while they stood. When the devil would do mischief most effectually he employs those that are more mischievous than himself; these enter in without any difficulty or opposition; they are welcomed, and they dwell there where they work, there they rule; "and the last state of that man is worse than the first." Note, 1st. Hypocrisy is the high road to apostasy. If the heart remains in the interest of sin and Satan, the shows and shadows will come to nothing; those that have not set that right will not long be steadfast; where secret haunts of sin are kept up under the cloak of a visible profession, conscience is debauched, God is provoked to withdraw his restraining grace, and the close hypocrite commonly proves an open apostate. 2nd. The last state of such is worse than the first, in respect both of sin and punishment. Apostates are usually the worst of men, the most vain and profligate, the most bold and daring; their consciences are seared, and their sins, of all others, the most aggravated. God often sets marks of his displeasure upon them in this world, and in the other world they will receive the greater damnation. Let us therefore hear and fear, and hold fast our integrity.

27 And it came to pass, as he spake these things, a certain woman of the company lifted up her voice, and said unto him, Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked. 28 But he said, Yea rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it.

We had not this passage in the other evangelists; nor can we tack it, as Dr. Hammond does, to that of Christ's mother and brethren, desiring to speak with him; for this evangelist also had related that some time ago, ch. viii. 19; but it contains an interruption much like that, and, like that, occasion is taken from it for an instruction.

First. The applause which an affectionate, honest, well-meaning woman gave to our Lord Jesus, upon hearing his excellent discourses. While the scribes and Pharisees despised and blasphemed them, this good woman—and probably she was a person of some quality—admired them, and the wisdom and power with which he spake; ver. 27, "as he spake these things," with a convincing force and evidence, "a certain woman of the company" was so pleased to hear how he had confounded the Pharisees, and conquered them, and put them to shame, and cleared himself from their vile insinuations, that she could not forbear crying out, "Blessed is the womb that bare thee!" "What an admirable, what an excellent man is this; surely never was there greater or better born of a woman; happy the woman that hath him for her son. I should have thought myself very happy to be the mother of one that speaks as never man spake; that hath so much of the grace of heaven in him, and is so great a blessing to this earth." This was well said, as it expressed her high esteem of Christ, and that for the sake of his doctrine; and it was not amiss that it reflected honour upon the Virgin Mary his mother, for it agreed with what she herself had said, ch. i. 45, "all generations shall call me blessed;" some even of this generation, as bad as it was. Note, To all that believe the Word of Christ, the person of Christ is precious, and he is an honour, 1 Pet. ii. 7. Yet we must be careful lest, as this good woman, we too much magnify the honour of his natural kindred, and so know him after the flesh, whereas we must now henceforth know him so no more.

Secondly. The occasion which Christ took from thence to pronounce them more happy who are his faithful and obedient followers, than she was who bare and nursed him. He doth not deny what this woman said, nor refuse her respects to him and his mother, but leads her from this to that which was of a higher consideration, and which more concerned her: "Yea, rather blessed are they that hear the Word of God and keep it," ver. 28. He thinks them so; and his saying they are so, makes them so, and should make us of his mind. This is intended partly as a check to her, for doting so much upon his bodily presence and his human nature; partly as an encouragement to her to hope that she might be as happy as his own mother, whose happiness she was ready to envy, if she would hear the Word of God and keep it. Note, Though it is a great privilege to hear the Word of God, yet those only are truly blessed, that is, blessed of the Lord, that hear it and keep it; that keep it in memory, and keep to it as their way and rule.

29 And when the people were gathered thick together, he began to say, This is an evil generation: they seek a sign; and there shall no sign be given it, but the sign of Jonas the prophet. 30 For as Jonas was a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son understand none other than their spiritual sons, their disciples, the exorcists (compare Acts xix. 13). For want of sufficient information, it is difficult to come to a perfectly fair decision respecting this casting out of devils by the disciples of the Pharisees. He thinks the Jewish exorcists really did often succeed in expelling demons.

xi. 27, 28. This curious incident is recorded nowhere else. The woman pronounced the mother of Jesus blessed. The word for blessed conveys the sense of fortunate or happy. The reply of the Saviour does not deny this, but declares the obedient hearers of God's word rather blessed. The peculiar importance of the passage in our day is its implicit condemnation of Popish Mariolatry.

xi. 29. The Sinaitic text reads, "This generation is an evil generation; it seeketh a sign, and a sign shall not be given to it, except the sign of Jonas."

xi. 30. With the words of this verse it would be well to compare the corresponding passage in Matt. xiii. 40, 41.

of man be to this generation. 31 The queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with the men of this generation, and condemn them: for she came from the utmost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and, behold, a greater than Solomon is here. 32 The men of Nineve shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: for they repented at the preaching of Jonas; and, behold, a greater than Jonas is here.

NINEVEH.

33 No man, when he hath lighted a candle, putteth it in a secret place, neither under a bushel, but on a candlestick, that they which come in may see the light. 34 The light of the body is the eye: therefore when thine eye is single, thy whole body also is full of light; but when thine eye is evil, thy body also is full of darkness. 35 Take heed therefore that the light which is in thee be not darkness. 36 If thy whole body therefore be full of light, having no part dark, the whole shall be full of light, as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light.

Christ's discourse in these verses shews two things:

1. What is the sign we may expect from God for the confirmation of our faith. The great and most convincing proof of Christ's being sent of God, and which they were yet to wait for, after the many signs that had been given them, was the resurrection of Christ from the dead. Here is,

First. A reproof to the people for demanding other signs than what had already been given them in great plenty; ver. 29, "the people were gathered thick together," a vast crowd of them, expecting not so much to have their consciences informed by the doctrine of Christ, as to have their curiosity gratified by his miracles. And Christ knew what brought such a multitude together; they came seeking a sign, they came to gaze, to have something to talk of when they came home; and it is an evil generation which nothing will awaken and convince, no, not the most sensible demonstrations of Divine power and goodness.

Secondly. A promise that yet there should be one sign more given them, different from any that had yet been given them, even "the sign of Jonas the prophet," which in Matthew is explained as meaning the resurrection of Christ. As Jonas being cast into the sea, and lying there three days, and then coming up alive, and preaching repentance to the Ninevites, was a sign to them, upon which they turned from their evil way, so shall the death and resurrection of Christ, and the preaching of his Gospel immediately after to the Gentile world, be the last warning to the Jewish nation. If they be provoked to a holy jealousy by that, well and good; but if that do not work upon them, let them look for nothing else but utter ruin. "The Son of man shall be a sign to this generation," ver. 30; a sign, speaking to them, though a sign spoken against by them.

Thirdly. A warning to them to improve this sign, for it was at their peril if they did not.

1. The queen of Sheba would rise up in judgment against them, and condemn their unbelief, ver. 31. She was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, and yet so readily gave credit to the report she heard of the glories of a king of Israel, that notwithstanding the prejudices we are apt to conceive against foreigners, she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear his wisdom; not only to satisfy her curiosity, but to inform her mind, especially in the knowledge of the true God and his worship, which is upon record to her honour; "and behold a greater than Solomon is here;" ἄλειον Σολομῶντος, "more than a Solomon is here;" that is, saith Dr. Hammond, more of wisdom, and more heavenly Divine doctrine, than ever was in all Solomon's words or writings; and yet these wretched Jews will give no manner of regard to what Christ saith to them, though he be in the midst of them.

2. The Ninevites would rise up in judgment against them, and condemn their impenitency, ver. 32; "they repented at the preaching of Jonas," but here is preaching which far exceeds that of Jonas, is more powerful and awakening, and threatens a much sorer ruin than that of Nineve; and yet none are startled by it to turn from their evil way, as the Ninevites did.

11. He shews, what is the sign that God expects from us for the evidencing of our faith; and that is the serious practice of that religion which we profess to believe, and a readiness to entertain all Divine truths, when brought to us in their proper evidence. Now observe,

First. That they had the light, with all the advantage they could desire; for God having lighted the candle of the Gospel, did not put it in a secret place, or under a bushel,—Christ did not preach in corners. The apostles were ordered to preach the Gospel to every creature; and both in Christ and his ministers wisdom and her maidens cry in the chief places of concourse, ver. 33. It is a great privilege that the light of the Gospel is put on a candlestick, so that all that come in may see it, and may see by it where they are, and whither they are going; and what is the true, and sure, and only way to happiness.

Secondly. That having the light, their concern was to have the sight; or else to what purpose had they the light? Be the object never so clear, if the organ be not right, we are never the better; ver. 34, "the light of the body is the eye," which receives the light of the candle when it is brought into the room; so the light of the soul is the understanding and judgment, and its power of discerning between good and evil, truth and falsehood. Now according as this is, accordingly the light of Divine revelation is to us, and our benefit by it; accordingly it is a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death.

1. If this eye of the soul be single, if it see clear—see things as they are,—and judge impartially concerning them,—if it aim at truth only, and seek it for its own sake, and have not any sinister by-looks and intentions,—the whole body, that is the whole soul, is full of light; it receives and entertains the Gospel, which will bring along with it into the soul both knowledge and joy. This speaks the same thing with that of the good ground receiving the Word, and understanding it. If our understanding admit the Gospel in its full light, it fills the soul, and it has enough to fill it; and if the soul be thus filled with the light of the Gospel, "having no part dark,"—if all its powers and faculties be subjected to the government and influence of the Gospel, and none left unsanctified, then "the whole soul shall be full of light," full of holiness and comfort; it was darkness itself, but is now light in the Lord, "as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light," ver. 36. Note, The Gospel will come into those souls whose doors and windows are thrown open to receive it; and where it comes it will bring light with it. But,

2. If the eye of the soul be evil, if the judgment be bribed and biassed by the corrupt and vicious dispositions of the mind, by pride and envy, by the love of the world and sensual pleasures, if the understanding be prejudiced against Divine truths, and resolved not to admit them, though brought with never so convincing an evidence, it is no wonder that the whole body, the whole soul, is full of darkness, ver. 34. How can they have instruction, information, direction, or comfort from the Gospel that wilfully shut their eyes against it? and what hope is there of such, what remedy for them? The inference from hence therefore is, ver. 35, "Take heed that the light which is in thee be not darkness." Take heed that the eye of the mind be not blinded by partiality? and prejudice, and sinful aims. Be sincere in your inquiries after truth, and ready to receive it in the light and love and power of it; and not as the men of this generation whom Christ preached to, that never sincerely desired to know God's will, or designed to do it; and therefore no wonder they walked on in darkness, wandered endlessly, and perished eternally.

37 And as he spake, a certain Pharisee besought him to dine with him: and he went in, and sat down to meat. 38 And when the Pharisee saw it, he marvelled that he had not first washed before dinner. 39 And the Lord said unto him, Now do ye Pharisees make clean the outside of the cup and the platter; but your inward part is full of ravening and wickedness. 40 Ye fools, did not he that made that which is without make that which is within also? 41 But rather give alms of such things as ye have; and, behold, all things are clean unto you. 42 But woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye tithe mint and rue and all manner of herbs, and pass over judgment and the love of God: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone. 43 Woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye love the uppermost seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets. 44 Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are as graves which appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them. 45 Then answered one of the lawyers, and said unto him, Master, thus saying thou reproachest us also. 46 And he said, Woe unto you also, ye lawyers! for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers. 47 Woe unto you! for ye build the sepulchres of the prophets, and your fathers killed them

xi. 33. From the occurrence of substantially the same language in chap. viii. 16, we may infer that our Lord sometimes repeated his sayings, with such modifications and new applications as circumstances called for. This explains some of the cases in which we find utterances closely alike in different positions, so that Matthew, Mark, and Luke especially, seem sometimes not to agree when they really do not disagree.

xi. 37. Bishop Pearce and others have observed that the word for "dine" here signifies in the Greek the first meal of the day. The Jews were wont to take but two meals, properly so called—this one, which was at about mid-day, and supper in the evening.

xi. 38. In controversies on the mode of baptism it is noted that the word for "washed" here is literally "baptised." Hence it is argued that the word in itself may not mean immersion, especially as the Orientals were wont to wash their hands by having water poured upon them. On the other hand, it is argued that the word may mean

48 Truly ye bear witness that ye allow the deeds of your fathers: for they indeed killed them, and ye build their sepulchres. 49 Therefore also said the wisdom of God, I will send them prophets and apostles, and some of them they shall slay and persecute: 50 That the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world, may be required of this generation; 51 From the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, which perished between the altar and the temple: verily I say unto you, It shall be required of this generation. 52 Woe unto you, lawyers! for ye have taken away the key of knowledge: ye entered not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye hindered. 53 And as he said these things unto them, the scribes and the Pharisees began to urge him vehemently, and to provoke him to speak of many things: 54 Laying wait for him, and seeking to catch something out of his mouth, that they might accuse him.

Christ here saith many of those things to a Pharisee and his guests, in a private conversation at table, which he afterwards said in a public discourse in the temple, Mat. xxiii., for what he said in public and private was of a piece. He would not say that in a corner which he durst not repeat and stand to in the great congregation; nor would he give those reproofs to any sort of sinners in general, which he durst not apply to them in particular as he met with them, for he was and is the faithful witness. Here is,

First, Christ's going to dine with a Pharisee, that very civilly invited him to his house: ver. 37, "As he spake," even while he was speaking, "a certain Pharisee" interrupted him with a request to him to come and dine with him; to come forthwith, for it was dinner-time. We are willing to hope the Pharisee was so well pleased with his discourse, that he was willing to shew him respect, and desirous to have more of his company, and therefore gave him this invitation, and bid him truly welcome. And yet we have some cause to suspect that it was with an ill design to break off his discourse to the people, and to have an opportunity of ensnaring him, and getting something out of him which might serve for matter of accusation or reproach, ver. 53, 54. We know not the mind of this Pharisee; but whatever it was, Christ knew it. If he meant ill, he shall know Christ doth not fear him; if well, he shall know Christ is willing to do him good; so "he went in, and sat down to meat." Note, Christ's disciples must learn of him to be conversible, and not morose. Though we have need to be cautious what company we keep, yet we need not be rigid, nor must we therefore go out of the world.

Secondly, The offence which the Pharisee took at Christ, as those of that sort had sometimes done at the disciples of Christ, for not washing before dinner, ver. 38. He wondered that a man of his sanctity,—a prophet, a man of so much devotion, and such a strict conversation,—would sit down to meat and not first wash his hands, especially being newly come out of a mixed company, and there being in the Pharisee's dining-room, no doubt, all accommodations set ready for it, so that he need not fear being troublesome; and the Pharisee himself, and all his guests, no doubt, washing, so that he could not be singular;—what, and yet not wash? What harm had it been if he had washed? Was it not strictly commanded by the canons of their church? It was so, and therefore Christ would not do it, because he would witness against their assuming a power to impose that as a matter of religion which God commanded them not. The ceremonial law consisted in divers washings, but this was none of them, and therefore Christ would not practise it, no, not in complaisance to the Pharisee who invited him, nor though he knew that offence would be taken at his omitting it.

Thirdly, The sharp reproof which Christ upon this occasion gave to the Pharisees, without begging pardon even of the Pharisee whose guest he now was; for we must not flatter our best friends in any evil thing.

1. He reproves them for placing religion so much in those instances of it that are only external, and fall under the eye of man, while those were not only postponed, but quite expunged, which respect the soul, and fall under the eye of God, ver. 39, 40. Now observe here,

1st. The absurdity they were guilty of: "You Pharisees make clean the outside" only, you wash your hands with water, but do not wash your hearts from wickedness; those are full of covetousness and malice—covetousness of men's goods, and malice against good men. Those would never be reckoned cleanly servants that wash only the outside of the cup their master drinks out of, or the platter he eats out of, and take no care to make the inside clean, which immediately affects the meat and drink, and mingles it with it, if there be any filth. The frame and temper of the mind in every religious service is the inside of the cup and platter; the impurity of that affects the services; and therefore to keep ourselves free from scandalous enormities, and yet to live under the dominion of spiritual wickedness, is as great an affront to God, as it would be for a servant that gives the cup into his master's hand, clean wiped from all the dust on the outside, but within full of cobwebs and spiders. Ravening and wickedness, that is, reigning worldliness and reigning spitefulness, which men think they can find some cloak and cover for, are the dangerous, damning sins of many, who have made the outside of the cup clean from the more gross, and scandalous, and inexcusable sins of whoredom and drunkenness.

2nd. A particular instance of the absurdity of it: ver. 40, "Ye fools, did not he that made that which is without make that which is within also?" Did not that God, who in the law of Moses appointed divers ceremonial washings, with which you justify yourselves in these practices and impositions, appoint also that you should cleanse and purify your hearts? He who made laws for that which is without, did not he, even in those laws, farther intend something within? and by other laws shew how little he regarded the purifying of the flesh, and the putting away of the filth of that, if the heart be not made clean? Or it may have regard to God, not only as a lawgiver but (which the words seem rather to import) as a creator. Did not God, who made us these bodies, (and they are fearfully and wonderfully made,) make us these souls also, which are more fearfully and more wonderfully made? Now if he made both, he justly expects we should take care of both; and therefore not only wash the body, which he is the former of, and make the hands clean in honour of his work, but wash the spirit, which he is the Father of, and get the leprosy in the heart cleansed.

To this he subjoins a rule for making of our creature comforts clean to us: ver. 41. Instead of washing your hands before you go to meat, "give alms of such things as you have," τὰ εὐεργα, "of such things as are set before you," and present with you, let the poor have their share out of them, and then all things are clean to you, and you may use them comfortably. Here is a plain allusion to the law of Moses, by which it was provided that certain portions of the increase of their land should be given "to the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow;" and when that was done, what was reserved for their own use was clean to them, and they could in faith pray for a blessing upon it, Deut. xxvi. 12-15. Then we can with comfort enjoy the gifts of God's bounty ourselves, when we send portions to them for whom nothing is prepared, Neh. viii. 10. Job ate not his morsel alone, but the fatherless ate thereof, and so it was clean to him, Job xxxi. 17; clean, that is, permitted and allowed to be used, and then only it can be used comfortably. Note, What we have is not our own, unless God have his dues out of it; and it is by liberality to the poor that we clear up to ourselves our liberty to make use of our creature comforts.

2. He reproves them for laying stress upon trifles, and neglecting the weighty matters of the law, ver. 42. 1st. Those laws which related only to the means of religion they were very exact in the observance of, as particularly those concerning the maintenance of the priests: "Ye pay tithe of mint and rue, pay it in kind, and to the full, and will not put off the priests with a modus decimandi, or 'compound' for it; by this they could gain a reputation with the people as strict observers of the law, and would make an interest in the priests, in whose power it was many a time to do them a kindness; and no wonder if the priests and the Pharisees contrived how to strengthen one another's hands. Now Christ doth not condemn them for being so exact in paying tithes,—“these things ought ye to have done,”—but for thinking that that would atone for the neglect of their greater duties; for, 2nd. Those laws which relate to the essentials of religion they made nothing of; “ye pass over judgment and the love of God,” you make no conscience of giving men their dues and God your hearts.

3. He reproves them for their pride and vanity, and affectation of precedence, and praise of men: ver. 43, “ye love the uppermost seats in the synagogues,” or consistories, where the elders met for government: if you have not those seats, you are ambitious of them; if you have, you are proud of them; and ye love greetings in the markets, to be complimented by the people, and to have their cap and knee. It is not sitting uppermost, or being greeted, that is reproved, but loving it.

4. He reproves them for their hypocrisy, and their colouring over the wickedness of their hearts and lives with specious pretences: ver. 44, “ye are as graves” overgrown with grass, “which therefore appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them,” and so they contract the ceremonial pollution, which by the law arose from the touch of a grave. These Pharisees were within full of abominations, as a grave of putrefaction—full of covetousness, envy, and malice; and yet they concealed it so artfully with a profession of devotion, that it did not appear, so that they who conversed with them and followed their doctrine, were defiled with sin, infected with their corruptions and ill morals; and yet they, making a show of piety, suspected no danger by them. The contagion insinuated itself and was insensibly caught, and those that caught it thought themselves never the worse.

Fourthly, The testimony which he bore also against the lawyers or scribes, who made it their business to expound the law according to the tradition of the elders, as the Pharisees did to observe the law according to that tradition.

1. There was one of that profession who resented what he said against the Pharisees: ver. 45, “Master, thus saying thou reproachest us also,” for we are scribes; and are we therefore hypocrites? Note, It is a common thing for unhumiliated sinners to call and count reproofs reproaches. It is the wisdom of those that desire to have their sin mortified, to make a good use of reproaches that come from ill-will, and to turn them into reproofs; if we can, that way hear of our faults, and amend them, it is well; but it is the folly of those who are wedded to their sins, and resolved not to part with them, to make an ill use of the faithful and friendly admonitions given them, which come from love, and to have their passions provoked by them, as if they were intended for reproaches, and therefore fly in the face of their reprovers, and justify themselves in rejecting the reproof. Thus the prophet complained, Jer. vi. 10, “the word of the Lord is to them a reproach, they have no delight in it.” This lawyer espoused the Pharisee's cause, and so made himself partaker of his sins.

2. Our Lord Jesus thereupon took them to task: ver. 46, “Woe unto you also, ye lawyers!” and again, ver. 52, “Woe unto you, lawyers!” They blessed themselves in the reputation they had among the people, who thought them happy men because they studied the law, and were always conversant with that, and had the honour of instructing people in the knowledge of that; but Christ denounced woes against them, for he sees not as man sees. This was just upon him for taking the Pharisee's part, and quarrelling with Christ, because he reproved them. Note, Those who quarrel with the reproofs of others, and suspect them to be reproaches to them, do but get woes of their own by so doing.

1st. The lawyers are reproved for making the services of religion more burthensome to others, but more easy to themselves, than God had made them: ver. 45, “ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne,” by your traditions, which bind them out from many liberties God has allowed them, and bind them up to many slaveries which God never enjoined them, to shew your authority, and to keep people in awe; “but ye yourselves touch them not with one of your fingers;” that is,

First, You will not burthen yourselves with them, nor be yourselves bound by those restraints with which you hamper others. They would seem, by the hedges they pretended to make about the law, to be very strict for the observance of the law; but if you could see their practices, you would find not only that they make nothing of those hedges themselves, but make nothing of the law itself neither: thus the confessors of the Romish church are said to do with their penitents.

Secondly, You will not lighten them to those you have power over: “you will not touch them;” that is, either to repeal them, or to dispense with them, when you find them to be burthensome and grievous to the people. They would come in with both hands to dispense with a command of God, but not with a finger to mitigate the rigour of any of the traditions of the elders.

2nd. They are reproved for pretending a veneration for the memory of the prophets, whom their fathers killed, when yet they hated and persecuted those in their own day, who were sent to them on the same errand, to call them to repentance, and direct them to Christ, ver. 47—49.

First, These hypocrites, among other pretences of piety, built the sepulchres of the prophets; that is, they erected monuments over their graves, in honour immersion here, because the hands to which it refers may have been dipped in water.

xi. 42. The word for “rue” only occurs here in the New Testament. There are several species of the plant in Palestine, one at least being cultivated.

xi. 52. Dr. Tillotson says, “The metaphor of ‘key of knowledge’ is undoubtedly an allusion to the custom among the Jews in the admission of their doctors; for those to whom they gave authority to interpret the law and the prophets were solemnly admitted by giving them a key and a table-book.” So that by the “key of knowledge” is here meant the interpretation and understanding of the Scriptures.

xi. 53. Instead of “as he said these things unto them,” some of the best authorities have “when he had departed thence.”

xii. 5. This verse and the one before it correspond with Matt. x. 28, and show that God is the object proposed for our fear. In Matthew it is said he is able to destroy both soul and body in hell, of them, probably with large inscriptions, containing high encomiums of them; they were not so superstitious as to enshrine their relics, or to think their devotions the more acceptable to God for their being paid at the tombs of the martyrs; they did not burn incense or pray to them, or plead their merits with God; they did not add that iniquity to their hypocrisy; but, as if they owed themselves the children of the prophets, their heirs and executors, they repaired and beautified the monuments sacred to their pious memory.

Secondly. Notwithstanding this, they had an inveterate enmity to those in their own day that came to them in the spirit and power of those prophets; and though they had not yet had an opportunity of carrying it far, yet they would soon do it, for the wisdom of God said, that is, Christ himself would so order it, and did now foretell it, that they would slay and persecute the prophets and apostles that should be sent them. The wisdom of God would thus make trial of them, and discover their odious hypocrisy, by sending them prophets to reprove them for their sins, and warn them of the judgments of God. Those prophets should prove themselves apostles or messengers sent from heaven by signs and wonders, and gifts of the Holy Ghost; or, I will send them prophets under the style and title of apostles, who yet shall produce as good an authority as any of the old prophets did; and those they shall not only contradict and oppose, but slay and persecute, and put to death. Christ foresaw this, and yet did not otherwise than as became the wisdom of God in sending them; for he knew how to bring glory to himself in the issue, by the recompences reserved both for the persecutors and the persecuted in the future state.

Thirdly. That therefore God will justly put another construction upon their building the tombs of the prophets than what they would be thought to intend, and it shall be interpreted, their allowing the deeds of their fathers, ver. 48; for since by their present actions it appeared they had no true value for their prophets, their building their sepulchres shall have this sense put upon it, that they resolved to keep them in their graves whom their fathers had hurried thither. Josiah, that had a real value for prophets, thought it enough not to disturb the grave of the man of God at Beth-el, "Let no man move his bones," 2 Kin. xxiii. 17, 18. If these lawyers will carry the matter farther, and will build their sepulchres, it is such a piece of overdoing as gives cause to suspect an ill design in it, and that it is meant as a cover for some design against prophecy itself, like the kiss of a traitor, as "he that blesseth his friend with a loud voice, rising early in the morning, it shall be counted a curse to him," Pr. xxvii. 14.

Fourthly. That they must expect no other but to be reckoned with as the fillers-up of the measure of persecution, ver. 50, 51. They keep up the trade, as it were, in succession, and therefore are responsible for the debts of the company, even those it has been contracting all along, from the blood of Abel, when the world began, to that of Zacharias, and so forward to the end of the Jewish state, it shall all be required of this generation, this last generation of the Jews, whose sin in persecuting Christ's apostles would exceed any of the sins of that kind that their fathers were guilty of, and so would bring wrath upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thes. ii. 15, 16; and their destruction by the Romans was so terrible as might well be reckoned the completing of God's vengeance upon that persecuting nation.

3rd. They are reprov'd for opposing the Gospel of Christ, and doing all they could to obstruct the progress and success of it, ver. 52.

First. They had not, according to the duty of their place, faithfully expounded to the people those Scriptures of the Old Testament which pointed at the Messiah, which, if they had been led into the right understanding of by the lawyers, they would readily have embraced him and his doctrine; but instead of that, they had perverted those texts, and had cast a mist before the eyes of the people, by their corrupt glosses upon them, and this is called the taking away the key of knowledge; instead of using that key for the people, and helping them to use it aright, they hid it from them; this is called in Matthew shutting up the kingdom of God against men, Mat. xxiii. 13. Note. Those who take away the key of knowledge shut up the kingdom of heaven.

Secondly. They themselves did not embrace the Gospel of Christ, though, by their acquaintance with the Old Testament, they could not but know that the time was fulfilled, and the kingdom of God was at hand; they saw the prophecies accomplished in that kingdom which our Lord Jesus was about to set up, and yet would not themselves enter into it. Nay, Thirdly. Them that without any conduct or assistance of theirs were entering in they did all they could to hinder and discourage, by threatening to cast them out of the synagogue, and otherwise terrifying them. It is bad for people to be averse to revelation, but much worse to be adverse to it.

Lastly. In the close of the chapter we are told how spitefully and maliciously the Scribes and Pharisees contrived to draw him into a snare, ver. 53, 54. They could not bear those cutting reproofs which they must own to be just; but since what he had said against them in particular would not bear an action, nor could they ground upon it any criminal accusation, and therefore, as if, because his reproofs were warm, they hoped to stir him up to some intemperate heat and passion, so as to put him off his guard, they "began to urge him vehemently," to be very fierce upon him, and to "provoke him to speak of many things"—to propose dangerous questions to him, laying wait for something which might serve the design they had, of making him either odious to the people or obnoxious to the government, or both. Thus did they seek occasion against him, like David's enemies, that did every day wrest his words, Ps. lvi. 5. "Evil men dig up mischief." Note. Faithful reprovers of sin must expect to have many dig up mischief. The prophet complains of those in his time who "make a man an offender for a word, and lay a snare for him that reproveth in the gate," Isa. xlii. 21. That we may bear trials of this kind with patience, and get through them with prudence, let us "consider him who endured such contradiction of sinners against himself."

CHAPTER XII.

In this chapter we have divers excellent discourses of our Saviour's upon various occasions, many of which are to the same purpose with what we had in Matthew upon other the like occasions; for we suppose our Lord Jesus preached the same doctrines, and pressed the same duties at several times, in several companies; and one of the evangelists took them as he delivered them at one time, and another at another time; and we need thus to have precept upon precept, line upon line. Here, I. Christ warns his disciples to take heed of hypocrisy, and of cowardice, in profane Christianity and preaching the Gospel, ver. 1—12. II. He gives a caution against covetousness, upon occasion of a covetous motion made to him, and illustrates that caution by a parable of a rich man suddenly cut off by death in the midst of his worldly projects and hopes, ver. 13—21. III. He encourageth his disciples to cast all their care upon God, and to live easy in a dependence upon his providence, and exhorteth them to make religion their main business, ver. 22—34. IV. He stirr'd them up to watchfulness for their Master's coming, from the consideration of the reward of those who are then found faithful, and the punishment of them who are found unfaithful, ver. 35—48. V. He bids them expect trouble and persecution, ver. 49—53. VI. He warns the people to observe and improve the day of their opportunities, and to make their peace with God in time, ver. 54—59.

which can only mean perdition after resurrection. Here, however the power is that of one who can kill and afterwards consign to hell. Both passages set forth the prerogative of God to punish in a future state of being. As Jortin says, "From his power even the grave cannot shelter us, and he can make death not the end but the beginning of woe."

xii. 11. "Take ye no thought," here as elsewhere, where a similar locution is found, signifies "be not anxious," "do not be troubled in

N the mean time, when there were gathered together an innumerable multitude of people, insomuch that they trode one upon another he began to say unto his disciples first of all, Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy. 2 For there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; neither hid, that shall not be known. 3 Therefore whatsoever ye have spoken in darkness shall be heard in the light; and that which ye have spoken in the ear in closets shall be proclaimed upon the housetops. 4 And I say unto you my friends, Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do. 5 But I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear: Fear him, which after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, Fear him. 6 Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God? 7 But even the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear not therefore: ye are of more value than many sparrows. 8 Also I say unto you, Whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of man also confess before the angels of God: 9 But he that denieth me before men shall be denied before the angels of God. 10 And whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but unto him that blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost it shall not be forgiven. 11 And when they bring you unto the synagogues, and unto magistrates, and powers, take ye no thought how or what thing ye shall answer, or what ye shall say: 12 For the Holy Ghost shall teach you in the same hour what ye ought to say.

We find here, I. A vast auditory that was got together to hear Christ preach. The scribes and Pharisees sought to accuse him, and do him mischief; but the people that were not under the bias of their prejudices and jealousies still admired him, attended on him, and did him honour; ver. 1, "In the mean time," while he was in the Pharisee's house, contending with them that sought to ensnare him, the people got together for an afternoon sermon—a sermon after dinner with a Pharisee; and he would not disappoint them. Though in the morning sermon, when they "were gathered thick together," ch. xi. 29, he had severely reprov'd them as "an evil generation that seek a sign," yet they renewed their attendance on him; so much better could the people bear their reproofs than the Pharisees theirs. The more the Pharisees strove to drive the people from Christ, the more flocking there was to him. Here was an "innumerable multitude of people gathered together, so that they trode one upon another," in labouring to get foremost, and to come within hearing. It is a good sight to see people thus forward to hear the word, and venture upon inconvenience and danger rather than miss an opportunity for their souls. "Who are these that thus fly like the doves to their windows?" Isa. lx. 8. When the net is cast where there is such a multitude of fish, it may be hoped that some will be enclosed.

11. The instructions which he gave his followers in the hearing of this auditory.

First. He began with a caution against hypocrisy. This he said "to his disciples first of all;" either to the twelve, or to the seventy. These were his more peculiar charge, his family, his school; and therefore he particularly warned them, as his beloved sons. They made more a profession of religion than others, and hypocrisy in that was the sin they were most in danger of. They were to preach to others, and if they pervert, corrupt the word, and deal deceitfully, hypocrisy would be worse in them than in others. And besides, there was a Judas among them, that was an hypocrite; and Christ knew it, and would hereby startle him, or leave him inexcusable. Christ's disciples were, for aught we know, the best men then in the world, yet need to be cautioned against hypocrisy. Christ said this to the disciples in the hearing of this great multitude, rather than privately when he had them by themselves, to add the greater weight to the caution, and to let the world know that he would not countenance hypocrisy, no, not in his own disciples. Now observe,

1. The description of that sin which he warns them against; it is "the leaven mind as to how or what you shall answer." There is nothing to forbid previous reflection and consideration, much to commend calmness and prudence. The Christian apologist was not to distress his soul before appearing in the presence of persecuting judges, for he would be divinely helped.

xii. 15. There is very little doubt that we should here read "beware of all covetousness," which is supported by the highest authorities. The conclusion of the verse is not very clear in the of the Pharisees." 1st. It is "leaven," it is spreading as leaven, insinuates itself into the whole man, and all that it doth; it is swelling and souring as leaven, for it puffs men up with pride, and embitters them with malice, and makes their service unacceptable to God. 2nd. It is "the leaven of the Pharisees," that is, it is the sin they are most of them found in. Take heed of imitating them; be not you of their spirit; do not you disseminate in Christianity, as they do in Judaism; make not your religion a cloak of maliciousness, as they do theirs.

2. A good reason against it, ver. 2, 3: "For there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed." It is to no purpose to dissemble, for sooner or later truth will come out; and "a lying tongue is but for a moment." If you speak in darkness that which is unbecoming you, and is inconsistent with your public professions, it "shall be heard in the light," somehow or other it will be discovered, "a bird of the air shall carry the voice," Ecc. x. 20; and your folly and falsehood will be made manifest. The iniquity that is concealed with a show of piety will be discovered, perhaps in this world, as Judas' was, and Simon Magus'; however in the great day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be made manifest, Ecc. xii. 14; Rom. ii. 16. If men's religion prevail not to conquer and cure the wickedness of their hearts, it shall not always serve for a cloak; the day is coming when hypocrites will be stripped of their fig leaves.

Secondly. To this he added a charge to them, to be faithful to the trust reposed in them, and not to betray it through cowardice or base fear. Some make ver. 2, 3 to be a caution to them not to conceal those things which they had been instructed in, and were employed to publish to the world. Whether men will hear, or whether they will forbear, tell them the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; what has been spoken to you, and you have talked of among yourselves privately and in corners, that do you preach publicly, whoever is offended; for if you please men you are not Christ's servants, nor can you please him, Gal. i. 10. But this was not the worst of it; it was likely to be a suffering cause, though never a sinking one; let them therefore arm themselves with courage, and divers arguments here are to steel them with a holy resolution in their work. Consider,

1. The power of your enemies is a limited power, ver. 4: "I say unto you, my friends." Christ's disciples are his friends, he calls them friends, and gives them this friendly advice, "Be not afraid;" do not disquiet yourselves with tormenting fears of the power and rage of men. Note, Those whom Christ owns for his friends need not be afraid of any enemies. "Be not afraid," no, not "of them that kill the body;" let it not be in the power, not only not of scoffers, but not of murderers, to drive you off from your work; for you, that have learned to triumph over death, may say even of them, Let them do their worst; "after that there is no more that they can do;" the immortal soul lives and is happy, and enjoys itself and its God, and sets them all at defiance. Note, Those can do Christ's disciples no real harm, and therefore ought not to be dreaded, who can but kill the body, for they only send that to its rest, and the soul to its joy the sooner.

2. God is to be feared more than the most powerful men, ver. 5: "I will forewarn you whom you shall fear;" that you may fear man less, fear God more. Moses conquers his fear of the wrath of the king, by having an eye to him that is invisible. By owning Christ you may incur the wrath of men, which can reach no farther than to put you to death, and without God's permission they cannot do that; but by denying Christ, and disowning him, you will incur the wrath of God, which has power to send you to hell, and there is no resisting it. Now of two evils the least is to be chosen, and the greatest to be dreaded; and therefore, "I say unto you, Fear him." 'Tis true, said that blessed martyr, Bishop Hooper, 'life is sweet, and death bitter; but eternal life is more sweet, and eternal death more bitter.'

3. The lives of good Christians and good ministers are the particular care of the Divine providence, ver. 6, 7. To encourage us in times of difficulty and danger, we must have recourse to our first principles, and build upon them. Now a firm belief of the doctrine of God's universal providence, and the extent of it, would be satisfying to us, when at any time we are in peril, and encourage us to trust God in the way of duty. 1st. Providence takes cognizance of the meanest creatures, even of the sparrows. Though they are of such small account, that five of them are sold for two farthings, yet not one of them is forgotten of God, but is provided for, and notice is taken of its death. Now, "ye are of more value than many sparrows," and therefore you may be sure you are not forgotten, though imprisoned, though banished, though forgotten by your friends; much more "precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of saints" than the death of sparrows. 2nd. Providence takes cognizance of the meanest interest of the disciples of Christ, ver. 7; even "the very hairs of your head are all numbered," much more are your sighs and tears numbered, and the drops of your blood you shed for Christ's name's sake. An account is kept of all your losses, that they may be, and without doubt they shall be, recompensed unspeakably to your advantage.

4. You will be owned or disowned by Christ in the great day, according as you now own or disown him, ver. 8, 9. 1st. To engage us to confess Christ before men, whatever we may lose or suffer for our constancy to him, and how dear soever it may cost us, we are assured that they who confess Christ now, shall be owned by him in the great day "before the angels of God," to their everlasting comfort and honour. Jesus Christ will confess, not only that he suffered for them, and they are to have the benefit of his sufferings, but that they suffered for him; and his kingdom and interest on earth was advanced by their sufferings; and what greater honour can be done them? 2nd. To deter us from denying Christ, and a cowardly deserting of his truths and ways, we are here assured that those who deny Christ, and treacherously depart from him, whatever they may save by it, though it were life itself, and whatever they may gain by it, though it were a kingdom, will be vast losers at last, for they shall be "denied before the angels of God;" Christ will not know them, will not own them, will not shew them any favour, which will turn to their everlasting terror and contempt. By the stress here laid upon their being confessed or denied before the angels of God, it should seem to be a considerable part of the happiness of glorified saints, that they will not only stand right, but stand high, in the esteem of the holy angels; they will love them, and honour them, and own them; if they be Christ's servants, they are their fellow-servants, and they will take them for their companions; and on the contrary, a considerable part of the misery of damned sinners will be, that the holy angels will abandon them, and will be the pleased witnesses, not only of their disgrace, as here, but of their misery, for they shall be "tormented in the presence of the holy angels," Rev. xiv. 10, who will give them no relief.

5. The errand they were shortly to be sent out upon, was of the highest and last importance to the children of men, to whom they were sent, ver. 10. Let them be bold in preaching the Gospel, for a sorer and heavier doom would attend those that rejected them, after the Spirit was poured out upon them, which was to be the last method of conviction, than those that now rejected Christ himself and opposed him. "Greater works than these shall ye do," and consequently greater will be the punishment of those that blaspheme the gifts and operations of the Holy Ghost in you. "Whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man," that shall stumble at the meanness of his appearance, and speak slightly and spitefully of him, it is capable of some excuse; "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do;" "out unto him that blasphemeth the Holy Ghost," that blasphemeth the Christian doctrine, and maliciously opposeth it after the pouring out of the Spirit, and his attestation of Christ's being glorified, (Acts ii. 33; v. 32): the privilege of the forgiveness of sin shall be denied; he shall have no benefit by Christ and his Gospel; you may shake off the dust of your feet against those that do so, and give them over as incurable; they have forfeited that repentance and remission which Christ was exalted to give, and which you are commissioned to preach. The sin, no doubt, was the more daring, and consequently the case the more desperate, during the continuance of the extraordinary gifts and operations of the Spirit in the church, which were intended for a sign to them who believed not 1 Cor. xiv. 22. Those who, though they were not convinced by them at first, yet admired them, there were hopes of, but those who blasphemed them were given over.

6. Whatever trials they should be called out to, they should be sufficiently furnished for them, and honourably brought through them, ver. 11, 12. The faithful martyr for Christ has not only sufferings to undergo, but a testimony to bear, a good confession to witness, and is concerned to do that well, so as that the cause of Christ may not suffer, though he suffer for it; and if this be his care, let him cast it upon God: "when they bring you unto the synagogues," before church rulers, before the Jewish courts, or before "magistrates and powers," Gentile rulers, rulers in the state, to be examined about your doctrine what it is, and what the proof of it, "take no thought what ye shall answer," 1st. That you may save yourselves; do not study by what art or rhetoric to mollify your judges, or by what tricks in law to bring yourselves off; if it be the will of God that you should come off, and your time is not yet come, he will bring it about effectually. 2nd. That you may serve your Master; aim at this, but do not perplex yourselves about it, "for the Holy Ghost," as a spirit of wisdom, "shall teach you what ye ought to say," and how to say it, so as it may be for the honour of God and his cause.

13 And one of the company said unto him, Master, speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me. 14 And he said unto him, Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you? 15 And he said unto them, Take heed, and beware of covetousness: for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. 16 And he spake a parable unto them, saying, The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: 17 And he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? 18 And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. 19 And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. 20 But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? 21 So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God.

We have in these verses,

First. The application that was made to Christ, very unseasonably, by one of his hearers, desiring him to interpose between him and his brother, in a matter that concerned the estate of the family, ver. 9: "Master, speak to my brother;" speak as a prophet, speak as a king, speak with authority; he is one that will have a regard to what thou sayest; speak to him, "that he divide the inheritance with me." Now,

1. Some think his brother did him wrong, and he appeals to Christ to right him, because he knew the law was costly. His brother was such a one as the Jews called Ben-hamtan,—"a son of violence," that took not only his own part of the estate but his brother's too, and forcibly detained it from him. Such brethren there are in the world, that have no sense at all either of natural equity or natural affection; who make a prey of those whom they ought to patronize and protect. They who are so wronged have a God to go to, who will execute judgment and justice for those that are oppressed.

2. Others think he had a mind to do his brother wrong, and would have Christ to assist him; that whereas the law gave the elder brother a double portion of the estate, and the father himself could not dispose of what he had but by that rule, Deu. xxi. 16, 17; he would have Christ to alter that law, and to oblige his brother, who perhaps was a follower of Christ at large, to divide the inheritance equally with him in gavel-kind, share and share like, and to allot him as much as his elder brother. I suspect that this was the case, because Christ takes occasion from it to warn against covetousness, κακωφιλία; a desire of having more, more than God in his providence has allotted us. It was not a lawful desire of getting his own, but a sinful desire of getting more than his own.

Secondly. Christ's refusal to interpose in this matter, ver. 14: "Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you?" In matters of this nature Christ would not assume either a legislative power to alter the settled rule of inheritances, or a judicial power to determine controversies concerning them. He could have done the judge's part, and the lawyer's, as well as he did the physician's, and have ended suits at law as happily as he did diseases, but he would not, for it was not in his commission: "Who made me a judge?" Probably he refers to the indignity done to Moses by his brethren in Egypt, which Stephen upbraided the Jews with, Acts vii. 27, 35. "If I should offer to do this you would taunt me as you did Moses. Who made thee a judge or a divider?"

Greek, and cannot be rendered with literal exactness. The sense appears to be that a man's life does not consist in or depend on what he possesses, even when he has abundance; what life is worth having for is independent of wealth.

xii. 18. The commentators compare with this passage one in the Apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus (ii. 18, 19): "There is that waxeth rich by his wariness and pinching, and this is the portion of his reward: Whereas he saith, I have found rest, and now will eat continually of my goods; and knoweth not what time shall come upon him, and that he must leave those things to others and die." As the resemblance is after all only casual, and does not extend to the whole of the parable, we need not infer with some that Jesus referred to the Apocrypha. There is a partial coincidence of thought and of figure, which probably corresponds with popular ideas and expression then current. On the mention of "barns," Dr. Kitto says, "It shows quite clearly that the Jews of this time had granaries as

He corrects the man's mistake, will not admit his appeal, (it was coram non iudice—not before the proper judge,) and so dismisseth his bill. If he had come to him to desire him to assist his pursuits of the heavenly inheritance, Christ would have given him his best help; but as to this matter he has nothing to do: "Who made me a judge?" Note, Jesus Christ was no usurper, he took no honour, no power to himself, but what was given him, Heb. v. 5. Whatever he did, he could tell by what authority he did it, and who gave him that authority.

Now this shews us what is the nature and constitution of Christ's kingdom; it is a spiritual kingdom, and not of this world. 1. It doth not interfere with civil powers, nor take the authority of princes out of their hands. Christianity leaves the matter as it found it as to civil power. 2. It doth not intermeddle with civil rights; it obligeth all to do justly, according to the settled rules of equity, but dominion is not founded in grace. 3. It doth not encourage our expectations of worldly advantages by our religion. If this man will be a disciple of Christ, and expects that in consideration of that Christ should give him his brother's estate, he is mistaken; the rewards of Christ's disciples are of another nature. 4. It doth not encourage our contests with our brethren, and our being rigorous and high in our demands, but rather for peace' sake to recede from our right. 5. It doth not allow ministers to entangle themselves in the affairs of this life, 2 Tim. iii. 4, to "leave the Word of God to serve tables." There are those whose business it is, let it be left to them: tractant fabrilis fabri—each workman to his proper craft.

Thirdly, The necessary caution which Christ took occasion from hence to give to his hearers. Though he came not to be a divider of men's estates, he came to be a director of their consciences about them, and would have all take heed of harbouring that corrupt principle which they saw to be in others the root of so much evil. Here is,

1. The caution itself, ver. 15: "Take heed and beware of covetousness;" ἐπιμενετε, 'observe yourselves, keep a jealous eye upon your own hearts, lest covetous principles steal into them; and φυλάσσετε, 'preserve yourselves, keep a strict hand upon your own hearts, lest covetous principles rule and give law in them. Covetousness is a sin which we have need constantly to watch against, and therefore frequently to be warned against.

2. The reason of it, or an argument to enforce this caution: "for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth;" that is, our happiness and comfort doth not depend upon our having a great deal of this world. 1st. The life of the soul to be sure doth not depend upon it, and the soul is the man. The things of the world will not suit the nature of a soul, nor supply its needs, nor satisfy its desires, nor last so long as it will last. Nay, 2nd. Even the life of the body, and the happiness of that, doth not consist in an abundance of these things; for many live very contentedly and easily, and get through the world very comfortably, that have but little of the wealth of it: "a dinner of herbs, with holy love," is better than a feast of fat things." And on the other hand, many live very miserably, that have a great deal of the things of this world; they possess abundance, and yet have no comfort of it: they bereave their souls of good, Ecccl. iv. 8. Many that have abundance are discontented and fretting, as Ahab and Haman; and then what good doth their abundance to them?

3. The illustration of this by a parable; the sum of which is to shew the folly of carnal worldlings while they live, and their misery when they die; which is intended not only for a check to that man who came to Christ with an address about his estate, while he was in no care about his soul and another world, but for the enforcing of that necessary caution to us all, to "take heed of covetousness." The parable gives us the life and death of a rich man, and leaves us to judge whether he was a happy man.

1st. Here is an account of his worldly wealth and abundance, ver. 16: "The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully," καρπάζει, regio. He had a whole country to himself, a lordship of his own; he was a little prince. Observe, His wealth lay much in the fruits of the earth, for "the king himself is served of the field," Ecccl. i. 9. He had a great deal of ground, and his ground was fruitful; much would have more, and he had more. Note, The fruitfulness of the earth is a great blessing, but it is a blessing which God often gives plentifully to wicked men, to whom it is a snare, that they may not think to judge of his love or hatred by what is before us.

2nd. Here are the workings of his heart in the midst of this abundance. We are here told what "he thought within himself," ver. 17. Note, The God of heaven knows and observes whatever we think within ourselves, and we are accountable to him for it; he is both a discerner and judge of the thoughts and intents of the heart. We mistake if we imagine thoughts are hid, and thoughts are free. Let us here observe,

First. What his cares and concerns were. When he saw an extraordinary crop upon his ground, instead of thanking God for it, or rejoicing in the opportunity it would give him of doing the more good, he afflicts himself with this thought, "What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits?" He speaks as one at a loss, and full of perplexity. "What shall I do now?" The poorest beggar in the country, that did not know where to have a meal's meat, could not have said a more anxious word. Disquieting care is the common fruit of an abundance of this world, and the common fault of those that have abundance. The more men have, the more perplexity they have with it, and the more solicitous they are to keep what they have, and to add to it, how to spare, and how to spend; so that even the abundance of the rich will not suffer them to sleep, for thinking what they shall do with what they have, and how they shall dispose of it. The rich man seems to speak it with a sigh, "what shall I do?" And if you ask, Why, what is the matter? truly he has abundance of wealth, and wants a place to put it in; that is all.

Secondly. What his projects and purposes were, which were the result of his cares, and were indeed absurd and foolish like them; ver. 18, "This will I do," and it is the wisest course I can take, "I will pull down my barns," for they are too little, "and I will build greater, and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods," and then I shall be at ease. Now here, 1st. It was folly for him to call the fruits of his ground, his fruits, and his goods; he seems to lay a pleasing emphasis upon that, "my fruits, and my goods," whereas what we have is but lent us for our use, the property is still in God; we are but stewards of our Lord's goods, tenants at will of our Lord's land. It is my corn, saith God, and my wine, Hos. ii. 8, 9. 2nd. It was folly for him to hoard up what he had, and then to think it well bestowed. There will I bestow it all; as if none must be bestowed upon the poor, none upon his family, none upon the Levite and the stranger, the fatherless and the widow, but all in the great barn. 3rd. It was folly for him to let his mind rise with his condition; when his ground brought forth more plentifully than usual, then to talk of bigger barns, as if the next year must needs be as fruitful as this, and much more abundant; whereas the barn might be as much too big the next year as it was too little this. Years of famine commonly follow years of plenty, as they did in Egypt; and therefore he had better to have stacked some of his corn this once. 4th. It was folly for him to think to ease his care by building new barns, for the building of them would but increase his care; those know that, who know any thing of the spirit of building. The way that God prescribes for the cure of inordinate care is certainly successful, but the way of the world doth but increase it. And besides, when he had done this, there were other cares would still attend him; the greater the barns, still the greater the cares, Ecccl. v. 10. 5th. It was folly for him to contrive and resolve all this absolutely, and without reserve. "This I will do, I will pull down my barns, and I will build greater," yea, that I will,—without so much as that necessary proviso, "If the Lord will, I shall live," Jas. iv. 13, 14. Peremptory projects are foolish projects, for our times are in God's hand, and not in our own; and we do not so much as "know what shall be on the morrow."

Thirdly. What his pleasing hopes and expectations were, when he had made good those projects: then "I will say to my soul," upon the credit of this security, whether God say it or no, "Soul," mark what I say, "thou hast much goods laid up for many years," in these barns, now "take thine ease," enjoy thyself, "eat, drink, and be merry," ver. 19; and here also appears his folly, as much in the enjoyment of his wealth as in the pursuit of it. 1st. It was folly for him to put off his comfort in his abundance till he had compassed his projects concerning it. When he has built bigger barns and filled them, which will be a work of time, then he will take his ease; and might he not as well have done that now? Grotius here quotes the story of Pyrrhus, that was projecting to make himself master of Sicily, Africa, and other places, in the prosecution of his victories. "Well," saith his friend Cineas, "and what must we do then?" Postea vivemus, saith he, "Then we shall live," At hoc jam licet, saith Cineas, "We may live now, if we please." 2nd. It was folly for him to be confident that his goods were "laid up for many years;" as if his bigger barns would be safer than those he had; whereas in an hour's time they might be burnt to the ground, perhaps by lightning, which there is no defence against, and all that was laid up in them. A few years may make a great change: moth and rust may corrupt, or thieves break through and steal. 3rd. It was folly for him to count upon certain ease, when he had laid up abundance of the wealth of this world; whereas there are many things that may make people uneasy in the midst of their greatest abundance; one dead fly may spoil a whole pot of precious ointment; and one thorn a whole bed of down. Pain and sickness of body, disagreeableness of relations, and especially a guilty conscience, may rob a man of his ease that has never so much of the wealth of this world. 4th. It was folly for him to think of making no other use of his plenty, but to eat and drink and to be merry; to indulge the flesh, and gratify the sensual appetite, without any thought of doing good to others, and being put thereby into a better capacity of serving God and his generation; as if we did live to eat, and not eat to live, and the happiness of man consisted in nothing else but in having all the gratifications of sense wound up to the height of pleasurable. 5th. It was the greatest folly of all to say all this to his soul. If he had said, "Body, take thine ease, for thou hast goods laid up for many years," there had been sense in it; but the soul, considered as an immortal spirit, separable from the body, was no way interested in a barn full of corn, or a bag full of gold. If he had had the soul of a swine, he might have blessed it with the satisfaction of eating and drinking; but what is this to the soul of a man, that has exigencies and desires which these things will be no ways suited to? It is the great absurdity which the children of this world are guilty of, that they portion their souls in the wealth of the world and the pleasures of sense.

3rd. Here is God's sentence upon all this; and we are sure that his judgment is according to truth. He said to himself, said to his soul, "Take thine ease;" and if God had said so too, the man had been happy, as his Spirit witnesseth with the spirit of believers, to make them easy; but God said quite otherwise; and by his judgment of us we must stand or fall, not by ours of ourselves, 2 Cor. x. His neighbours blessed him, Ps. x. 3; praised him, as doing well for himself, Ps. xlix. 18; but God said he did ill for himself, "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee," ver. 20. "God said to him," that is, decreed this concerning him, and let him know it, either by his conscience or by some awakening providence, or rather by both together. This was said when he was in the fulness of his sufficiency, Job xx. 22, when his eyes were held waking upon his bed with his cares and contrivances about enlarging his barns, not by adding a bay or two more of building to them, which might serve to answer the end, but by pulling them down and building greater, which was requisite to please his fancy; when he was forecasting this, and had brought it to an issue, and then lulled himself asleep again, with a pleasing dream of many years' enjoyment of his present improvements, then God said this to him. Thus Belshazzar was struck with terror, by the handwriting on the wall, in the midst of his jollity. Now observe what God said. First. The character he gave him, "Thou fool," thou Nabal, alluding to the story of Nabal, that fool; "Nabal is his name, and folly is with him," whose heart was struck dead as a stone, when he was regaling himself in the abundance of his provision for his sheep-shearers. Note, Carnal worldlings are fools, and the day is coming when God will call them by their own name, "thou fool," and they will call themselves so. Secondly. The sentence he passed upon him, a sentence of death: "This night thy soul shall be required of thee," they shall require thy soul; so the words are, and "then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?" He thought he had goods that should be his many years, but he must part from them this night; he thought he should enjoy them himself, but he must leave them to he knows not who. Note, The death of carnal worldlings is miserable in itself, and terrible to them. 1st. It is a force, an arrest; it is the requiring of the soul, that soul that thou art making such a fool of; what hast thou to do with a soul, that canst use it no better? "Thy soul shall be required;" that intimates that he is loath to part with it. A good man, that has taken his heart off from this world, cheerfully resigns his soul at death, and gives it up; but a worldly man has it torn from him with violence, it is a terror to him to think of leaving this world. "They shall require thy soul;" God shall require it; that is, he shall require an account of it; Man, woman, what hast thou done with thy soul? give an account of that stewardship. "They shall," that is, evil angels, as the messengers of God's justice. As good angels receive gracious souls, to carry them to their joy, so evil angels receive wicked souls, to carry them to the place of torment; they shall require it, as a guilty soul, to be punished. The devil requires the soul as his own, for it did in effect give itself to him. 2nd. It is a surprise, an unexpected force. It is in the night, and terrors in the night are most terrible. The time of death is day-time to a good man, it is his morning; but it is night to a worldling, a dark night, he lies down in sorrow. It is "this night," this present night, without delay; there is no giving bail, or begging day; this pleasant night, when thou art promising thyself many years to come, now thou must die and go to judgment; thou art entertaining thyself with the fancy of many a merry day, and merry night, and merry feast, but, in the midst of all, here is an end of all, Isa. xxi. 4. 3rd. It is the leaving of all those things behind which they have provided, which they have laboured for, and prepared for hereafter, with abundance of toil and care. All that which they have placed their happiness in, and built their hope upon, and raised their expectations from, they must leave behind; their pomp shall not descend after them, Ps. xlix. 17; but they shall go as naked out of the world as they came into it; and they shall have no benefit at all by what they have hoarded up, either in death, in judgment, or in their everlasting state. 4th. It is leaving them to they know not who: "then whose shall those things be?" Not thine, to be sure; and thou knowest not constructed edifices. It does not, however, follow that they had altogether relinquished the older and still common custom of depositing the grain in subterranean store-houses."

xii. 24. In illustration of this verse, some expositors quote the following passages from the Hebrew rabbinical writings. In the Mishnah, Rabbi Simeon Ben Eleazar says, "Did you ever see a beast or a fowl that had a trade? but they are fed without trouble." On which the Gemara says, "Did you ever see a lion bearing burdens? a hart gathering summer fruits? a fox a money-changer? or a wolf selling pots? and yet they are nourished without labour. And wherefore are they created? to serve me; and I am created to serve my Maker. And lo, these things have in them an argument; for if these, which are created to serve me in this manner, are supported without trouble, I, who am created to serve my Maker, is it not fit that I should be supplied without trouble? And what is the reason that I am supplied with trouble? My sins."

what they will prove for whom thou didst design them, thy children and relations; whether they will be wise or fools, Ecc. ii. 18, 19, whether such as will bless thy memory or curse it, be a credit to thy family, or a blemish; do good or hurt with what thou leavest them, keep it or spend it; nay, thou knowest not but those for whom thou dost design it, may be prevented from the enjoyment of it, and it may be turned to somebody else thou little thinkest of. Nay, though thou knowest to whom thou leavest it, thou knowest not to whom they will leave it, nor into whose hand it will come at last. If many a man could have foreseen to whom his house would have come after his death, he would rather have burnt it than beautified it. 5th. It is a demonstration of his folly. Carnal worldlings are fools while they live; "this their way is their folly," Ps. xlix. 13, but their folly is made most evident when they die, "at his end he shall be a fool," Jer. xvii. 11; for then it will appear he took pains to lay up treasure in a world he was hastening from, but took no care to lay it up in the world he was hastening to.

Lastly. Here is the reddition of this parable, ver. 21: "so is he," such a fool, a fool in God's judgment, a fool upon record, "that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich towards God." This is the way, and this the end, of such a man. Observe here,

1. The description of a worldly man; he "lays up treasure for himself," for the body, for the world; for himself, in opposition to God, for that self that is to be denied. 1st. It is his error that he counts his flesh himself, as if the body were the man. If self be rightly stated and understood, it is only the true Christian that lays up treasure for himself, and is wise for himself, Pr. ix. 12. 2nd. It is his error, that he makes it his business to lay up for the flesh, which he calls laying up for himself. All his labour is for his mouth, Ecc. vi. 7, making provision for the flesh. 3rd. It is his error, that he counts those things his treasure which are thus laid up for the world, and the body, and the life that now is; they are the wealth he trusts to and spends upon, and lets out his affections towards. 4th. The greatest error of all is, that he is in no care to be rich towards God, rich in the account of God, whose accounting us rich makes us so, Rev. ii. 9; rich in the things of God, rich in faith, Jas. ii. 5; rich in good works, in the fruits of righteousness, 1 Tim. vi. 18; rich in graces and comforts and spiritual gifts. Many that have abundance of this world, are wholly destitute of that which will enrich their souls, which will make them rich towards God, rich for eternity.

2. The folly and misery of a worldly man; "so is he." Our Lord Jesus Christ, who knows what the end of things will be, has here told us what his end will be. Note, It is the unspeakable folly of the most of men to mind and pursue the wealth of this world more than the wealth of the other world, that which is for the body only and for time, more than that which is for the soul and eternity.

22 And he said unto his disciples, Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat; neither for the body, what ye shall put on. 23 The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment. 24 Consider the ravens: for they neither sow nor reap; which neither have storehouse nor barn; and God feedeth them: how much more are ye better than the fowls? 25 And which of you with taking thought can add to his stature one cubit? 26 If ye then be not able to do that thing which is least, why take ye thought for the rest? 27 Consider the lilies how they grow: they toil not, they spin not; and yet I say unto you, that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. 28 If then God so clothe the grass, which is to day in the field, and to morrow is cast into the oven; how much more will he clothe you, O ye of little faith? 29 And seek not ye what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, neither be ye of doubtful mind. 30 For all these things do the nations of the world seek after: and your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things. 31 But rather seek ye the kingdom of God; and all these things shall be added unto you. 32 Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. 33 Sell that ye have, and give alms; provide yourselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth. 34 For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. 35 Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; 36 And ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord, when he will return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately. 37 Blessed are those servants, whom the lord when he cometh shall find watching: verily I say unto you, that he shall gird himself, and make them to sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them. 38 And if he shall come in the second watch, or come in the third watch, and find them so, blessed are those servants. 39 And this know, that if the goodman of the house had known what hour the thief would come, he would have watched, and not have suffered his house to be broken through. 40 Be ye therefore ready also: for the Son of man cometh at an hour when ye think not.

Our Lord Jesus is here inculcating some needful, useful lessons upon his disciples, which he had before taught them, and had occasion afterwards to press upon them; for they needed to have precept upon precept, and line upon line; "therefore," because there are so many that are ruined by covetousness and an inordinate affection to the wealth of this world, "I say unto you," my disciples, take heed of it; "thou, O man of God, flee these things," as well as thou, O man of the world, 1 Tim. vi. 11.

First. He chargeth them not to afflict themselves with disquieting, perplexing cares about the necessary supports of life, ver. 22: "Take no thought for your life." In the foregoing parable he had given us warning against that branch of covetousness which rich people are most in danger of, and that is a sensual complacency in the abundance of this world's goods. Now his disciples might think they were in no danger of that, for they had no plenty or variety to glory in; and therefore he here warns them against another branch of covetousness, which they are most in temptation to, that have but a little of this world, which was the case of the disciples at best, and much more now they had left all to follow Christ; and that was an anxious solicitude about the necessary supports of life. "Take no thought for your life," either for the preservation of it, if it be in danger, or for the provision that is to be made for it, either of food or clothing, "what ye shall eat, or what ye shall put on." This is the caution he had largely insisted upon, Mat. vi. 25, &c.; and the arguments here used are much the same, designed for our encouragement to cast all our care upon God, which is the right way to ease ourselves of it. Consider then,

1. God, that has done the greater for us, may be depended upon to do the lesser; he hath, without any care or forecast of our own, given us life and a body, and therefore we may cheerfully leave it to him to provide meat for the support of that life, and raiment for the defence of that body.

2. God, that provides for the inferior creatures, may be depended upon to provide for good Christians. Trust God for meat, for he feeds the ravens; "they neither sow nor reap," they take neither care nor pains beforehand to provide for themselves, and yet they are fed, and never perish for want. Now consider "how much better ye are than the fowls," than the ravens. Trust God for clothing, for he clothes the lilies, ver. 26, 28; they make no preparation for their own clothing, "they toil not, they spin not;" the root in the ground is a naked thing, and without ornament, and yet as the flower grows up it appears wonderfully beautified. Now, if God has so clothed the flowers, which are fading, perishing things, "shall he not much more clothe you" with such clothing as is fit for you, and with clothing suited to your nature, as theirs is? When God fed Israel with manna in the wilderness, he also took care for their clothing; for though he did not furnish them with new clothes, yet (which came all to one) he provided that those they had should not wax old upon them, Deu. viii. 4. Thus will he clothe his spiritual Israel, but then let not them be of little faith. Note, Our inordinate cares are owing to the weakness of our faith; for a powerful, practical belief of the all-sufficiency of God, his covenant relation to us as a Father, and especially his precious promises, relating both to this life and that to come, would be mighty, through God, the pulling down of the strongholds of these disquieting, perplexing imaginations.

3. Our cares are fruitless, and vain, and insignificant; and therefore it is folly to indulge them; they will not gain us our wishes, and therefore ought not to hinder our repose; ver. 25, "Which of you by taking thought can add to his stature one cubit?" no, nor one inch; can add to his age one year? no, nor one hour. Now, "if ye be not able to do that which is least," if it be not in your power to alter your statures, why should you perplex yourselves about other things, that are as much out of your power, and about which it is as necessary that we refer ourselves to the providence of God? Note, As in our stature, so in our state, it is our wisdom to take it as it is, and make the best of it; for fretting and vexing, carking and caring, will not mend it.

4. An inordinate, solicitous pursuit of the things of this world, even necessary things, doth very ill become the disciples of Christ, ver. 29, 30. Whatever others do, "seek not ye what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink;" do not ye afflict yourselves with perplexing cares, nor weary yourselves with constant toils; do not ye hurry yourselves hither and thither with inquiries what you shall eat or drink, as David's enemies, that wandered up and down for meat, Ps. lix. 15; or as the eagle that seeks the prey afar off, Job xxxix. 29. Let not the disciples of Christ thus seek their food, but ask it of God, day by day; let not them be "of doubtful mind," μη μετεωρίζεσθε, "be not as meteors in the air," that are blown hither and thither with every wind; do not, like them, rise and fall, but maintain a consistency with yourselves; be even and steady, and have your hearts fixed; "live not in careful suspense;" let not your minds be continually perplexed between hope and fear, ever upon the rack. Let not the children of God make themselves uneasy; for, xii. 25. The word rendered "stature" may mean age, or practically lifetime.

1st. This is to make themselves like the children of this world; "all these things do the nations of the world seek after," ver. 30. They that take care for the body only, and not for the soul—for this world only, and not for the other, look no farther than what they shall eat and drink; and, having no all-sufficient God to seek to, and confide in, they burden themselves with anxious cares about those things; but it ill becomes you to do so; you, who are called out of the world, ought not to be thus conformed to the world, and to "walk in the way of this people," Isa. viii. 11, 12. When inordinate cares prevail over us, we should think, "What am I? a Christian or a heathen? baptized or not baptized? If a Christian, if baptized, shall I rank myself with Gentiles, and join with them in their pursuits?"

xii. 31. A better reading of this verse is, "But seek ye his kingdom (your Father's); and these things shall be added unto you."

xii. 32. "Your Father's good pleasure" refers not to a sovereign decree, but to the gracious will and favour of God to his children.

xii. 34. Bishop Pearce quotes a passage from Plautus to this effect: "I am here, but my mind is at home, that is, with my money."

xii. 37. On "he shall gird himself," &c., Adam Clarke says, "Alluding to the long garments which were worn in Eastern countries, and which, in travelling and serving, were tucked up in their belts." He shows, by a reference to Horace, that among the Romans the host himself sometimes performed the office of waiter, having girded up his garments for the purpose. Here, however, the master serves the servants.

xii. 41. The occurrence of this verse shows that the discourse is

2nd. It is needless for them to disquiet themselves with care about the necessary supports of life, for they have a Father in heaven who doth and will take care for them; "your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things," and considers it, and "will supply your needs according to his riches in glory," for he is your Father, who made you subject to these necessities, and therefore will suit his compassions to them; your Father, who maintains you, educates you, and designs an inheritance for you, and therefore will take care that you want no good thing.

3rd. They have better things to mind and pursue, ver. 31: "but rather seek ye the kingdom of God," and mind that, you, my disciples, that are to "preach the kingdom of God." Let your hearts be upon your work, and your great care how to do that well, and that will effectually divert your thoughts from inordinate care about the things of the world. And let all that have souls to save, "seek the kingdom of God," in which only they can be safe; seek admission into it, seek advancement in it; seek the kingdom of grace, to be subjects in that; the kingdom of glory, to be princes in that; and then "all these things shall be added to you;" mind the affairs of your souls with diligence and care, and then trust God with all your other affairs.

4th. They have better things to expect and hope for, ver. 32: "Fear not, little flock." For the banishing of inordinate cares, it is necessary that fears should be suppressed; when we frighten ourselves with an apprehension of evil to come, we put ourselves upon the stretch of care how to avoid it; when, after all, perhaps it is but the creature of our own imagination; therefore, "fear not, little flock," but hope to the end, "for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." This comfortable word we had not in Matthew. Note, First. Christ's flock in this world is a little flock, his sheep are but few and feeble. The church is as Israel, 1 Kin. xx. 27, a small spot, compared with the wilderness of this world, as Israel, 1 Kin. xx. 27, a small spot, compared with the wilderness of this world, as the Syrians filled the country. Secondly. Though it be a little flock, quite over numbered, and therefore in danger of being overpowered by its enemies, yet it is the will of Christ that they should not be afraid. "Fear not, little flock," but see yourselves safe under the protection and conduct of the great and good Shepherd, and lie easy. Thirdly. God has a kingdom in store for all that belong to Christ's little flock; a crown of glory, 1 Pet. v. 4; a throne of power, Rev. iii. 21; unsearchable riches, far exceeding the peculiar treasures of kings and provinces. The sheep on the right hand are called to come and inherit the kingdom; it is theirs for ever; a kingdom for each. Fourthly. The kingdom is given according to the good pleasure of the Father; it is your Father's good pleasure; it is given not of debt, but of grace—free grace, sovereign grace; "even so, Father, because it seemed good unto thee." The kingdom is his, and may he not do what he will with his own? Fifthly. The believing hopes and prospects of the kingdom should silence and suppress the fears of Christ's little flock in this world. Fear no trouble; for though it should come, it shall not come between you and the kingdom: that is sure; it is near: that is not an evil worth trembling at the thought of, which cannot separate us from the love of God. Fear not the want of any thing that is good for you; for if it be "your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom," you need not question but he will bear your charges thither.

Secondly. He chargeth them to make sure work for their souls, by laying up their treasure in heaven, ver. 33, 34. And those who have done this may be very easy as to all the events of time.

1. Sit loose to this world, and to all your possessions in it: "sell that ye have, and give alms;" that is, rather than want wherewith to relieve those that are truly necessitous, sell that which you have superfluous, all that you can spare from the support of yourselves and families, and give it to the poor; "sell that ye have," if ye find it a hindrance from, or incumbrance in, the service of Christ. Do not think yourselves undone, if, by being fined, imprisoned, or banished for the testimony of Jesus, you be forced to sell your estates, though they be the inheritance of your fathers. Do not sell to hoard up the money, or because you can make more of it by usury, but sell and give alms; and what is given in alms in a right manner is put out to the best interest, upon the best security.

2. Set your hearts upon the other world, and your expectations from that world. "Provide yourselves bags that wax not old," that wax not empty, not of gold, but of grace in the heart, and good works in the life: these are bags that will last; grace will go with us into another world, for it is woven into the soul, and our good works will follow us, for God is not unrighteous to forget them. These will be treasures in heaven that will enrich us to eternity. 1st. It is treasure that will not be exhausted; we may spend upon it to eternity, and it will not be at all the less; there is no danger of seeing the bottom of it. 2nd. It is treasure that we are in no danger of being robbed of, for no thief approacheth near it; what is laid up in heaven is out of the reach of enemies. 3rd. It is treasure that will not spoil with keeping, no more than it will waste with spending; the moth doth not corrupt, as it doth our garments we now wear. Now by this it doth appear that we have laid up our treasure in heaven, if our hearts be there while we are here, ver. 34. If we think much of heaven, and keep our eye upon it; if we quicken ourselves with the hopes of it, and keep ourselves in awe with the fear of falling short of it. But if your hearts be set upon the earth, and the things of it, it is to be feared you have your treasure and portion in it, and are undone when you leave it.

Thirdly. He chargeth them to get ready, and to keep in a readiness for Christ's coming; when all those who have laid up their treasure in heaven shall enter upon the enjoyment of it, ver. 35, &c.

1. Christ is our Master, and we are his servants; not only working servants, but waiting servants, servants that are to do him honour, in waiting on him, and attending his motions. "If any man serve me, let him follow me;" follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes. But that is not all, they must do him honour in waiting for him, and expecting his return; we must be as men that wait for their lord, that sit up late while he stays out late, to be ready to receive him.

2. Christ our Master, though now gone from us, will return again, return from the wedding, from solemnizing the nuptials abroad, to complete them at home. Christ's servants are now in a state of expectation, looking for their Master's glorious appearing, and doing every thing with an eye to that, and in order to that. He will come to take cognizance of his servants; and that being a critical day, they shall either stay with him or be turned out of doors, according as they are found in that day.

3. The time of our Master's return is uncertain; it will be in the night; it will be far in the night, when he has long deferred his coming, and when many have done looking for him; in the second watch, just before midnight; or in the third watch, next after midnight, ver. 38. His coming to us at our death is uncertain, and to many it will be a great surprise; for, ver. 40, "the Son of man cometh at an hour that ye think not," without giving notice beforehand. This speaks not only the uncertainty of the time of his coming, but the prevailing security of the greatest part of men, that are unthinking, and altogether regardless of the notices given them; so that, whenever he comes, it is at "an hour that they think not."

4. That which he expects and requires from his servants is, that they be "ready to open to him immediately," whenever he comes, ver. 36; that is, that they be in a frame fit to receive him, or rather to be received by him; that they be found, as his servants, in the posture that becomes them, with their loins girded about, alluding to servants that are ready to go where their master sends them, and do what their master bids them, having their long garments tucked up; which otherwise would hang about them, and hinder them; and their lights burning, with which to light their master into this house, and up to his chamber.

5. Those servants will be happy who are found ready and in a good frame when their Lord comes, ver. 37: "Blessed are those servants" who, after having waited long, continue in a waiting frame, till the hour that their Lord comes, and are then found awake, and aware of his first approach, of his first knock; and again, ver. 38, "blessed are those servants," for then will be the time of their preferment. And here is such an instance of honour done them as is scarce to be found among men; he "shall make them sit down to meat, and serve them;" for the bridegroom to wait upon his bride at table is not uncommon, but to wait upon his servants is not the manner of men; yet Jesus Christ was among his disciples as one that served, and did once, to shew his condescension, gird himself and serve them, when he washed their feet, Jno. xiii. 4, 5; and it signified the joy with which they shall be received into the other world by the Lord Jesus, who is gone before to prepare for them, and has told them that his Father will honour them, Jno. xii. 26.

6. We are therefore kept at uncertainty concerning the precise time of his coming, that we may be always ready; for it is no thanks to a man to be ready for an attack if he know beforehand just the time when it will be made. "The Goodman of the house, if he had known what hour the thief would come," though he were never so careless a man, yet "would have watched," and have frightened away the thieves, ver. 39. But we do not know at what hour the alarm will be given us, and therefore are concerned to watch at all times, and never to be off our guard. Or this may intimate the miserable ease of those who are careless and unbelieving in this great matter. If the Goodman of the house had notice of his danger of being robbed such a night, he would have sat up and saved his house; but we have notice of the day of the Lord's coming, as a thief in the night, to the confusion and ruin of all secure sinners, and yet do not thus watch. If men will take such care of their houses, O let us be thus wise for our souls; "be ye therefore ready also," as ready as the Goodman of the house would be, if he knew "what hour the thief would come."

41 Then Peter said unto him, Lord, speakest thou this parable unto us, or even to all? 42 And the Lord said, Who then is that faithful and wise steward, whom his lord shall make ruler over his household, to give them their portion of meat in due season? 43 Blessed is that servant, whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing. 44 Of a truth I say unto you, that he will make him ruler over all that he hath. 45 But and if that servant say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming; and shall begin to beat the menservants and maidens, and to eat and drink, and to be drunken; 46 The lord of that servant will come in a day when he looketh not for him, and at an hour when he is not aware, and will cut him in sunder, and will appoint him his portion with the unbelievers. 47 And that servant, which knew his lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. 48 But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more. 49 I am come to send fire on the earth; and what will I, if it be already kindled? 50 But I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished! 51 Suppose ye that I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you, Nay; but rather division: 52 For from henceforth there shall be five in one house divided, three against two, and two against three. 53 The father shall be divided against the son, and the son against the father; the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother; the mother in law against her daughter in law, and the daughter in law against her mother in law.

Here is, I. Peter's question, which he put to Christ upon occasion of the foregoing parable, ver. 41: "Lord, speakest thou this parable unto us," that are thy constant followers, to us that are ministers, "or also to all" that come to a connected one, and not a collection of scattered sayings of our Lord.

xii. 45. The expression "but and if" means "but if," and is probably a more modern form of the ancient phrase "but an' if."

xii. 46. For "cut him in sunder" the margin has "or, cut him off." We prefer to understand the words of very severe punishment, the form of which is not defined. That capital punishment is not intended has been inferred from the subsequent position of the culprit, who will have his place with the unbelievers, or rather, the unfaithful, "the hypocrites," as we have it in Matt. xxiv. 51.

xii. 48. A man's accountability is the measure of his responsibility, and both are determined by the trust and confidence reposed in him. The idea is doubtless here the same as in the parable of the talents. Judgment will be regulated by works, and works estimated by opportunities.

xii. 49. The Greek of this verse is variously explained in the be taught by thee, to all the hearers, and in them to all Christians? Peter was now, as often, spokesman for the disciples. We have reason to bless God that there are some such forward men, that have a gift of utterance; and let those that are such take heed of being proud. Now Peter desires Christ to explain himself, and to direct the arrow of the foregoing parable to the mark he intended. He calls it a parable, because it was not only figurative, but weighty, solid, and instructive. 'Lord,' saith Peter, 'was it intended for us, or for all?' To this Christ gives a direct answer, Mat. xiii. 6, "What I say unto you I say unto all." Yet here he seems to shew that the apostles were primarily concerned in it. Note, We are all concerned to take to ourselves what Christ in his word designs for us, and to inquire accordingly concerning it. "Speakest thou this to us?"—"to me?" Speak, Lord, for thy servant hears. Dost this word belong to me, speak it to my heart.

II. Christ's reply to this question, directed to Peter and the rest of the disciples. If what Christ had said before did not so peculiarly concern them, but in common with other Christians, who must all watch and pray for Christ's coming, as his servants; yet this that follows is peculiarly adapted to ministers, who are the stewards in Christ's house. Now our Lord Jesus here tells them,

First. What was their duty as stewards, and what the trust committed to them. 1. They are made "rulers of God's household," under Christ, whose own the house is. Ministers derive an authority from Christ to preach the Gospel, and to administer the ordinances of Christ, and apply the seals of the covenant of grace. 2. Their business is to give God's children and servants "their portion of meat," that which was proper for them, and allotted to them; convictions and comfort to those to whom they respectively belong; sum cuique,—"to every one his own." This is "rightly to divide the word of truth," 2 Tim. ii. 15. 3. To give it them "in due season," at that time, and in that way, the most suitable to the temper and condition of those that are to be fed; "a word in season to him that is weary." 4. Herein they must approve themselves faithful and wise; faithful to their Master, by whom this great trust is reposed in them, and faithful to their fellow-servants, for whose benefit they are put in trust; and wise to improve an opportunity of doing honour to their Master, and service in the family. Ministers must be both skilful and faithful.

Secondly. What would be their happiness if they approved themselves faithful and wise, ver. 43: "Blessed is that servant," 1. That is doing, and is not idle nor indulgent of his ease; even the rulers of the household must be doing, and make themselves servants of all. 2. That is so doing, doing as he should be, giving them their portion of meat, by public preaching, and personal application. 3. That is found so doing when his Lord comes; that perseveres to the end, notwithstanding the difficulties he may meet with in the way. Now his happiness is illustrated by the performance of a steward that has approved himself within a lower and narrower degree of service; he shall be preferred to a larger and higher, ver. 44: "he will make him ruler over all that he has," which was Joseph's preferment in Pharaoh's court. Note, Ministers that obtain mercy of the Lord to be faithful, shall obtain farther mercy to be abundantly rewarded for their faithfulness in the day of the Lord.

Thirdly. What a dreadful reckoning there would be, if they were treacherous and unfaithful, ver. 45, 46. If that servant began to be quarrelsome and profane, he shall be called to an account, and severely punished. We had all this before in Matthew, and therefore shall here only observe, 1. Our looking upon Christ's second coming as a thing at a distance, is the cause of all those irregularities which render the thought of it terrible to us; "he saith in his heart, My lord delays his coming." Christ's patience is very often misinterpreted his delay, to the discouragement of his people, and the encouragement of his enemies. 2. The persecutors of God's people are commonly abandoned to security and sensuality; "they beat their fellow-servants," and then "eat and drink with the drunken," altogether unconcerned either at their own sin or their brethren's sufferings; as the king and Haman, that sat down to drink when the city Shusan was perplexed. Thus they drank to drown the clamours of their own consciences, and baffle them, which otherwise would fly in their faces. 3. Death and judgment will be very terrible to all wicked people, but especially to wicked ministers; it will be a surprise to them, "at an hour when they are not aware," it will be the determining of them to endless misery, they shall be cut in sunder, and have their portion assigned them with the unbelievers.

Fourthly. What an aggravation it would be of their sin and punishment, that they knew their duty, and did not do it, ver. 47, 48. For "that servant that knew his lord's will, and did it not, shall be beaten with many stripes," shall fall under a sorer punishment; and "he that knew not shall be beaten with few stripes," his punishment shall, in consideration of that, be mitigated. Here seems to be an allusion to the law, which made a distinction between sins committed through ignorance, and presumptuous sins, Lev. v. 15; Num. xv. 29, 30; as also to another law, concerning the number of stripes given to a malefactor, to be according to the nature of the crime, Deu. xxv. 2. Now, 1. Ignorance of our duty is an extenuation of sin. He "that knew not his lord's will," through carelessness and neglect, and his not having such opportunities as some others had of coming to the knowledge of it, and "did things worthy of stripes," he shall "be beaten," because he might have known his duty better, but "with few stripes," his ignorance excuseth in part, but not in whole. Thus, through ignorance, the Jews put Christ to death, Acts iii. 17; 1 Cor. ii. 8; and Christ pleaded that ignorance in their excuse, "they know not what they do." 2. The knowledge of our duty is an aggravation of our sin: "That servant that knew his lord's will," and yet did his own will, "shall be beaten with many stripes." God will justly inflict more upon him for abusing the means of knowledge he afforded him, which others would have made a better use of, and because it argues a great degree of wilfulness and contempt to sin against knowledge; of how much sorer punishment then shall they be thought worthy, besides the many stripes that their own consciences will give them? Son, remember! Here is a good reason for this added; "to whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required," especially when it is committed as a trust he is to account for. Those that have greater capacities of mind than others, more knowledge and learning, more acquaintance and converse with the Scriptures, to them much is given, and their account will be accordingly.

III. A farther discourse concerning his own sufferings, which he expected, and concerning the sufferings of his followers, which he would have them also to live in expectation of. In general, ver. 49, "I am come to send fire on the earth;" by which some understand the preaching of the Gospel, and the pouring out of the Spirit, holy fire; this Christ came to send with a commission to refine the world, to purge away its dross, to burn up its chaff; and it was already kindled; the Gospel was begun to be preached. Some prefaces there were to the pouring out of the Spirit; Christ baptized with the Holy Ghost, and with fire; this Spirit descended in fiery tongues; but, by what follows, it seems rather to be understood of the fire of persecution: Christ is not the author of it, as it is the sin of the incendiaries, the persecutors; but he permits it; nay, he commissions it, as a refining fire for the trial of the persecuted. This fire was already kindled in the enmity of the carnal Jews to Christ and his followers; "what will I, if it be already kindled?"—"what thou doest, do quickly." "If it be already kindled, what will I?" Shall I wait the quenching of it? No, for it must fasten upon myself, and upon all, and glory will redound to God from it.

First. He must himself suffer many things; he must pass through this fire that was already kindled, ver. 50: "I have a baptism to be baptized with." Afflictions are compared both to fire and water, Ps. lxxi. 12; lxxix. 1, 2; Christ's sufferings were both; he calls them a baptism, Mat. xx. 22; for he was watered or sprinkled with them, as Israel was baptized in the cloud; and dipped into them, as Israel was baptized in the sea, 1 Cor. x. 2. He must be sprinkled with his own blood, and with the blood of his enemies, Isa. lixiii. 3. See here, 1. Christ's foresight of his sufferings; he knew what he was to undergo, and the necessity of undergoing it: "I am to be baptized with a baptism;" he calls his sufferings by a name that mitigates them, it is a baptism, not a deluge; I must be dipped in them, not drowned in them; and by a name that sanctifies them, for baptism is a sacred rite. Christ in his sufferings devoted himself to his Father's honour, and consecrated himself a Priest for evermore, Heb. vii. 27, 28. 2. Christ's forwardness to his sufferings: "How am I straitened till it be accomplished?" He doth long for the time when he should suffer and die, having an eye to the glorious issue of his sufferings; it is an allusion to a woman in travail, that is pained to be delivered, and welcomes her pains, because they hasten the birth of her child, and wishes them sharp and strong, that the work may be cut short. Christ's sufferings were the travail of his soul, which he cheerfully underwent, in hope that he should by them see his seed, Isa. liii. 10, 11. So much was his heart upon the redemption and salvation of man.

Secondly. He tells those about him that they also must bear with hardships and difficulties, ver. 51: "Suppose ye that I came to give peace on earth?" that is, to give you a peaceable possession of the earth, and outward prosperity on the earth? It is intimated that they were ready to entertain such a thought as this; nay, that they went upon this supposition, that the Gospel would meet with a universal welcome, that people would unanimously embrace it, and would therefore study to make the preachers of it easy and great; that Christ, if he did not give them pomp and power, would at least give them peace; and herein they were encouraged by divers passages of the Old Testament, which speak of the peace of the Messiah's kingdom, which they were willing to understand of external peace. But, saith Christ, you will be mistaken, the event will declare the contrary; and therefore do not flatter yourselves into a fool's paradise. Ye will find,

1. That the effect of the preaching of the Gospel will be division. Not but that the design of the Gospel and its proper tendency is to unite the children of men to one another, to knit them together in holy love; and if all would receive it, this would be the effect of it: but there being multitudes that not only will not receive it, but oppose it, and have their corruptions exasperated by it, and are enraged at those that do receive it; it proves, though not the cause, yet the occasion of division: "While the strong man armed kept his palace," in the Gentile world, "his goods were at peace," all was quiet, for all went one way; the sects of philosophers agreed well enough; so did the worshippers of different deities; but when the Gospel was preached, and man were enlightened by it, and turned from the power of Satan to God, then there was a disturbance, a noise and a shaking, Eze. xxxvii. 7. Some distinguished themselves by their embracing the Gospel, and others were angry that they did so. Yea, and among them that received the Gospel, there would be different sentiments in lesser things, which would occasion division; and Christ permits it, for holy ends, 1 Cor. xi. 19; that Christians may learn and practise mutual forbearance, Rom. xiv. 1, 2.

2. That this division will reach into private families, and the preaching of the Gospel will give occasion for discord among the nearest relations, ver. 53: "The father shall be divided against the son, and the son against the father;" when the one turns Christian, and the other doth not; for that which doth turn Christian will be zealous by arguments and endearments to turn the other too, 1 Cor. vii. 16; as soon as ever Paul was converted, he disputed Acts ix. 29. And that which continues in unbelief will be provoked, and will hate and persecute that which by his faith and obedience witnesseth against and condemneth his unbelief and disobedience. A spirit of bigotry and persecution will break through the strongest bonds of relation and natural affection: see Mat. x. 34; xxiv. 7. Even mothers and daughters fall out about religion; and those that believe not, are so violent and outrageous that they are ready to deliver up into the hands of the bloody persecutors those that believe, though otherwise very near and dear to them. We find in the Acts that wherever the Gospel came, persecution was angry that it was "every where spoken against," and there was "no small stir about that way." Therefore let not the disciples of Christ promise themselves "peace upon earth," for they are sent forth "as sheep in the midst of wolves."

54 And he said also to the people, When ye see a cloud rise out of the west, straightway ye say, There cometh a shower; and so it is. 55 And when ye see the south wind blow, ye say, There will be heat; and it cometh to pass. 56 Ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky and of the earth; but how is it that ye do not discern this time? 57 Yea, and why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right? 58 When thou goest with thine adversary to the magistrate, as thou art in the way, give diligence that thou mayest be delivered from him; lest he hale thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and the officer cast thee into prison. 59 I tell thee, thou shalt not depart thence, till thou hast paid the very last mite.

Having given his disciples their lesson in the foregoing verses, here Christ turns to the people and gives them theirs, ver. 54: "He said so to the people:" he preached ad populum,—"to the people," as well as ad clero,—"to the clergy;" and in general he would have them be as wise in the affairs of their souls as they are in their outward affairs. Two things he instanteth in:

second clause. Grotius has, "What is it that I wish? would that it were already kindled!" He regards the fire as that of persecution, which is to try and purify the flock of Christ. Some of the best modern critics adopt substantially his translation. But what fire is meant? Some say, not persecution, but contention; others, the power of the Holy Spirit. In favour of the latter view an appeal is made to verse 50, Matt. iii. 11, Acts ii. 1—3.

xii. 54. Dr. Thomson, describing a storm as likely to continue in the Holy Land, writes, "The wind is full and strong from the proper rain quarter, the south-west, and while it holds to that point the storm will continue. It will not clear until the wind shifts round towards the north, which it is often slow to do, and will not now till the air becomes colder, and Lebanon is covered deep with snow. As in ancient times, the west wind brings rain, and the north drives it away." This fact is further illustrated by 1 Kings xviii. 44.

xii. 55. By the "south wind" here we are probably to understand

First. Let them learn to discern the way of God towards them, that they may prepare accordingly. They were weatherwise, and, by observing the winds and clouds, could foresee when there would be rain, and when there would be hot weather, ver. 54, 55; and they did accordingly, either house their hay and corn, or throw it abroad, and equipped themselves for a journey according as they foresaw the weather would be. Even in the change of the weather God gives warning to us what is coming, and art has improved those notices of nature in weather glasses. These preparations here spoken of, were made by repeated observations upon the chain of causes; from what has been we conjecture what will be. See the benefit of experience; by taking notice, we may come to give notice; whoso is wise will observe and learn. See now,

1. The particulars of the presages: "Ye see a cloud arising out of the west;" the Hebrew would say, "Out of the sea;" perhaps it is at first "no bigger than a man's hand," 1 Kin. xviii. 44; but you say there is a shower in the womb of it, and it proves so. "When ye observe the south wind blow, ye say, There will be heat;" for the hot countries of Africa lay not far south from Judea, and it came to pass ordinarily; yet nature has not tied itself to such a track but that sometimes we are out in our prognostics.

2. The inferences from them: ver. 56, "Ye hypocrites," who pretend to be wise, but really are not so, who pretend to expect the Messiah and his kingdom, (for so the generality of the Jews did,) and yet are no way disposed to receive and entertain it—"how is it that ye do not discern this time?" that ye do not discern that, according to the indications given in the Old Testament prophecies, now is the time for the Messiah to appear, and that, according to the marks given of him, I am he? Why are ye not aware that you have now an opportunity, which you will not have long, and which you may never have again, of securing to yourselves an interest in the kingdom of God, and the privileges of that kingdom? Now is the accepted time, now or never. It is the folly and misery of man that he "knows not his time," Eccl. ix. 12. This was the ruin of the men of that generation, that they "knew not the day of their visitation," Lu. xix. 44. But "a wise man's heart discerns time and judgment;" such was the wisdom of the men of Issachar, who "had understanding of the times," 1 Chr. xii. 32. He adds, ver. 57, "Yea, and why even of yourselves," though you had not these loud alarms given you, "judge ye not what is right?" You are not only stupid and regardless in matters that are purely of Divine revelation, and take not the hints which that gives you, but you are so even in the dictates of the very light and law of nature. Christianity has reason and natural conscience on its side; and if men would allow themselves the liberty of judging what is right, they would soon find that all Christ's precepts concerning all things are right; and there is nothing more equitable in itself, nor better becoming us, than to submit to them, and be ruled by them.

Secondly. Let them hasten to make their peace with God in time, before it be too late, ver. 58, 59. This we had upon another occasion, Mat. v. 26.

1. We reckon it our wisdom in our temporal affairs to compound with those with whom we cannot contend, to agree with our adversary upon the best terms we can, before the equity be foreclosed, and we be left to the rigour of the law. "When thou goest with thine adversary to the magistrate," to whom the appeal is made, and knowest that he has an advantage against thee, and thou art in danger of being cast, you know it is the most prudent course to make the matter away between yourselves: "As thou art in the way, give diligence to be delivered from him," to get a discharge, lest judgment be given, and execution awarded according to law. Wise men will not let their quarrels go to an extremity, but accommodate them in time.

2. Let us do thus in the affairs of our souls; we have by sin made God our adversary, have provoked his displeasure against us, and he has both right and might on his side; so that it is to no purpose to think of carrying on the controversy with him, either at bar or in battle. Christ, to whom all judgment is committed, is the magistrate before whom we are hastening to appear; if we stand a trial before him, and insist upon our own justification, the cause will certainly go against us; the judge will deliver us to the officer, the ministers of his justice, and we shall be cast into the prison of hell, and the debt will be exacted to the utmost; though we cannot make a full satisfaction for it, it will be continually demanded, "till the last mite be paid," which will not be to all eternity. Christ's sufferings were short, yet the value of them made them fully satisfactory. In the sufferings of damned sinners, what is wanting in value must be made up in an endless duration. Now, in consideration of this, let us give diligence to be delivered out of the hands of God as an adversary, into his hands as a Father, and this as we are in the way, which has the chief stress laid upon it here. While we are alive we are in the way; and now is our time, by repentance and faith through Christ, (who is the Mediator as well as the Magistrate,) to get the quarrel taken up, while it may be done before it be too late. Thus "was God in Christ reconciling the world to himself, beseeching us to be reconciled." Let us take hold on the arm of the Lord stretched out in this gracious offer, that we may make peace, and we shall make peace, Isa. xxvii. 4, 5, for we cannot walk together till we be agreed.

CHAPTER XIII.

In this chapter we have, I. The good improvement Christ made of a piece of news that was brought him concerning some Galileans that were lately massacred by Pilate, as they were sacrificing in the temple at Jerusalem, ver. 1—5. II. The parable of the fruitless fig-tree, by which we are warned to bring forth fruits meet for that repentance which he had in the foregoing passage called us to, ver. 6—9. III. Christ's healing a poor infirm woman on the sabbath day, and justifying himself in it, ver. 11—17. IV. A repetition of the parables of the grain of mustard seed, and the leaven, ver. 18—22. V. His answer to the question concerning the number of the saved, ver. 23—30. VI. The slight he put upon Herod's malice and menaces, and the doom of Jerusalem read, ver. 31—35.

HERE were present at that season some that told him of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. 2 And Jesus answering said unto them, Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? 3 I tell you, Nay: but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. 4 Or those eighteen, upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem? 5 I tell you, Nay: but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

Here is, First. Tidings brought to Christ of the death of some Galileans lately;

"whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices," ver. 1. Let us consider, 1. What this tragical story was: it is briefly related here, and is not met with in any of the historians of those times. Josephus indeed mentions Pilate's killing of some Samaritans, who, under the conduct of a factious leader, were going in a tumultuous manner to mount Gerizim, where the Samaritans' temple was; but we can by no means allow that story to be the same with this. Some think these Galileans were of the faction of Judas Gaulonita, who is called Judas of Galilee, Acts v. 37, who disowned Caesar's authority, and refused to pay tribute to him; or perhaps these, being Galileans, were only suspected by Pilate to be of that faction, and barbarously murdered, because those who were in with that pretender were out of his reach. The Galileans, being Herod's subjects, it is probable this outrage committed upon them by Pilate occasioned the quarrel that was between Herod and Pilate, which we read of ch. xxiii. 15. We are not told what number they were; perhaps but a few, whom Pilate had some particular pique against; and therefore the story is overlooked by Josephus. But the circumstance remarked is, that he mingled their blood with their sacrifices in the court of the temple. Though perhaps they had reason to fear Pilate's malice, yet they would not, under pretence of that fear, keep away from Jerusalem, whither the law obliged them to go up with their sacrifices. Dr. Lightfoot thinks it probable that they were themselves killing their sacrifices, which was allowed; for the priest's work, they said, began with the sprinkling of the blood; and Pilate's officers came upon them by surprise, just at that time, when they were off their guard, (for otherwise the Galileans were mettled men, and generally well armed,) and mingled the blood of the sacrificers with the blood of the sacrifices, as if it had been equally acceptable to God. Neither the holiness of the place nor of the work would be a protection to them from the fury of an unjust judge, that neither feared God nor regarded man. The altar that used to be a sanctuary, and place of shelter, is now become a snare and a trap, a place of danger, of slaughter.

2. Why it was related at this season to our Lord Jesus. 1st. Perhaps merely as a matter of news, which they supposed he had not heard before; and as a thing which they lamented, and believed he would do so too; for the Galileans were their countrymen. Note, Sad providences ought to be observed by us, and the knowledge of them communicated to others, that they and we may be suitably affected with them, and make a good use of them. 2nd. Perhaps it was intended as a confirmation of what Christ had said, in the close of the foregoing chapter, concerning the necessity of making our peace with God in time, before we be delivered to the officer—that is, to death—and so cast into prison, and then it will be too late to make agreements. Now, say they, Master, here is a fresh instance of some that were very suddenly delivered to the officer, that were taken away by death when they little expected it; and therefore we have all need to be ready. Note, It will be of good use to us, both to explain the Word of God, and to enforce it upon ourselves by observing the providences of God. 3rd. Perhaps they would stir him up, being himself of Galilee, and a prophet, and one that had a great interest in that country, to find out a way to revenge the death of these Galileans upon Pilate. If they had any thought of this kind they were quite out, for Christ was now going up to Jerusalem to be delivered into the hands of Pilate, and to have his blood, not mingled with his sacrifice, but itself made a sacrifice. 4th. Perhaps this was told Christ to deter him from going up to Jerusalem to worship, ver. 22, lest he should serve him as he had served these Galileans, and should suggest against him, as probably he had insinuated against those Galileans in vindication of his cruelty, that they came to sacrifice as Absalom did, with a seditious design, under colour of sacrificing to raise rebellion. Now lest Pilate, when his hand was in, should proceed farther, they think it advisable that Christ should for the present keep out of the way. 5th. Christ's answer intimates that they told him this with a spiteful inuendo, that though Pilate was unjust in killing them, yet that without doubt they were secretly ill men, else God would not have permitted Pilate thus barbarously to cut them off. It was very invidious; rather than they would allow them to be martyrs, though they died sacrificing, and perhaps suffered for their devotion, they will, without any colour of proof, suppose them to be malefactors; and it may be for no other reason but because they were not of their party and denomination, differed from them, or had difference with them: this fate of theirs, which was capable not only of a favourable, but an honourable construction, shall be called a just judgment of God upon them, though they know not for what.

Secondly. Christ's reply to this report; in which,

1. He seconded it with another story, which, like it, gave an instance of people being taken away by sudden death: it is not long since the tower in Siloam fell, and there were eighteen persons killed and buried in the ruins of it. Dr. Lightfoot's conjecture is, that this tower adjoined to the pool of Siloam, which was the same with the pool of Bethesda, and that it belonged to those porches which were by the pool, in which the impotent folk lay that waited for the stirring of the water, Jno. v. 3; and they who were killed were some of them, or some of those who in this pool used to purify themselves for the temple service, for it was near the temple. Whoever they were, it was a sad story; yet such melancholy accidents we often hear of: for "as the birds are caught in a snare, so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falls suddenly upon them," Eccl. ix. 12. Towers, that were built for safety, often prove men's destruction.

2. He cautioned his hearers not to make an ill use of these and such like events, nor from thence to censure great sufferers, as if they were therefore to be accounted great sinners: "Suppose ye that these Galileans," who were slain as they were sacrificing, "were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you, Nay," ver. 2, 3. Perhaps they that told him the story of the Galileans were Jews, and were glad of any thing that furnished them with matter of reflection upon the Galileans; and therefore Christ retorted upon them the story of the men of Jerusalem that came to an untimely end; for with what measure of that kind we mete, it shall be measured to us again. Now suppose ye that those eighteen who met with their death from the tower of Siloam, while perhaps they were expecting their cure from the pool of Siloam, that they were debtors to Divine justice "above all men that dwelt at Jerusalem? I tell you, Nay." Whether it make for us or against us, we must abide by this rule, that we cannot judge of men's sins by their sufferings in this world; for many are thrown into the furnace as gold, to be purified, not as the well-known sirocco. The name was originally applied to the sultry south-east winds, then to all hot and sultry winds blowing from any quarter between the south-east and the south west. This sirocco is sometimes very violent. Thus Lynch says, on one occasion, "The sirocco blew fiercely until midnight, during which time we lay upon the ground with our heads wrapped up, to screen them from the blistering wind."

xii 59. In the corresponding place, Matt. v. 26, the word

xiii. 1. This is understood to mean that while certain Galileans had been offering sacrifice, Pilate had caused them to be slain. There is no extant account of the details of this event, but there is everything in the circumstances of the time to justify our belief in it. The Galileans were given to seditious outbreaks, and the Romans were not slow to punish them in the most summary and sanguinary way.

cross and chaff to be consumed. We must therefore not be harsh in our censures of those that are afflicted more than their neighbours, as Job's friends were in their censures of him, lest we add sorrow to the sorrowful; nay, lest we condemn the generation of the righteous, Ps. lxxiii. 14. If we will be judging, we have enough to do to judge ourselves; nor indeed can we "know love or hatred by all that is before us," because "all things come alike to all," Ecc. ix. 1, 2. And we might as justly conclude that the oppressors, and Pilate among the rest, on whose side there is power and success, are the greatest saints, as that the oppressed, and those Galileans among the rest, that are all in tears,—and they have no comfort, no, not the priests and Levites that attended the altar,—are the greatest sinners. Let us, in our censures of others, do as we would be done by; for as we do, we shall be done by: "Judge not, that ye be not judged," Mat. vii. 1.

3. On these stories he founded a call to repentance, adding to each of them this awakening word, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish," ver. 3, 4. 1st. This intimates that we all deserve to perish as much as they did; and had we been dealt with according to our sins, according to the iniquity of our holy things, our blood had been long ere this mingled with our sacrifices, by the justice of God. It must moderate our censures, not only that we are sinners, but that we are as great sinners as they, have as much sin to repent of, as they had to suffer for. 2nd. That therefore we are all concerned to repent, to be sorry for what we have done amiss, and to do so no more. The judgments of God upon others are loud calls to us to repent. See how Christ improved every thing for the pressing of that great duty, which he came not only to gain room for, and give hopes to, but to enjoin upon us, and that is, to repent. 3rd. That repentance is the way to escape perishing, and it is a sure way; so iniquity shall not be your ruin; but upon no other terms. 4th. That if we repent not, we shall certainly perish, as others have done before us. Some lay an emphasis upon the word "likewise," and apply it to the destruction that was coming upon the people of the Jews, and particularly upon Jerusalem, who were destroyed by the Romans at the time of their passover; and so, like the Galileans, they had their blood "mingled with their sacrifices;" and many of them, both in Jerusalem and in other places, were destroyed by the fall of walls and buildings, which were battered down about their ears, as those that died by the fall of the tower of Siloam. But certainly it looks farther; except we repent we shall perish eternally, as they perished out of this world. The same Jesus that bade us "repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," bade us repent, for otherwise we shall perish; so that he hath set before us life and death, good and evil, and put us to our choice. 5th. The perishing of those in their impenitency will be in a particular manner aggravated who have been most harsh and severe in judging others.

6 He spake also this parable; A certain man had a fig tree planted in his vineyard; and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none. 7 Then said he unto the dresser of his vineyard, Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground? 8 And he answering said unto him, Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it: 9 And if it bear fruit, well: and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down.

FIG TREE.

This parable is intended to enforce that word of warning, immediately going before, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish;" except ye be reformed, you will be ruined; as the barren tree, except it bring forth fruit, it will be cut down.

1. This parable primarily refers to the nation and people of the Jews. God chose them for his own, made them a people near to him, gave them advantages for knowing and serving him above any other people, and expected answerable returns of duty and obedience from them; which, turning to his praise and honour, he would have accounted fruit. But they disappointed his expectations; they did not do their duty, they were a reproach instead of being a credit to their profession. Upon this he justly determined to abandon them, and cut them off; to deprive them of their privileges, to unchurch and unpeople them; but upon Christ's, as of old upon Moses', intercession, he graciously gave them farther time, and farther mercy; tried them as it were another year, by sending his apostles among them to call them to repentance, and in Christ's name to offer them pardon upon repentance; and some of them were wrought upon to repent, and bring forth fruit, and with them all was well; but the body of the nation continued impenitent and unfruitful, and ruin without remedy came upon them; about forty years after they were cut down and cast into the fire, as John Baptist had told them, Mat. iii. 10; which saying of his this parable enlargeth upon.

11. Yet it has, without doubt, a farther reference, and is designed for the awakening of all that enjoy the means of grace, and the privileges of the visible church; to see to it, that the temper of their minds and the tenor of their lives be answerable to their professions and opportunities, for that is the fruit required. Now observe here,

First. The advantages which this fig tree had; it was planted in a vineyard, in better soil, and where it had more care taken of it, and more pains taken with it, than other fig trees had, that commonly grew, not in vineyards (those are for vines), but by the way side, Mat. xxi. 19. This fig tree belonged to a certain man that owned it, and was at expense upon it. Note, The church of God is his vineyard, distinguished from the common, and fenced about, Isa. v. 1, 2. We are fig trees planted in this vineyard by our baptism; we have a place and a name in the visible church, and it is our privilege and happiness that we have so; it is a distinguishing favour: he has not dealt so with other nations.

Secondly. The owner's expectation from it; "he came and sought fruit thereon," and he had reason to expect it; he did not send, but came himself, noting his desire to find fruit. Christ came into this world, came to his own, to the Jews, seeking fruit. Note, The God of heaven requires and expects fruit from those that have a place in his vineyard. He has his eye upon those that enjoy the Gospel, to see whether they live up to it; he seeks evidences of their getting good by the means of grace they enjoy. Leaves will not serve—crying, "Lord, Lord;" blossoms will not serve—beginning well, and promising fair; there must be fruit. Our thoughts, words, and actions, must be according to the Gospel light and love.

Thirdly. The disappointment of his expectation; he "found none," none at all, not one fig. Note, It is sad to think how many enjoy the privileges of the Gospel, and yet do nothing at all to the honour of God, nor to answer the end of his intrusting them with those privileges; and it is a disappointment to him, and a grief to the Spirit of his grace. 1. He here complains of it to the dresser of the vineyard; "I come, seeking fruit, but am disappointed, I find none; looking for grapes, but behold, wild grapes." He is grieved with such a generation. 2. He aggravates it with two considerations: 1st. That he had waited long, and yet was disappointed; as he was not high in his expectations—he only expected fruit, not much fruit—so he was not hasty, he came three years, year after year. Applying it to the Jews, he came one space of time before the captivity, another after that, and another in the preaching of John Baptist and of Christ himself; or it may allude to the three years of Christ's public ministry, which were now expiring. In general, it teacheth us that the patience of God is stretched out to long-suffering with many that enjoy the Gospel, and do not bring forth the fruits of it; and this patience is wretchedly abused, which provokes God to so much the greater severity. How many times three years has God come to many of us, seeking fruit, but has found none, or next none, or worse than none. 2nd. That this fig tree did not only not bring forth fruit, but it did hurt, it cumbered the ground; it took up the room of a fruitful tree, and was injurious to all about it. Note, Those who do not do good, commonly do hurt, by the influence of their bad example; they grieve and discourage those that are good, they harden and encourage those that are bad. And the mischief is the greater, and the ground the more cumbered, if it be a high, large, spreading tree, and if it be an old tree of long standing.

Fourthly. The doom passed upon it; "cut it down," he saith, "to the dresser of the vineyard," to Christ, to whom all judgment is committed,—to the ministers, who are in his name to declare this doom. Note, No other can be expected concerning barren trees, but that they should be cut down. As the unfruitful vineyard is dismantled, and thrown open to the common, Isa. v. 5, 6, so the unfruitful trees in the vineyard are cast out of it, and wither, Jno. xv. 6; it is cut down by the judgments of God, especially spiritual judgments, such as those on the Jews that believed not, Isa. vi. 9, 10; it is cut down by death, and cast into the fire of hell; and good reason, for "why cumbereth it the ground?" What reason is there why it should have a place in the vineyard to no purpose?

Fifthly. The dresser's intercession for it. Christ is the great intercessor, he ever lives interceding: ministers are intercessors; they that dress the vineyard should intercede for it: those we preach to, we should pray for, for we must give ourselves to the word of God and to prayer. Now observe,

1. What it is he prays for, and that is a reprieve; "Lord, let it alone this year also." He doth not pray, "Lord, let it never be cut down;" but, "Lord, not now; do not remove the dresser; do not withhold the dew; do not pluck up the tree. Note, 1st. It is desirable to have a barren tree reprieved: those that have not yet grace to repent, yet it is a mercy to them to have space to repent, as it was to the old world to have one hundred and twenty years allowed them to make their peace with God. 2nd. We owe it to Christ, the great intercessor, that barren trees are not cut down presently: had it not been for his interposal, the whole world had been cut down upon the sin of Adam; but he said, "Lord, let it alone;" and it is he that upholds all things. 3rd. We are encouraged to pray to God for the merciful reprieve of barren fig trees: Lord, let them alone, continue them yet a while in their probation; bear with them a little longer, and wait to be gracious. Thus must we stand in the gap to turn away wrath. 4th. Reprieves of mercy are but for a time: "let it alone this year also;" a short time, but a sufficient time to make trial. When God has borne long, we may hope he will bear yet a little longer; but we cannot expect he should bear always. 5th. Reprieves may be obtained by the prayers of others for us, but not pardons; there must be our own faith, and repentance, and prayers, else no pardon.

2. How he promiseth to improve this reprieve, if it be obtained; "till I shall dig about it, and dung it." Note, 1st. In general, our prayers must always be seconded with our endeavours. The dresser seems to say, "Lord, it may be I have been wanting in that which is my part; but let it alone this year, and I will do more than I have done towards its fruitfulness." Thus in all our prayers we must request God's grace with a humble resolution to do our duty; else we mock God, and shew that we do not rightly value the mercies we pray for. 2nd. In particular, when we pray to God for grace for ourselves or others, we must follow our prayers with diligence in the use of the means of grace. The dresser of the vineyard engageth to do his part, and therein teacheth ministers to do theirs; he will dig about the tree, and will dung it. Unfruitful Christians must be awakened by the terrors of the law, which break up the fallow ground; and then encouraged by the promises of the Gospel, which are warming and fattening, as manure to the tree; both methods must be tried; the one prepares for the other, and all little enough.

3. Upon what foot he leaves the matter: Let us try it, and try what we can do with it one year more, "and if it bear fruit, well," ver. 19: it is possible, nay, there is hope, that yet it may be fruitful; and in that hope the owner will have patience with it, and the dresser will take pains with it, and if it should have the desired success, both will be pleased that it was not cut down. The word "well" is not in the original, but the expression is apt, "if it bear fruit;" supply it how you please, so as to express how wonderful well pleased both the owner and dresser will be, if it bear fruit; there will be cause of rejoicing; we have what we would have; but it cannot be better expressed than as we xiii. 4. This occurrence is also not mentioned elsewhere. Siloam was a pool outside Jerusalem, in the valley of Cedron. The modern fountain of Siloam is beneath the south-east angle of the city wall, and the water issues from the rock and flows into a basin.

xiii. 6. Fruit trees were not considered barren until they had stood for a few years. It was considered wrong to cut them down until after a certain time. Lightfoot quotes a rabbi who says his son would not have died if he had not cut down a fig-tree before its time.

xiii. 8. The Gemara, as quoted by Dr. Kitto, says, "They lay dung in their gardens to moisten the earth. They dig about the roots of their trees, they pluck up the suckers, they take off the leaves, they sprinkle ashes, and they make a smoke under their trees to destroy the worms."

xiii. 11. Interpreters generally have understood by the phrase "a spirit of infirmity" some kind of demoniacal possession. "As the evangelists have given the appellation of a 'dumb and deaf spirit'"

do, "well." Note, Unfruitful professors of religion, if after long unfruitfulness they will repent and amend, and bring forth fruit, all shall be well: God will be pleased, for he will be praised; ministers' hands will be strengthened, and such penitents will be their joy now, and their crown shortly; nay, there will be joy in heaven for it; the ground will be no longer cumbered, but bettered the vineyard beautified, and the good trees in it made better. And as for the evil itself, it is well for it; it shall not only not be cut down, but it shall receive blessing from God, Heb. vi. 7; it shall be purged, and shall bring forth more fruit, for the Father is its husbandman, Jno. xv. 2; and it shall at last be transplanted from the vineyard on earth to the paradise above.

But he adds, "if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down." Observe here, 1st. That though God bear long, he will not bear always with unfruitful professors; his patience will have an end; and if it be abused, will give way to that wrath which will have no end. Barren trees will certainly be cut down at last, and cast into the fire. 2nd. The longer God hath waited, and the more cost he has been at upon them, the greater will their destruction be. To be cut down after that, after all these expectations from it, these debates concerning it, this concern for it, will be sad indeed, and will aggravate the condemnation. 3rd. Cutting down, though it is work that shall be done, yet it is work that God doth not take pleasure in: for, observe here, the owner said to the dresser, "Do thou cut it down, for it cumbereth the ground." "Nay," said the dresser, "if it must be done at last, 'thou shalt cut it down;' let not my hand be upon it." 4th. Those that now intercede for barren trees, and take pains with them, if they persist in their unfruitfulness, will be even content to see them cut down, and will not have one more word to say for them. Their best friends will acquiesce in, nay, they will approve and applaud, the righteous judgment of God, in the day of the manifestation of it, Rev. xv. 3, 4.

10 And he was teaching in one of the synagogues on the sabbath. 11 And, behold, there was a woman which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself. 12 And when Jesus saw her, he called her to him, and said unto her, Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity. 13 And he laid his hands on her: and immediately she was made straight, and glorified God. 14 And the ruler of the synagogue answered with indignation, because that Jesus had healed on the sabbath day, and said unto the people, There are six days in which men ought to work: in them therefore come and be healed, and not on the sabbath day. 15 The Lord then answered him, and said, Thou hypocrite, doth not each one of you on the sabbath loose his ox or his ass from the stall, and lead him away to watering? 16 And ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years, be loosed from this bond on the sabbath day? 17 And when he had said these things, all his adversaries were ashamed: and all the people rejoiced for all the glorious things that were done by him.

Here is, I. The miraculous cure of a woman that had been long under a spirit of infirmity. Our Lord Jesus spent his sabbaths in the synagogues, ver. 10. We should make conscience of doing so, as we have opportunity; and not think we can spend the sabbath as well at home in reading a good book, for religious assemblies are a Divine institution, which we must bear our testimony to, though but of two or three. And when he was in the synagogues on the sabbath day, he was teaching there, ἐν διδασκῶν: it notes a continued act; he still taught the people knowledge. He was in his element when he was teaching. Now to confirm the doctrine he preached, and recommend it as faithful and well worthy of all acceptance, he wrought a miracle, a miracle of mercy.

First. The object of charity that presented itself was a woman in the synagogue, that "had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years," ver. 11; that is, she had an infirmity, which an evil spirit by Divine permission had brought upon her, which was such as that she "was bowed together" by strong convulsions, "and could in no wise lift up herself;" and having been so long thus, the disease was incurable; she could not stand erect, which is reckoned man's honour above the beasts. Observe, Though she was under this infirmity, by which she was much deformed, and made to look mean, and not only so, but, as is supposed, motion was very painful to her, yet she went to the synagogue on the sabbath day. Note, Even bodily infirmities, unless they be very grievous indeed, should not keep us from public worship on sabbath days; for God can help us beyond our expectation.

Secondly. The offer of this cure, to one that sought it not, speaks the preventing mercy and grace of Christ; ver. 12, "when Jesus saw her, he called her to him." It doth not appear that she made any application to him, or had any expectation from him, but before she called he answered. She came to him to be taught, and to get good to her soul, and then Christ gave this relief to her bodily infirmity. Note, Those whose first and chief care is for their souls do best befriend the true interests of their bodies likewise, for other things shall be added to them. Christ in his Gospel calls and invites those to come to him for healing that labour under spiritual infirmities; and if he call us, he will undoubtedly help us when we come to him.

Thirdly. The cure, effectually and immediately wrought, speaks his almighty power: "He laid his hands on her," and said, "Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity." "Though thou hast been long labouring under it, thou art at length released from it. Let not those despair whose disease is inveterate, who have been long in affliction. God can at length relieve them; therefore though he tarry, wait for him. Though it was "a spirit of infirmity," an evil spirit, that she was under the power of, Christ has a power superior to that of Satan, is stronger than he. Though "she could in no wise lift up herself," Christ could lift her up, and enable her to lift up herself; she that had been crooked was immediately made straight; and the Scripture was fulfilled, Ps. cxlvi. 8, "The Lord raiseth them that are bowed down."

And this cure represents the work of Christ's grace upon the souls of people. 1. In the conversion of sinners. Unsanctified hearts are under this spirit of infirmity; they are distorted, the faculties of the soul are quite out of place and order: they are bowed down towards things below; O curvæ, in terram animæ.—Base souls, that bend toward the earth; they can in no wise lift up themselves to God and heaven; the bent of the soul in its natural state is quite the contrary way: such crooked souls seek not to Christ, but he calls them to him; lays the hand of his power and grace upon them; speaks a healing word to them, by which he looseth them from their infirmity; makes the soul straight, reduceth it to order, raiseth it above worldly regards, and directs its affections and aims heavenwards. Though man cannot make that straight which God has made crooked, Ecc. vii. 13, yet the grace of God can make that straight which the sin of man has made crooked. 2. In the consolation of good people. Many of the children of God are long under a spirit of infirmity, a spirit of bondage; through prevailing grief and fear, their souls are cast down and disquieted within them; they are troubled, they are bowed down greatly, they go mourning all the day long, Ps. xxxviii. 6. But Christ, by his spirit of adoption, looseth them from this infirmity in due time, and raiseth them up.

Fourthly. The present effect of this cure upon the soul of the patient, as well as upon her body; she "glorified God;" gave him the praise of the cure, to whom all praise is due. When crooked souls are made straight, they will shew it by their glorifying God.

II. The offence that was taken at this, by "the ruler of the synagogue," as if our Lord Jesus had committed some heinous crime in healing this poor woman. He had indignation at it, because it was on the sabbath day, ver. 14. One would think the miracle should have convinced him, and that the circumstance of its being done on the sabbath day could not have served to evade the conviction; but what light can shine so clear, so strong, which a spirit of bigotry and enmity to Christ and his Gospel will not serve to shunt men's eyes against? Never was such honour done to the synagogue he was ruler of, as Christ had now done it; and yet he had indignation at it. He had not indeed the impudence to quarrel with Christ; but he said to the people, reflecting upon Christ in what he said, "There are six days in which men ought to work, in them therefore come and be healed, and not on the sabbath day." See here how light he made of the miracles Christ wrought, as if they were things of course, and no more but what quacks and mountebanks did every day: "You may come and be healed any day of the week." Christ's cures were become in his eyes cheap and common things. See also how he stretcheth the law beyond its intention, or any just construction that could be put upon it, in making either healing or being healed with a touch of the hand, or a word's speaking, to be that work which is forbidden on the sabbath day. This was evidently the work of God; and when God tied us out from working that day, did he tie himself out? The same word in Hebrew signifies both godly and merciful, (chesed)—to intimate that works of mercy and charity are in a manner works of piety, 1 Tim. v. 4, and are therefore very proper on sabbath days.

III. Christ's justification of himself in what he had done, ver. 15: "The Lord then answered him," as he had answered others, who in like manner cavilled at him: "Thou hypocrite." Christ, who knows men's hearts, may call those hypocrites whom it would be presumption for us to call so, who must judge charitably, and can judge but according to the outward appearance. Christ knew he had a real enmity to him and to his Gospel, and he did but cloak that with a pretended zeal for the sabbath day; and that when he had the people come on the six days and be healed, he really would not have them be healed any day. Christ could have told him this; but he vouchsafes to reason the case with him. And,

First. He appeals to the common practice among the Jews, which was never disallowed, that of watering their cattle on the sabbath day; those cattle that are kept up in the stable are constantly loosed from the stall on the sabbath day, and led away to watering; it would be a barbarous thing not to do it, for "a merciful man regardeth the life of his beast," his own beast that serves him. Letting the cattle rest on sabbath day, as the law directed, would be worse than working them, if they must be made to fast on that day, as the Ninevites' cattle on their fast day, that were not permitted to feed or drink water, Jonah iii. 7.

Secondly. He applies this to the present case, ver. 10. "Must an ox or an ass have compassion shewed them on the sabbath day, and have so much time and pains bestowed upon them every sabbath, to be loosed from the stall, led away, perhaps a great way, to the water, and then back again, and shall not this woman, only with a touch of the hand and a word's speaking, be loosed from a much greater grievance than that which the cattle undergo, when they are kept without water? For consider, 1. She is a daughter of Abraham, whom you all pride yourselves in a relation to; she is your sister; and shall she be denied a favour that you grant to an ox or an ass, dispensing a little with the supposed strictness of the sabbath day? She is a daughter of Abraham, and therefore is entitled to the Messiah's blessings, to the bread which belongs to the children. 2. She is one whom Satan has bound; he had a hand in the affliction; and therefore it was not only an act of charity to the poor woman, but of piety to God, to break the power of the devil, and baffle him. 3. She has been in this deplorable condition, lo, these eighteen years; and therefore, now there is an opportunity of delivering her it ought not to be deferred a day longer, as you would have it; for any of you would have thought eighteen years' affliction full long enough."

IV. The different effect that this had upon those that heard him. He had sufficiently made it out, not only that it was lawful, but that it was high; fit and proper, to heal this poor woman on the sabbath day, and thus publicly in the synagogue, that they might all be witnesses of the miracle. And now observe,

First. What a confusion this was to the malice of his persecutors; "when he had said these things, all his adversaries were ashamed," ver. 17; they were put to silence, and were vexed that they were so, that they had not a word to say for themselves; it was not a shame that worked repentance, but indignation rather. Note, Sooner or later, all the adversaries of Christ and his doctrine and miracles will be made ashamed.

Secondly. What a confirmation this was to the faith of his friends; "all the people," who had a better sense of things, and judged more impartially than their rulers, "rejoiced for all the glorious things that were done by him." The shame of his foes was the joy of his followers; the increase of his interest was what the one fretted at, and the other triumphed in. The things Christ did were glorious things; they were all so; and, though now clouded, perhaps will appear so; and we ought to rejoice in them. Every thing that is the honour of Christ is the comfort of Christians.

to the demon which made the possessed, in which he was, both deaf and dumb (Mark ix. 25), St. Luke in the same manner here calls the evil spirit which possessed this woman 'a spirit of infirmity,' to show that the malady of this woman was caused by the devil (ver. 16)." Calvin says her body was bowed down by contraction of the nerves. Some think it was a case in which Satanic influence was the cause of physical evil, but in which there was no actual possession.

xiii. 14. "The ruler of the synagogue" was its principal officer.

Dr. Barrow says, "The ancient, like the modern synagogue, had a regular organisation. First of all, there was the college of elders, who constituted the local council, and managed the affairs of the synagogue, in subordination to the Sanhedrim, or grand council of the nation. There were the rulers of the synagogue, called also pastors and rulers, terms that naturally passed over to the Christian congregations. Their presiding officer was called, by way of eminence, the ruler of the synagogue."

18 Then said he, Unto what is the kingdom of God like? and whereunto shall I resemble it? 19 It is like a grain of mustard seed, which a man took, and cast into his garden; and it grew, and waxed a great tree; and the fowls of the air lodged in the branches of it. 20 And again he said, Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God? 21 It is like leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened. 22 And he went through the cities and villages, teaching, and journeying toward Jerusalem.

Here is, First, The Gospel's progress foretold, in two parables, which we had before, Mat. xiii. 31, 33. The kingdom of the Messiah is the kingdom of God, for its advancement his glory: this kingdom was yet a mystery, and people were generally in the dark, and under mistakes about it. Now when we would describe a thing to those that are strangers to it, we choose to do it by similitudes; such a person you know not, but I will tell you who he is like; so Christ undertakes here to shew what the kingdom of God is like, ver. 18; and "whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God?" ver. 20; it will be quite another thing from what you expect, and will operate and gain its point in quite another manner.

1. You expect it will appear great, and will arrive at its perfection all of a sudden; but you are mistaken; "it is like a grain of mustard seed," a little thing, takes up but little room, makes but a little figure, and promiseth but little; and yet, when sown in soil proper to receive it, it "waxes a great tree," ver. 19. Many perhaps were prejudiced against the Gospel, and loath to come in to the obedience of it, because its beginning was so small; they were ready to say of Christ, "Can this man save us?" and of his Gospel, "Is this likely ever to come to anything?" Now Christ would remove this prejudice, by assuring them, that though "its beginning was small, its latter end should greatly increase," so that many should come, should come upon the wing, should fly like a cloud, to lodge in the branches of it, with more safety and satisfaction than in the branches of Nebuchadnezzar's tree, Dan. ix. 21.

2. You expect it will make its way by external means, by subduing nations, and vanquishing armies; though it shall work like leaven, silently and insensibly, and without any force or violence, ver. 21; "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;" so the doctrine of Christ will strangely diffuse its relish into the world of mankind; in this it triumphs, that the savour of the knowledge of it is unaccountably made manifest in every place, beyond what one could have expected, 2 Cor. ii. 14. But you must give it time; wait what will be the issue of the preaching of the Gospel to the world, and you will find it doth wonders, and alters the property of the souls of men. By degrees the whole will be leavened, even as many as are, like the meal to the leaven, prepared to receive the savour of it.

Secondly, Christ's progress towards Jerusalem recorded, ver. 22; "he went through the cities and villages, teaching, and journeying." Here we find Christ an itinerant, but an itinerant preacher, journeying towards Jerusalem, to the feast of dedication, which was in the winter, when travelling was uncomfortable; yet he would be about his Father's business; and therefore, whatever cities or villages he could make in his way, he gave them a sermon or two; not only in the cities, but in the country villages. Wherever Providence brings us we should endeavour to be doing all the good we can.

23 Then said one unto him, Lord, are there few that be saved? And he said unto them, 24 Strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able. 25 When once the master of the house is risen up, and hath shut to the door, and ye begin to stand without, and to knock at the door, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us; and he shall answer and say unto you, I know you not whence ye are: 26 Then shall ye begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets. 27 But he shall say, I tell you, I know you not whence ye are; depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity. 28 There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out. 29 And they shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God. 30 And, behold, there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last.

We have here, I. A question put to our Lord Jesus; who it was that put it, we are not told, whether a friend or a foe; for he gave both a great liberty of questioning with him, and returned answers to the thoughts and intents of the heart. The question was, "Are there few that be saved?" ver. 23, εἰ ὀλίγοι οἱ σωζόμενοι;—"If the saved be few," Master, I have heard thou shouldst say so; is it true?

First, Perhaps it was a captious question; that he put it to him tempting him, with design to ensnare him, and lessen his reputation. If he should say many would be saved, they would reproach him as too loose, and making salvation too cheap; if few, they would reproach him as precise, and making salvation too strict. The Jewish doctors said that all Israel should have a place in the world to come, and would he dare to contradict that? Those that have sucked in a corrupt notion are ready to make it the standard by which to measure all men's judgments; and in nothing do men more betray their ignorance, presumption, and partiality than in judging of the salvation of others.

Secondly, Perhaps it was a curious question, a nice speculation, which he had lately been disputing upon with his companions, and they all agreed to refer it to Christ. Note, Many are more inquisitive who shall be saved, and who not, than what they shall do to be saved. It is commonly asked, May such and such be saved? But it is well we may be saved without knowing that.

Thirdly, Perhaps it was an admiring question. He had taken notice how strict the law of Christ was, and how bad the world was; and comparing these together, cries out, 'How few are there that will be saved?' Note, We have reason to wonder that, of the many to whom the Word of salvation is sent, there are so few to whom it is indeed a saving Word.

Fourthly, Perhaps it was an inquiring question. 'If there be few that be saved, what then? what influence should this have upon me?' Note, It concerns us all, seriously to improve the great truth of the fewness of those that are saved.

II. Christ's answer to this question, which directs us what use to make of this truth. Our Saviour did not give a direct answer to his inquiry, for he came to guide men's consciences, not to gratify their curiosity. Ask not how many shall be saved; but, be they more or fewer, shall I be one of them? Not, what shall become of such and such? and "what shall this man do?" but, what shall I do? and, what will become of me? Now in Christ's answer observe,

First, A quickening exhortation and direction: "Strive to enter in at the strait gate." This is directed not to him only that asked the question, but to all, to us; it is in the plural number, strive ye. Note, 1. All that will be saved must enter in at the strait gate, must undergo a change of the whole man, such as amounts to no less than being born again; and must submit to a strict discipline. 2. Those that would enter in at the strait gate must strive to enter. It is a hard matter to get to heaven, and a point that will not be gained without a great deal of care and pains, of difficulty and diligence. We must strive with God in prayer, wrestle as Jacob, strive against sin and Satan; we must strive in every duty of religion, strive with our own hearts, ἀγωνίζεσθε,—be 'in agony,' strive, as those that run for a prize; excite and exert yourselves to the utmost.

Secondly, Divers awakening considerations to enforce this exhortation. O that we may be all awakened and quickened by them! They are such considerations as will serve to answer the question, "Are there few that shall be saved?"

1. Think how many take some pains for salvation, and yet perish because they do not take enough; and you will say that there are few that will be saved, and that it highly concerns us to strive; "many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able;" they seek, but they do not strive. Note, The reason why many come short of grace and glory is, because they rest in a lazy seeking of that which will not be attained without a laborious striving; they have a good mind of happiness, and a good opinion of holiness, and take some good steps towards both; but their convictions are weak, they do not consider what they know and believe; and consequently their desires are cold, and their endeavours feeble, and there is no strength or steadiness in their resolutions; and thus they come short, and lose the prize, because they do not press forward. Christ avers this upon his own word, "I say unto you;" and we may take it upon his word, for he knows both the counsels of God, and the hearts of the children of men.

2. Think of the distinguishing day that is coming, and the decisions of that day, and you will say there are few that shall be saved, and that we are concerned to strive. The Master of the house will rise up, and shut to the door, ver. 25; Christ is the Master of the house, that will take cognizance of all that frequent his house, and are retainers to it; will examine comers and goers, and those that pass and repass. Now he seems as if he left things at large; but the day is coming when he will rise up and shut to the door. What door? 1st. A door of distinction. Now within the temple of the church there are carnal professors, who worship in the outer court, and spiritual professors, who worship within the veil; between these the door is now open, and they meet promiscuously in the same external performances; but when the Master of the house is risen up, the door will be shut between them, that those who are in the outer court may be kept out, and left to be trodden under foot with the Gentiles, Rev. xi. 2. They that are filthy, shut the door upon them, and let them be filthy still; and that those who are within may be kept within; that are holy, may be holy still. The door is shut, to separate between the precious and the vile, that sinners may no longer stand in the congregation of the righteous; then you shall return and discern between them. 2nd. A door of denial and exclusion. The door of mercy and grace hath long stood open to them, but they would not come in by it, would not be beholden to the favour of that door; they hoped to climb up some other way, and to get to heaven by their own merits. And therefore, when the Master of the house is risen up, he will justly shut that door; let them not expect to enter by it; but let them take their own measures. Thus when Noah was safe in the ark, God shut the door, to exclude all those that depended upon shelters of their own in the approaching flood.

3. Think how many, that were very confident they should be saved, will be rejected in the day of trial; and their confidences will deceive them; and you will say there are few that shall be saved, and we are all concerned to strive; considering,

1st. What an assurance they had of admission, and how far their hope carried them, even to heaven's gate; there they stand and knock; knock, as if they had authority; knock, as those that belong to the house, saying, "Lord, Lord, open to us," for we think we have a right to enter; take us in among the saved ones, for we joined ourselves to them. Note, Many are ruined by an ill-grounded hope of heaven, which they never distrusted or called in question, and therefore conclude their state is good, because they never doubted it. They call Christ "Lord," as if they were his servants; nay, in token of their importunity, they double it, "Lord, Lord." They are desirous now to enter in by that door which they had formerly made light of, would now gladly come in among those serious Christians whom they had secretly despised.

2nd. What grounds they had for this confidence. Let us see what their plea is, ver. 26. First, They had been Christ's guests, had had an intimate converse with him, and had shared in his favours; "we have eaten and drunk in thy presence," at thy table. Judas ate bread with Christ, dipped with him in the dish. Hypocrites, under the disguise of their external profession, receive the Lord's supper, and in it partake of the children's bread, as if they were children. Secondly, They had been Christ's hearers; had received instruction from him, and were well acquainted with his doctrine and law; "thou hast taught in our streets;" a distinguishing favour, which few had; and sure it might be taken as a pledge of distinguishing favour now; for wouldst thou teach us, and not save us?

xiii. 15. Lightfoot, Wetstein, and others have proved that the Jews were allowed on the Sabbath to water their cattle. According to the Talmud, a beast at such a time was to bear no burden but its collar and a halter. Water might be drawn and put into a trough, but not carried away from the pool, river, or well. The healing of the sick was not absolutely forbidden, but guarded by frivolous distinctions.

influence which was to work in the Church, and cause the corruption of the Christian faith and practice. More commonly and correctly, the leaven is regarded as symbolic of the spread of the Gospel in the world. We cannot endorse the view of Stier, that the three measures of meal refer to the descendants of the three sons of Noah, and also to the three ancient divisions of the world. Equally untenable is the view that the reference is to man, as made up of body, soul, and spirit. The word for measures seems to refer to the Hebrew seah

3rd. How their confidence will fail them, and all their pleas be rejected as frivolous. Christ will say to them, "I know you not whence you are," ver. 25; and again, ver. 26, "I tell you, I know you not; depart from me." He doth not deny but that which they pleaded was true, they had eaten and drunk in his presence, by the same token that they had no sooner eaten of his bread but they lift up the heel against him. He had taught in their streets, by the same token that they had despised his instruction, and would not submit to it. And therefore, First, He disowns them, "I know you not;" you do not belong to my family. "The Lord knows them that are his;" but them that are not, he doth not know; he has nothing to do with them: "I know you not whence you are." You are not of me, you are not from above, you are not branches of my house, of my vine. Secondly, He discards them: "Depart from me." It is the hell of hell to depart from Christ! the principal part of the misery of the damned. "Depart from my door; here is nothing for you, no, not a drop of water." Thirdly, He gives them such a character as is the reason of this doom: "Ye are workers of iniquity." This is their ruin, that under a pretence of piety they kept up secret haunts of sin, and did the devil's drudgery in Christ's livery. 4th. How terrible their punishment will be, ver. 28; "there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth;" the utmost degree of grief and indignation; and that which is the cause of it, and contributes to it, is a sight of the happiness of those that are saved; ye shall see "the patriarchs and prophets in the kingdom of God, and yourselves thrust out." Observe here, First, That the Old Testament saints are in the kingdom of God; those had benefit by the Messiah who died before his coming; for they saw his day at a distance, and it reflected comfort upon them. Secondly, That New Testament sinners will be thrust out of the kingdom of God. It intimates that they will be thrusting in, and will presume upon admission, but in vain; they shall be thrust out with shame, as having no part or lot in the matter. Thirdly, That the sight of the saints' glory will be a great aggravation of sinners' misery; they shall thus far see the kingdom of God, that they shall see the prophets in it, whom they hated and despised; and themselves, who thought themselves sure of it, thrust out. This is that at which they will gnash their teeth, Ps. cxii. 10.

4. Think who are they that shall be saved notwithstanding, ver. 29, 30; "they shall come from the east and the west; and the last shall be first."

1st. By what Christ had said, it appeared that but few should be saved of those that we think most likely, and that bid fairest for it: yet do not say then that the Gospel is preached in vain; for though Israel be not gathered, Christ will be glorious. There shall come many from all parts of the Gentile world, that shall be admitted into the kingdom of grace in this world, and of glory in the other. Plainly thus, when we come to heaven we shall meet a great many there whom we little thought to have met there, and miss a great many thence whom we verily expected to have found there.

2nd. Those that "sit down in the kingdom of God" are such as had taken pains to get thither, for they came from far, "from the east, and from the west; from the north, and from the south;" had passed through different climates, had broke through many difficulties and discouragements; which shews that they who would enter into that kingdom must strive, as the queen of Sheba, that "came from the utmost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon." They that travel now in the service of God and religion, shall sit down to rest shortly in the kingdom of God.

3rd. Many that stood fair for heaven came short; and others, that seemed cast behind, and thrown quite out of the way, will win and wear this prize; and therefore it concerns us to strive to enter. Let us be provoked, as Paul desired the Jews might be, to a holy emulation by the zeal and forwardness of the Gentiles, Rom. xi. 14. Shall I be outstripped by my juniors? Shall I, that started first, and stood nearest, miss of heaven, when others, less likely, enter into it? If it be got by striving, why should I not strive?

31 The same day there came certain of the Pharisees, saying unto him, Get thee out, and depart hence: for Herod will kill thee. 32 And he said unto them, Go ye, and tell that fox, Behold, I cast out devils, and I do cures to day and to morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected. 33 Nevertheless I must walk to day, and to morrow, and the day following: for it cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem. 34 O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not! 35 Behold, your house is left unto you desolate: and verily I say unto you, Ye shall not see me, until the time come when ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

Here is, First, A suggestion to Christ of his danger by Herod, now he was in Galilee, within Herod's jurisdiction, ver. 31; "certain of the Pharisees" (for there were those of that sect dispersed all the nation over) they came to Christ, pretending friendship and a concern for his safety, and said, "Get thee out" of this country, "and depart hence, for" otherwise "Herod will kill thee," as he did John. Some think those Pharisees had no ground at all for this; that drive him out of Galilee, where he had a great and growing interest, and to drive him into Judea, where they knew there were those that really sought his life; but Christ's answer being directed to Herod himself, it should seem the Pharisees had ground for what they said, and that Herod was enraged against Christ, and designed him a mischief for the honourable testimony he had borne to John Baptist, and to the doctrine of repentance, which John preached. Herod was willing to get rid of Christ out of his dominions; and when he durst not put him to death, he hoped to frighten him away by sending him this threatening message.

Secondly, His defiance of Herod's rage, and the Pharisees' too; he fears neither the one nor the other; "Go ye and tell that fox" &c. ver. 32. In calling him a fox, he gives him his true character; for he was subtle as a fox, noted for his craft, and treachery, and baseness, and prying, as they say of a fox, farthest from his own den; and though it be a black and ugly character, yet it did not ill become Christ to give it him, nor was it in him a violation of that law, "Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of the people;" for Christ was a prophet, and prophets always had a liberty of speech in reproving princes and great men: nay, Christ was more than a prophet, he was a king, he was King of kings, and the greatest of men were accountable to him; and therefore it became him to call this proud king by his own name; but it is not to be drawn into an example by us. Go and tell that fox, yea, and this fox too, — for so it is in the original — τινὸν ἀνθρώπου τσίφρα, — that Pharisee, whoever he is that whispers this in my ear, let him know that I do not fear him, nor regard his menaces; for,

1. I know I must die, and must die shortly; I expect it, and count upon it, "the third day," that is, very shortly; my hour is at hand. Note, It will help us very much above the fear of death, and of them that have the power of death, to make death familiar to us; to expect it, think of it, and converse with it, and see it at the door. If Herod should kill me, he will not surprise me.

2. I know that death will be not only no prejudice to me, but it will be my preferment; and therefore tell him I do not fear him; when I die "I shall be perfected;" I shall then have finished the hardest part of my undertaking; I shall have completed my business, τελειωθῶμαι, "I shall be consecrated." When Christ died, he is said to have sanctified himself: he consecrated himself to his priestly office with his own blood.

3. I know that neither he nor any one else can kill me till I have done my work. God, and tell him I value not his impotent rage. I will "cast out devils, and do cures, to day and to morrow," that is, now, and for some little space of time yet to come, in spite of him and all his threats. "I must walk;" I must go on in my intended journey; and it is not in his power to hinder me. I must go about, as I do now, preaching and healing, "to day, and to morrow, and the day following." Note, It is good for us to look upon the time we have before us as but a little; two or three days, perhaps, may be the utmost; that we may thereby be quickened to do the work of the day in its day. And it is a comfort to us, in reference to the power and malice of our enemies, that they can have no power to take us off, as long as God has any work for us to do. The witnesses were not slain till they had finished their testimony.

4. I know that Herod can do me no harm; not only because my time is not yet come, but because the place appointed for my death is Jerusalem, which is not within his jurisdiction; "it cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem;" that is, any where else but at Jerusalem. If a true prophet was put to death, he was prosecuted as a false prophet. Now none undertook to try prophets, and to judge concerning them, but the great Sanhedrim, which always sat at Jerusalem; it was a cause which the inferior courts did not take cognizance of; and therefore if a prophet be put to death, it must be at Jerusalem.

Thirdly, His lamentation for Jerusalem, and his denunciation of wrath against that city, ver. 34, 35. This we had, Mat. xxiii. 37–39; perhaps this was not said now in Galilee; but the evangelist, not designing to bring it in in its proper place, inserts it here, upon occasion of Christ's mentioning his being put to death at Jerusalem.

Note, 1. The wickedness of persons and places that more eminently than others profess religion and relation to God, is in a particular manner provoking and grieving to the Lord Jesus. How pathetically doth he speak of the sin and ruin of that holy city, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem."

2. Those that enjoy great plenty of the means of grace, if they are not provoked by them, many times are prejudiced against them. They that would not hearken to the prophets, nor welcome those whom God sent to them, killed them, and stoned them. If men's corruptions are not conquered, they are provoked.

3. Jesus Christ has shewed himself willing, freely willing, to receive and entertain poor souls that come to him, and put themselves under his protection: "How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathers her brood under her wings," with such care and such tenderness.

4. The reason why sinners are not protected and provided for by the Lord Jesus, as the chickens are by the hen, is because they will not. "I would," I often would, "and ye would not." Christ's willingness aggravates sinners' unwillingness, and leaves their blood upon their own heads.

5. The house that Christ leaves is left desolate. The temple, though richly adorned, though hugely frequented, yet is desolate, if Christ have deserted it. He leaves it to them; they had made an idol of it, and let them take it to themselves, and make their best of it; Christ will trouble it no more.

6. Christ justly withdraws from those that drive him from them. They would not be gathered by him, and therefore saith he, "You shall not see me;" you shall not hear me any more. As Moses said to Pharaoh when he forbade him his presence, Ex. x. 28, 29.

7. The judgment of the great day will effectually convince unbelievers, that would not now be convinced; then you will say, "Blessed is he that cometh," that is, will be glad to be among those that say so, and will not see me to be the Messiah till then, when it is too late.

CHAPTER XIV.

In this chapter we have, I. The cure which our Lord Jesus wrought upon a man that had the dropsy, on the sabbath day, and his justifying himself therein against those who were offended at his doing it on that day, ver. 1–6. II. A lesson of humility given to those who were ambitious of the highest rooms, ver. 7–11. III. A lesson of charity to those who feasted the rich, and did not feed the poor, ver. 12–14. IV. The success of the Gospel offer foretold, in the parable of the guests invited to a feast, signifying the rejection of the Jews and all others that set their hearts upon this world, and the entertainment of the Gentiles and all others that come empty of self to be filled with Christ, ver. 15–24. V. The great law of discipleship laid down, with a caution to all that will be Christ's disciples, to undertake it deliberately and with consideration, and particularly to ministers, to retain their savour, ver. 25–35.

AND it came to pass, as he went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees to eat bread on the sabbath day, that they watched him. 2 And, behold, there was a certain man before him which had the dropsy. 3 And Jesus answering spake unto which is said by Jahn to have been equal to about one English peck and a pint.

xiii. 23, 24. Note here how the idle curiosity of the inquisitive is dealt with. The questioner wants to know whether few will be saved, probably supposing such would be the case. Our Lord answers that many would come short of salvation. He does not say, with modern seep ic, that the majority would perish, or that only a minority would be saved, but gives an answer which goes home to the conscience.

Dr. Oosterzee says, "We may safely suppose that the inquirer was more or less surprised at the small number of the followers of Jesus; but he would certainly consider himself safe to inherit eternal life, according to the popular belief of the Jews, 'Every Israelite will have a portion in the world to come.'" The "strait gate" is the narrow gate, or, as a good various reading has it, "the narrow door."

xiii. 25. "The parable is not derived from a marriage-feast to which individuals come too late, but from a family, whose head, the lawyers and Pharisees, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath day? 4 And they held their peace. And he took him, and healed him, and let him go; 5 And answered them, saying, Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not straightway pull him out on the sabbath day? 6 And they could not answer him again to these things.

In this passage of story we find,

First. That "the Son of man came eating and drinking," conversing familiarly with all sorts of people; not declining the society of publicans, though they were of ill-fame, nor of Pharisees, though they bore him ill-will; but accepting the friendly invitations both of the one and of the other, that, if possible, he might do good to both. Here "he went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees," a ruler it may be, and a magistrate in his country, "to eat bread on the sabbath day," ver. 1. See how favourable God is to us, that he allows us time, even on his own day, for bodily refreshments; and how careful we should be not to abuse that liberty, or turn it into licentiousness. Christ went only to eat bread; to take such refreshment as was necessary, on the sabbath day. Our sabbath meals must, with a particular care, be guarded against all manner of excess. On sabbath days we must do as Moses and Jethro did, "eat bread before God," Ex. xviii. 12; and, as it is said of the primitive Christians, on the Lord's day must eat and drink as those that must pray again before we go to rest, that we may not be unfit for that.

Secondly. That he "went about doing good." Wherever he came he sought opportunities to do good, and not only improved those that fell in his way. Here "was a certain man before him, which had the dropsy," ver. 2. We do not find that he offered himself, or that his friends offered him, to be Christ's patient; but Christ prevented him with the blessings of his goodness, and before he called he answered him. Note, It is a happy thing to be where Christ is, to be present before him, though we be not presented to him. This man had the dropsy, it is probable in a high degree, and that he appeared much swelled with it; probably he was some relation of the Pharisees, that now lodged in his house, which is more likely than that he should be an invited guest at the table.

Thirdly. That he "endured the contradiction of sinners against himself," ver. 1, "they watched him." The Pharisee that invited him, it should seem, did it with a design to pick some quarrel with him. If it were so, Christ knew it, and yet went; for he knew himself a match for the most subtle of them, and how to order his steps, with an eye to his observers. Those that are watched had need to be wary. It was, as Dr. Hammond observes, contrary to all laws of hospitality to seek advantage against one that you invited to be your guest; for such a one you have taken under your protection. These lawyers and Pharisees, like the fowler that lies in wait to ensnare the birds, "held their peace," and acted very silently. When Christ asked them whether they thought it lawful to heal on the sabbath day, (and herein he is said to answer them, for it was an answer to their thoughts, and thoughts are words to Jesus Christ,) they would say neither yea nor no, for their design was to inform against him, not to be informed by him. They would not say it was lawful to heal, for then they would preclude themselves from imputing it to him as a crime; and yet the thing was so plain and self-evident that they could not for shame say it was not lawful. Note, Good men have often been persecuted for doing that which even their persecutors, if they would but give their consciences leave to speak out, could not but own to be lawful and good. Many a good work Christ did, for which they cast stones at him and his name.

Fourthly. That Christ would not be hindered from doing good by the opposition and contradiction of sinners; ver. 4, "he took him, and healed him, and let him go." Perhaps he took him aside into another room, and healed him there; because he would neither proclaim himself, such was his humility, nor provoke his adversaries, such was his wisdom, his meekness of wisdom. Note, Though we must not be driven off from our duty by the malice of our enemies, yet we should order the circumstances of it so as to make it the least offensive. Or, he took him, that is, he laid hands on him to cure him; ἐπιλαβόμενος, complezus, "he embraced him;" took him in his arms, big and unwieldy as he was, for so dropsical people used to be, and reduced him to shape. The cure of a dropsy, as much as of any disease, one would think should be gradual, yet Christ cured even that disease, perfectly cured it, in a moment. He then let him go, lest the Pharisees shall fall upon him for being healed, though he was purely passive; for what absurdities would not such men as they were be guilty of?

Fifthly. That our Lord Jesus did nothing but what he could justify, to the conviction and confusion of those that quarreled with him, ver. 5, 6. He still answered their thoughts, and made them hold their peace for shame, who before held their peace for subtlety, by an appeal to their own practice, as he had been used to do upon such occasions, that he might shew them how in condemning him they condemned themselves. "Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit," by accident, "and will not pull him out on the sabbath day?" and that straightway, not deferring it till the sabbath be over, lest it perish. Observe, It is not so much out of compassion to the poor creature that they do it, but a concern for their own interest. It is their own ass, and their own ass, that is worth money, that they will dispense with the law of the sabbath for the saving of. Now this was an evidence of their hypocrisy, and that it was not out of any real regard to the sabbath that they found fault with Christ for healing on the sabbath day, that was only the pretence; but really they were angry at the miraculous good works which Christ wrought; the proof he thereby gave of his Divine mission, and the interest he thereby gained among the people. Many can easily dispense with that for their own interest which they cannot dispense with for God's glory and the good of their brethren. This question silenced them, "they could not answer him again to these things," ver. 6. Christ will be justified when he speaks, and every mouth stopped before him.

7 And he put forth a parable to those which were bidden, when he marked how they chose out the chief rooms; saying unto them, 8 When thou art bidden of any man to a wedding, sit not down in the highest room; lest a more honourable man than thou be bidden of him; 9 And he that bade thee and him come and say to thee, Give this man place; and thou begin with shame to take the lowest room. 10 But when thou art bidden, go and sit down in the lowest room; that when he that bade thee cometh, he may say unto thee, Friend, go up higher: then shalt thou have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee. 11 For whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. 12 Then said he also to him that bade him, When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbours; lest they also bid thee again, and a recompence be made thee. 13 But when thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind: 14 And thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee: for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just.

Our Lord Jesus here sets us an example of profitable, edifying discourse at our tables, when we are in company with our friends. We find him, when he had none but his disciples, that were his own family, with him at his table, his discourse with them was "good, and to the use of edifying;" and not only so, but when he was in company with strangers, nay, with enemies that watched him, he took occasion to reprove what he saw amiss in them, and to instruct them; though the wicked were before him, he did not keep silence from good, as David did, Ps. xxxix. 1, 2; for notwithstanding the provocation given him, he had not his heart hot within him, nor was his spirit stirred. We must not only not allow any corrupt communication at our tables, such as that of the hypocritical mockers at feasts, but we must not content ourselves with common, harmless talk, but we should take occasion, from God's goodness to us at our tables, to speak well of him, and learn to spiritualize common things. The lips of the righteous should then feed many. Our Lord Jesus was among persons of quality; yet, as one that had not respect of persons,

First. He takes occasion to reprove the guests, for striving to sit uppermost, and from thence gives us a lesson of humility.

1. He observed how these lawyers and Pharisees affected the highest seats towards the head-end of the table, ver. 7. He had charged that sort of men with this in general, ch. xi.; here he brings home the charge to particular persons; for Christ will give every man his own. "He marked how they chose out the chief rooms;" every man, as he came in, got as near the best seat as he could. Note, Even in the common actions of life Christ's eye is upon us, and he marks what we do, not only in our religious assemblies, but at our tables, and makes remarks upon it.

2. He observed how those who were thus aspiring oftentimes exposed themselves, and came off with a slur; whereas those that were modest, and seated themselves in the lowest seats, oftentimes gained respect by it. 1st. Those that, when they come in, assume the highest seats, perhaps may be degraded, and forced to come down, to give place to one more honourable, ver. 8, 9. Note, It ought to check our high thoughts of ourselves, to think how many there are that are more honourable than we, not only in respect of worldly dignities, but personal merits and accomplishments. Instead of being proud that so many give place to us, it should be humbling to us that there are so many that we must give place to. The master of the feast will marshal his guests, and will not see the more honourable kept out of the seat that is his due, and therefore will make bold to take him lower that usurped it: "Give this man place;" and this will be a disgrace to him that would be thought more deserving than really he was, before all the company. Note, Pride will have shame, and will at last have a fall. 2nd. Those that, when they come in, content themselves with the lowest seats, are likely to be preferred, ver. 10. Go and seat thyself in the lowest room, as taking it for granted that thy friend who invited thee has guests to come that are of better rank and quality than thou art; but perhaps it may not prove so, and then it will be said to thee, "Friend, go up higher." The master of the feast will be so just to thee as not to keep thee at the lower end of the table, because thou wast so modest as to seat thyself there. Note, The way to rise high is to begin low, and this recommends a man to those about him. Thou shalt have honour and respect before those that sit with thee. They will see thee to be an honourable man, beyond what at first they thought, and honour appears the brighter for shining out of obscurity. And they will likewise see thee to be a humble man, which is the greatest honour of all. Our Saviour here refers to that advice of Solomon, Pr. xxv. 6, 7, "Stand not in the place of great men, for better it is that it be said unto thee, Come up hither, than that thou shouldst be put lower." And Dr. Lightfoot quotes a parable out of one of the rabbins, somewhat like this, "Three men," said he, "were bidden to a feast; one sat highest, for, said he, I am a prince; the other next, for, said he, I am a wise man; the other lowest, for, said he, I am a humble man. The king seated the humble man highest, and put the prince lowest."

3. He applied this generally, and would have us all learn not to mind high things, but to content ourselves with mean things; as for other reasons, so for this, because pride and ambition are disgraceful before men, for "whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased;" but humility and self-denial are really honourable; "he that humbleth himself shall be exalted," ver. 11. We see it in other instances, that "a man's pride will bring him low," but "honour shall uphold the humble in spirit; and before honour is humility."

Secondly. He takes occasion to reprove the master of the feast for inviting so many rich people, who had wherewithal to dine very well at home, when he should rather have invited the poor or, which was all one, have sent portions to them for whom nothing is prepared, and who could not afford themselves a good meal's meat: see Neh. viii. 10. And our Saviour here teacheth us, that having awaited as long as possible the return of such members of the household as were wandering about, now that the appointed time for admission is expired, inexorably refuses them entrance."

xiii. 31. It is apparent from this that Jesus was still within the territory which owned the jurisdiction of Herod the Tetrarch. We may doubt whether the Pharisees really meant that Herod wished to kill Christ, or whether they said so in order to persuade him to leave them.

xiii. 32. That the word "fox" here applies to Herod, and refers to his craft and cunning, is generally admitted. Grotius and others show that he well deserved the epithet; and it may be added that "fox" is employed in a similar way by several ancient writers. It has been objected that our Lord committed a breach of courtesy on this occasion; but we must remember that the customs of that age differed much from ours, that the answer was applicable, and that it was quite in accordance with Oriental notions.

the using of what we have in works of charity is better, and will turn to a better account, than using it in works of generosity, and in magnificent house-keeping.

1. Covet not to treat the rich, ver. 12; invite not thy friends, and brethren, and neighbours, that are rich. This doth not prohibit the entertaining of such, when there may be occasion for it, for the cultivating of friendship among relations and neighbours; but, 1st. Do not use it; spend as little as thou canst that way, that thou mayest not disabie thyself to lay out a much better way, in almsgiving. Thou wilt find it very expensive and troublesome; one feast for the rich will make a great many meals for the poor. Solomon saith, "He that giveth to the rich shall surely come to want," Pr. xxii. 16. "Give," saith Pliny, Epist., "to thy friends, but let it be to thy poor friends, not to those that need thee not." 2nd. Be not proud of it. Many make feasts only to make a show, as Ahasuerus did, Est. i. 3, 4; and it is no reputation to them, they think, if they have not persons of quality to dine with them, and thus rob their families to please their fancies. 3rd. Aim not at being paid again in your own coin. This is that which our Saviour blames: In making such entertainments, you commonly do it in hopes you will be invited by them, and so a recompence will be made you; you will be gratified with such dainties and varieties as you treat your friends with, and this will feed your sensuality and luxury, and you will be no real gainer at last.

2. Be forward to relieve the poor, ver. 13, 14; "when thou makest a feast," instead of furnishing thyself with what is rare and nice, get thy table spread with a competency of plain and wholesome meat, which will not be so costly, and invite the poor and maimed; such as have nothing to live upon, nor are able to work for their living. These are objects of charity; they want necessities; furnish them, and they will recompense thee with their prayers; they will commend thy provisions, which the rich, it may be, will despise. They will go away and thank God for thee, when the rich will go away and reproach thee. Say not thou art a loser, because they cannot recompense thee, thou art so much out of pocket; no, it is so much set out to the best interest, on the best security, for "thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." There will be a resurrection of the just, a future state of the just. There is a state of happiness reserved for them in the other world; and we may be sure the charitable will be remembered in the resurrection of the just, for alms are righteousness. Works of charity perhaps may not be rewarded in this world, for the things of this world are not the best things, and therefore God doth not pay the best men in those things; but they shall in no wise lose their reward; they shall be recompensed in the resurrection. And it will be found that the longest voyages make the richest returns, and the charitable will be no losers, but unspeakable gainers, by having their recompence adjourned till the resurrection.

15 And when one of them that sat at meat with him heard these things, he said unto him, Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God. 16 Then said he unto him, A certain man made a great supper, and bade many: 17 And sent his servant at supper time to say to them that were bidden, Come; for all things are now ready. 18 And they all with one consent began to make excuse. The first said unto him, I have bought a piece of ground, and I must needs go and see it: I pray thee have me excused. 19 And another said, I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I go to prove them: I pray thee have me excused. 20 And another said, I have married a wife, and therefore I cannot come. 21 So that servant came, and shewed his lord these things. Then the master of the house being angry said to his servant, Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor, and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind. 22 And the servant said, Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded, and yet there is room. 23 And the lord said unto the servant, Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled. 24 For I say unto you, That none of those men which were bidden shall taste of my supper.

Here is another discourse of our Saviour's, in which he spiritualizeth the feast he was invited to; which is another way of keeping up good discourse in the midst of common actions.

1. The occasion of the discourse was given by one of the guests, who, when Christ was giving rules about feasting, said to him, "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God," ver. 15, which some tell us was a saying commonly used among the rabbins. But with what design doth this man bring it in here? 1. Perhaps this man, observing that Christ reproved, first the guests, and then the master of the house, fearing he should put the company out of humour, started this, to divert the discourse to something else. Or, 2. Admiring the good rules of humility and charity which Christ had now given, but despairing to see them lived up to in the present degenerate state of things, he longs for the kingdom of God, when these and other good laws shall obtain, and pronounceth them blessed who shall have a place in that kingdom. Or, 3. Christ having mentioned the resurrection of the just, as a recompence for acts of charity to the poor, he here confirms what he had said, 'Yea, Lord, they that shall be recompensed in the resurrection of the just shall eat bread in the kingdom, and that is a greater recompence than being reinvited to the table of the greatest man on earth.' Or, 4. Observing Christ to be silent after he had given the foregoing lessons, he was willing to draw him in again to farther discourse, so wonderfully well pleased was he with what he said; and he knew nothing more likely to engage him than to mention the kingdom of God. Note, Those that are not of ability to carry on good discourse themselves, yet ought to put in a word now and then to countenance it, and help it forward.

Now that which this man said was a plain and acknowledged truth, and it was quoted very appositely now they were sitting at meat; for we should take occasion from common things to think and speak of those heavenly and spiritual things which in Scripture are compared to them; for that is one end of borrowing similitudes from them. And it will be good for us, when we are receiving the gifts of God's providence, to pass through them to the consideration of the gifts of his grace, those better things. This thought will be very seasonable when we are partaking of bodily refreshments, "Blessed are they that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God." 1st. In the kingdom of grace, in the kingdom of the Messiah, which was expected now shortly to be set up. Christ promised his disciples that they should eat and drink with him in his kingdom. They that partake of the Lord's supper eat bread in the kingdom of God. 2nd. In the kingdom of glory, at the resurrection. The happiness of heaven is an everlasting feast; blessed are they that shall sit down at that table, whence they shall rise no more.

II. The parable which our Lord Jesus put forth upon this occasion, ver. 16, &c. Christ joins with the good man in what he said; 'It is very true, blessed are they that shall partake of the privileges of the Messiah's kingdom. But who are they that shall enjoy that privilege? You Jews, that think to have the monopoly of it, will generally reject it, and the Gentiles will be the greatest sharers in it.' This he shews by a parable, for if he had spoken it plainly the Pharisees would not have borne it. Now in the parable we may observe,

First. The free grace and mercy of God shinning in the Gospel of Christ. It appears, 1. In the rich provision he has made for poor souls, for their nourishment, refreshment, and entertainment, ver. 16: "A certain rich man made a great supper." There is that in Christ and the grace of the Gospel which will be food and a feast for the soul of man, that knows its own capacities; for the soul of a sinner, that knows its own necessities and miseries. It is called a supper, because in those countries supper time was the chief feasting time, when the business of the day was over. The manifestation of the gospel grace to the world was the evening of the world's day; and the fruition of the fullness of that grace in heaven is reserved for the evening of our day. 2. In the gracious invitation given us to come and partake of this provision. Here is, 1st. A general invitation given, he "bade many." Christ invited the whole nation and people of the Jews to partake of the benefits of his Gospel. There is provision enough for as many as come; it was prophesied of as a feast for all people, Isa. xxv. 6. Christ, in the Gospel, as he keeps a good house, so he keeps an open house. 2nd. A particular memorandum given when the supper time was at hand; the servant was sent round to put them in mind of it, "Come, for all things are now ready." When the Spirit was poured out, and the gospel church planted, those who before were invited were more closely pressed to come in presently. Now all things are ready, the full discovery of the gospel mystery is now made, all the ordinances of the Gospel are now instituted, the society of Christians is now incorporated, and, which crowns all, the Holy Ghost is now given. This is the call now given to us: "All things are now ready," "now is the accepted time;" it is now, and has not been long; it is now, and will not be long; it is a season of grace, that will be soon over; and therefore come now; do not delay; accept the invitation; believe yourselves welcome; "eat, O friends; drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved."

Secondly. The cold entertainment which the grace of the Gospel meets with. The invited guests declined coming; they did not say flat and plain they would not come, but "they all with one consent began to make excuse," ver. 18. One would have expected they should all with one consent have come to a good supper, when they were so kindly invited to it; who would have refused such an invitation? Yet, on the contrary, they all found out some pretence or other to shift off their attendance. This speaks the general neglect of the Jewish nation to close with Christ, and accept of the offers of his grace, and the contempt they put upon the invitation. It speaks also the backwardness there is in most people to close with the gospel call. They cannot for shame avow their refusal, but they desire to be excused; they all ἀπό μίας, some supply ἀπορίας,—all straightway; they could give an answer extempore, and needed not to study for it; were not to seek for an excuse. Others supply ἑνήμετος, they were unanimous in it, 'with one voice.'

1. Here, two were purchasers, and were in such haste to go see their purchases, that they could not find time to go to this supper. One had purchased land, he had bought a piece of ground, which was represented to him to be a good bargain, and he must needs go see whether it was so or no, and therefore "I pray thee have me excused." His heart was so much upon the enlarging of his estate, that he could neither be civil to his friend nor kind to himself. Note, Those that have their hearts full of the world, and fond of laying house to house, and field to field, have their ears deaf to the gospel invitation. But what a frivolous excuse was this! He might have deferred going to see his piece of ground till the next day, and have found it in the same place and plight it was now in, if he had so pleased. Here was another had purchased stock for his land, "I have bought five yoke of oxen" for the plough, and I must just now go prove them, must go try whether they be fit for my purpose, and therefore excuse me for this time. The former intimates that inordinate complacency in the world, this, that inordinate care and concern about the world, which keeps people from Christ and his grace; both intimate a preference given to the body above the soul, and to the things of time above those of eternity. Note, It is an ill thing, when we are called to any duty, to make excuses for our neglect of it. It is a sign there are convictions that it is a duty, but no inclination to it. These things here, that were the matter of the excuses, were, 1st. Little things, and of small concern. It had better become them to have said, 'I am invited to eat bread in the kingdom of God, and therefore must be excused from going to see the ground or the oxen.' 2nd. Lawful things. Note, Things lawful in themselves, when the heart is too much set upon them, prove fatal hindrances in religion,—licitis perimus omnes. It is a hard matter so to manage our worldly affairs that they may not divert us from spiritual pursuits; and this ought to be our great care.

2. Here was one that was newly married, and could not leave his wife to go out to supper, nor, not for once, ver. 20: "I have married a wife, and therefore," in short, "I cannot come." He pretends he cannot, when the truth is he will not. Thus many pretend inability for the duties of religion, when really they have an aversion to them. He has married a wife; it is true, he that was married was excused by the law from going to war for the first year, Deu. xxiv. 5; but would that excuse him from going up to the feasts of the Lord, which all the males were yearly to attend? Much less will it excuse from the gospel feast, which the other were but types of. Note, Our affection to our relations often proves a hindrance to us in our duty to God. Adam's xiii. 33. The sense of the first clause is, "Nevertheless I must continue my journey to-day, and to-morrow, and the day following." He would not take to flight, but go on his way towards Jerusalem itself. The words rendered "it cannot be that," &c., convey much the same idea as "a prophet, who must needs perish, cannot do so away from Jerusalem." Our Lord refers to the fact that prophets who had been condemned by unjust judges had perished for the most part at Jerusalem.

xiv. 7. Dr. Justin Perkins describes a Persian wedding to which he was once invited. The ordinary residence of the father-in-law was given up to the ladies, and the gentlemen were entertained at the brother's house next door. The guest chamber was spacious, and elegantly carpeted. A row of nobles sat shoulder to shoulder round the room. At the head were the principal person and the chief guests, then came the rest on the right and left, in descending order, according to their station. The utmost precision is observed in excuse was, 'the woman that thou gavest me persuaded me to eat;' this here was, 'the woman persuaded me not to eat.' He might have gone, and taken his wife along with him; they should both have been welcome.

Thirdly. The account which was brought to the master of the feast of the affront put upon him by his friends whom he had invited, who now shewed how little they valued him; ver. 21, "That servant came and shewed his lord these things;" told him with surprise that he was likely to sup alone, for the guests that were invited, though they had had timely notice a good while before, that they might order their affairs accordingly, yet were now engaged to some other business. He made the matter neither better nor worse, but related it just as it was. Note, Ministers must give account of the success of their ministry. They must do it now at the throne of grace; if they see of the travail of their soul, they must go to God with their thanks; if they labour in vain, they must go to God with their complaints. They will do it hereafter at the judgment-seat of Christ; they shall be produced as witnesses against those who persist and perish in their unbelief to prove that they were fairly invited; and for those who accepted the call, "Behold, I and the children thou hast given me." The apostle urges this as a reason why people should give ear to the Word of God, sent them by his ministers, "for they watch for your souls, as those that must give account," Heb. xiii. 17.

Fourthly. The master's just resentment of this affront: "he was angry," ver. 21. Note, The ingratitude of those that slight gospel offers, and the contempt they put upon the God of heaven thereby, is a very great provocation to him, and justly so. Abused mercy turns into the greatest wrath. The doom he passed upon them was, "none of the men that were bidden shall taste of my supper." This was like the doom passed upon ungrateful Israel, when they despised the pleasant land, "God swore in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest." Note, Grace despised, is grace forfeited, like Esau's birthright. They that will not have Christ when they may, shall not have him when they would. Even those that were bidden, if they slight the invitation, shall be forbidden; when the door is shut, the foolish virgins will be denied entrance.

Fifthly. The care that was taken to furnish the table with guests, as well as meat. Go, saith he to the servants, Go first "into the streets and lanes of the city," and invite, not the merchants, that are going from the custom-house, or the tradesmen, that are shutting up their shops, they will desire to be excused: one is going to his counting-house to cast up his books, another to the tavern to drink a bottle with his friend; but that you may invite those that will be glad to come, "bring in hither the poor, and the maimed, the halt, and the blind;" pick up the common beggars. The servants object not that it will be a disparagement to the master and his house to have such guests at his table, for they knew his mind, and they soon gather enough such guests; "Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded." Many of the Jews are brought in, not of the scribes and Pharisees, such as Christ was now at dinner with, who thought themselves most likely to be guests at the Messiah's table, but publicans and sinners; these are "the poor and the maimed." But "yet there is room" for more guests, and provision enough for them all. Go, then, "into the highways and hedges;" go out into the country, and pick up the vagrants, or those that are returning now in the evening from their work in the field, from hedging and ditching there, "and compel them to come in," not by force of arms, but by force of arguments; be earnest with them, for in this case it would be necessary to convince them that the invitation was sincere, and not a banter; they will be shy and modest, and will hardly believe that they shall be welcome, and therefore be importunate with them, and do not leave them till you have prevailed with them. This refers to the calling of the Gentiles, to whom the apostles were to turn when the Jews refused the offer, and with them the church was filled.

Now observe here, 1. That the provision made for precious souls in the Gospel of Christ shall appear not to have been made in vain; for if some reject it, yet others will thankfully accept the offer of it. Christ comforts himself with this, that though Israel be not gathered, yet he shall be glorious, as a light to the Gentiles, Isa. xlii. 5, 6. God will have a church in the world, though there are those that are unchurched, for the unbelief of man shall not make the promise of God of none effect. 2. Those that are very poor and low in the world, shall be as welcome to Christ as the rich and great; nay, and many times the Gospel has greatest success among those that labour under worldly disadvantages, as "the poor," and bodily infirmities, as "the maimed, and the halt, and the blind." Christ here plainly refers to what he had said just before, in direction to us, to invite to our tables "the poor, and maimed, the lame, and blind," ver. 13. For the consideration of the countenance which Christ's Gospel gives to the poor, should engage us to be charitable to them. His condescensions and compassions towards them should engage ours. 3. Many times the Gospel hath the greatest success among those that are least likely to have the benefit of it, and whose submission to it was least expected. The publicans and harlots went into the kingdom of God before the scribes and Pharisees; "so the last shall be first, and the first last." Let us not be confident concerning those that are most forward, nor despair of those that are least promising. 4. Christ's ministers must be both very expeditious and very importunate in inviting to the Gospel feast. "Go out quickly," ver. 21, lose no time, because "all things are now ready;" call to them to come "to-day, while it is called to-day;" and "compel them to come in," by speaking them fair, and drawing them with the cords of a man, and the bands of love. Nothing can be more absurd than fetching an argument from hence for compelling men's consciences, nay, for compelling men against their consciences, in matters of religion. You shall receive the Lord's supper, or you shall be fined and imprisoned, and ruined in your estate. Certainly nothing like this was the compulsion here meant, but only that of reason and love; for "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal." 5. Though many have been brought in to partake of the benefits of the Gospel, yet still there is room for more; for the riches of Christ are unsearchable and inexhaustible; there is in him enough for all, and enough for each; and the Gospel excludes none that do not exclude themselves. 6. Christ's house, though it be large, it shall at last be filled; it will be so when the number of the elect is completed, and as many as were given him are brought to him.

25 And there went great multitudes with him: and he turned, and said unto them, 26 If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple. 27 And whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple. 28 For which of you, intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it? 29 Lest haply, after he hath laid the foundation, and is not able to finish it, all that behold it begin to mock him, 30 Saying, This man began to build, and was not able to finish. 31 Or what king, going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? 32 Or else, while the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an ambassage, and desireth conditions of peace. 33 So likewise, whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple. 34 Salt is good: but if the salt have lost his savour, wherewith shall it be seasoned? 35 It is neither fit for the land, nor yet for the dunghill; but men cast it out. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

See how Christ in his doctrine suited himself to those to whom he spake, and gave every one their portion of meat. To Pharisees he preached humility and charity. He is in these verses directing his discourse to the multitudes that crowded after him, and seemed zealous in following him, and his exhortation to them is to understand the terms of discipleship before they undertook the profession of it, and to consider what they did. See here.

I. How zealous people were in their attendance on Christ: ver. 25, "there went great multitudes with him," many for love, and more for company; for where there are many there will be more. Here was a mixed multitude, like that which went with Israel out of Egypt; such we must expect there will always be in the church, and it will therefore be necessary that ministers should carefully separate between the precious and the vile.

II. How considerate he would have them to be in their zeal. Those that undertake to follow Christ must count upon the worst, and prepare accordingly.

First. He tells them what the worst is they must count upon; much the same with what he had gone through before them, and for them. He takes it for granted they had a mind to be his disciples, that they might be qualified for preferment in his kingdom. They expected he should say, If any man come to me, and be my disciple, he shall have wealth and honour in abundance, let me alone to make him a great man; but he tells them the quite contrary.

1. That they must be willing to quit that which was very dear, and therefore must come to him thoroughly weaned from all their creature comforts, and dead to them, so as cheerfully to part with them, rather than quit their interest in Christ, ver. 26. A man cannot be Christ's disciple, he will not be constant and persevering, unless he love Christ better than any thing in this world, and be willing to part with that which he may and must leave, either as a sacrifice, when Christ may be glorified by our parting with it,—so the martyrs who loved not their lives to death,—or as a temptation, when, by our parting with it, we are put into a better capacity of serving Christ: thus Abraham parted with his own country, and Moses with Pharaoh's court. Mention is not made here of houses and lands; philosophy will teach a man to look upon those with contempt; but Christianity carries it higher. 1st. Every good man loves his relations; and yet if he be a disciple of Christ, he must comparatively hate them, must love them less than Christ, as Leah is said to be hated when Rachel was better loved. Not that their persons must be in any degree hated, but our comfort and satisfaction in them must be lost and swallowed up in our love to Christ, as Levi's was, when he said to his father, "I have not seen him," Deu. xxiii. 9. When our duty to our parents comes in competition with our evident duty to Christ, we must give Christ the preference. If we must either deny Christ, or be banished from our families and relations, (as many of the primitive Christians were,) we must rather lose their society than his favour. 2nd. Every man loves his own life, no man ever yet hated it; and we cannot be Christ's disciples if we do not love him better than our own lives, so as rather to have our lives embittered by cruel bondage, nay, and taken away by cruel deaths, than to dishonour Christ, or depart from any of his truths and ways. The experience of the pleasures of the spiritual life, and the believing hopes and prospects of eternal life, will make this hard saying easy. When tribulation and persecution arise because of the Word, then chiefly the trial is whether we love better Christ or our relations and lives; yet even in days of peace this matter is sometimes brought to the trial. Those that decline the service of Christ, and opportunities of converse with him, and are ashamed to confess him, for fear of disobliging a relation or friend, or losing a customer, give cause to suspect they love them better than Christ.

2. That they must be willing to bear that which was very heavy: ver. 27, "whosoever doth not bear his cross," as those did that were condemned to be crucified, in submission to the sentence, and in expectation of the execution of it, and so "come after me," whithersoever I shall lead him, he "cannot be my disciple;" that is, saith Dr. Hammond, "he is not for my turn; and my service, being so sure to bring persecution along with it, will not be for his. Though the disciples of Christ are not all crucified, yet they all bear their cross, as if they counted upon being crucified. They must be content to be put into an ill name, and to be loaded with infamy and disgrace; for no name is more ignominious than furcifer,—"the bearer of the gibbet." He must bear his cross, and come after Christ: that is, he must bear it in the way of his duty, whenever it lies in that way. He must bear it when Christ calls him to it; and in bearing it he must have an eye to Christ, and fetch encouragements from him, and live in hope of a recompence with him.

Secondly. He bids them count upon it, and then consider of it. Since he has been so just to us as to tell us plainly what difficulties we shall meet with in following him, let us be so just to ourselves as to weigh the matter seriously before we take upon us a profession of religion. Joshua obliged the people to consider what they did when they promised to serve the Lord, Jos. xxiv. 18.

Persia, says Dr. Perkins; so that the company being seated according to rank, gives peculiar vividness to this passage of Scripture.

xiv. 12. The injunction, "call not (or invite not) thy friends," &c., affords another illustration of an idiom not unfrequent in the New Testament, by which a negative injunction is used in a comparative sense. Jesus never meant that men should not work, when he said, "Labour not for the meat that perisheth, but," &c. So here he does not intend that kindred and friends should not be invited, so much as that they were not to be the only objects of favour; and that in some senses it was less important to entertain them than others who might be more in need of generosity, and less able to return it in the same form.

xiv. 23. The words rendered "compel them to come in" have been abused by being made to justify the coercion of so-called heretics. The Rhemish version of the New Testament says on these words, "St. Augustine referreth this compelling to the penal laws

CHAPTER XV.

It is better never begin than not proceed; and therefore, before we begin, we must consider what it is to proceed. This is to act rationally, and as becomes men, and as we do in other cases. And the cause of Christ will bear a scrutiny. Satan shews the best, but hides the worst, because his best will not countervail his worst; but Christ's will abundantly. Thus considering of the case is necessary to perseverance, especially in suffering times. Our Saviour here illustrates the necessity of it by two similitudes: the former shewing that we must consider the expenses of our religion; the latter, that we must consider the perils of it.

1. When we take upon us a profession of religion, we are like a man that undertakes to build a tower, and therefore must consider the expense of it; ver. 28-30, "Which of you intending to build a tower, or stately house, for himself, sitteth not down first and counteth the cost?" and he must be sure to count upon a great deal more than his workmen will tell him it will lie him in; let him compare the charge with his purse, lest he make himself to be laughed at, by beginning to build what he is not able to finish. Note, 1st. All that take upon them a profession of religion, undertake to build a tower, not as the tower of Babel, in opposition to Heaven, which therefore was left unfinished, but in obedience to Heaven, which therefore shall have its top stone brought forth. Begin low, and lay the foundation deep; lay it on the rock, and make sure work, and then aim as high as heaven. 2nd. Those that intend to build this tower, must "sit down and count the cost;" let them consider, it will cost them the mortifying of their sins, even the most beloved lusts; it will cost them a life of self-denial and watchfulness, and a constant course of holy duties: it may perhaps cost them their reputation among men, their estates and liberties, and all that is dear to them in this world, even life itself. And if it cost us all this, what is it in comparison with what it cost Christ to purchase the advantages of religion for us, which come to us without money and price? 3rd. Many that begin to build this tower do not go on with it, nor persevere in it, and it is their folly; they have not courage and resolution, have not a rooted, fixed principle, and so bring nothing to pass. It is true we have none of us in ourselves sufficient to finish this tower: but Christ hath said, "My grace is sufficient for thee;" and that grace shall not be wanting to any of us, if we seek for it, and make use of it. Nothing is more shameful than for those that have begun well in religion to break off; every one will justly mock him, as having lost all his labour hitherto for want of perseverance. We lose the things we have wrought, 2 Jno. 8, and all we have done and suffered is in vain, Gal. iii. 4, 5.

2. When we undertake to be Christ's disciples, we are like a man that goes to war, and therefore must consider the hazard of it, and the difficulties that are to be encountered, ver. 31, 32. A king that proclaims war with a neighbouring prince, considers whether he have strength wherewith to make his part good; and if not, he will lay aside his thoughts of war. Note, 1st. The state of a Christian in this world is a military state. Is not the Christian life a warfare? We have many passes in our way that must be disputed with dint of sword; nay, we must fight every step we go, so restless are our spiritual enemies in their opposition. 2nd. We ought to consider whether we can endure the hardness which a good soldier of Jesus Christ must expect and count upon, before we list ourselves under Christ's banner; whether we are able to encounter the forces of hell and earth, which come against us twenty thousand strong. 3rd. Of the two, it is better make the best terms we can with the world than pretend to renounce it, and afterwards, when tribulation and persecution ariseth because of the Word, to return to it. That young man that could not find in his heart to part with his possessions for Christ, did better to go away from Christ sorrowing, than to have stayed with him dissembling.

This parable is another way applicable, and may be taken as designed to teach us to begin speedily to be religious, rather than to begin cautiously, and may mean the same with Mat. v. 25, "agree with thine adversary quickly." Note, 1st. Those that persist in sin make war against God, the most unnatural, unjustifiable war; they rebel against their lawful sovereign, whose government is perfectly just and good. 2nd. The proudest and most daring sinner is no equal match for God; the disproportion of strength is much greater than that here supposed between ten thousand and twenty thousand. "Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? Are we stronger than he?" No, sure; "who knows the power of his anger?" In consideration of this, it is our interest to make peace with him: we need not send to desire conditions of peace; they are offered to us, and are unexceptionable, and highly to our advantage; let us acquaint ourselves with them, and be at peace; do this in time, "while the other is yet a great way off," for delays in such a case are highly dangerous, and make after applications difficult.

But the application of this parable here, ver. 33, is to the consideration that ought to be when we take upon us a profession of religion. Solomon saith, "with good advice make war," Pr. xx. 18; for he that draws the sword, throws away the scabbard; so, with good advice enter upon a profession of religion, as those that know that except you forsake all you have, you cannot be Christ's disciples; that is, except you count upon forsaking all, and consent to it; for all that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution, and yet continue to live godly.

Thirdly, He warns them against apostasy and a degeneracy of mind from the truly Christian spirit and temper, for that would make them utterly useless, ver. 34, 35. 1. Good Christians are the salt of the earth, and good ministers especially, Mat. v. 13, and this salt is good, and of great use; by their instructions and examples they season all they converse with, to keep them from putrefying, and to quicken them and make them savoury. 2. Degenerate Christians, that, rather than part with what they have in the world, will throw up their profession, and then of course become carnal and worldly, and wholly destitute of a Christian spirit, they are like salt that has lost its savour; like that which chemists call the caput mortuum, that has all its salts drawn from it, that is the most useless, worthless thing in the world; it has no manner of virtue or good property in it. 1st. It can never be recovered: "wherewith shall it be seasoned?" You cannot salt it: this intimates that it is extremely difficult, and next to impossible, to recover an apostate, Heb. vi. 4-6. If Christianity will not prevail to cure men of their worldliness and sensuality, if that remedy have been tried in vain, their case must even be concluded desperate. 2nd. It is of no use; it is not fit, as dung is, for the land, to manure that, nor will it be the better if it be laid in the dunghill to rot—there is nothing to be got out of it. A professor of religion, whose mind and manners are depraved, is the most insipid animal that can be. If he do speak of the things of God, which he hath had some knowledge of, it is so awkwardly that none are the better for it: it is a parable in the mouth of a fool. 3rd. It is abandoned: "men cast it out" as that which they will have no more to do with. Such scandalous professors ought to be cast out of the church, not only because they have forfeited all the honours and privileges of their church membership, but because there is danger that others will be infected by them. Our Saviour concludes this with a call to all to take notice of it, and to take warning: "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Now, can the faculty of hearing be better employed than in attending to the Word of Christ; and particularly to the alarms he has given us, of the danger we are in of apostasy, and the danger we run ourselves into by apostasy?

which Catholic princes do justly use against heretics and schismatics, proving that they who are by their former profession and baptism subject to the Catholic Church, and are departed from the same after other sects, may and ought to be compelled into the unity and society of the universal Church again. . . . They promised in baptism, and therefore are to be revoked, not only by gentle means, but by just punishment also." The doctrine of persecuting heretics, thus explained, has often been applied, though to infer it from this text Evil manners, we say, beget good laws; so in this chapter, the murmuring of the scribes and Pharisees at the grace of Christ, and the favour he shewed to publicans and sinners, gave occasion for a more full discovery of that grace than perhaps otherwise we should have had, in these three parables which we have in this chapter; the scope of all which is the same, to shew, not only what God had said and sworn in the Old Testament, that he had no pleasure in the death and ruin of sinners, but that he has great pleasure in their return and repentance, and rejoiceth in the gracious entertainment he gives them thereupon. Here is, 1. The offence which the Pharisees took at Christ for conversing with heathen men and publicans, and preaching his Gospel to them, ver. 1, 2. 11. His justifying himself in it by the design and proper tendency of it, and which with many had been the effect of it, and that was, the bringing of them to repent and reform their lives, than which there could not be a more pleasing and acceptable service done to God; which he shews in the parable, 1. Of the lost sheep that was brought home with joy, ver. 4-7; 2. Of the lost silver that was found with joy, ver. 8-10; 3. Of the lost son that had been a prodigal, but returned to his father's house, and was received with great joy, though his elder brother, like these scribes and Pharisees, was offended at it, ver. 11-32.

HEN drew near unto him all the publicans and sinners for to hear him. 2 And the Pharisees and scribes murmured, saying, This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them. 3 And he spake this parable unto them, saying, 4 What man of you, having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it? 5 And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing. 6 And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbours, saying unto them, Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost. 7 I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance. 8 Either what woman having ten pieces of silver, if she lose one piece, doth not light a candle, and sweep the house, and seek diligently till she find it? 9 And when she hath found it, she calleth her friends and her neighbours together, saying, Rejoice with me; for I have found the piece which I had lost. 10 Likewise, I say unto you, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.

Here is, 1. The diligent attendance of the publicans and sinners upon Christ's ministry. Great multitudes of Jews went with him, ch. xiv. 25, with such an assurance of admission into the kingdom of God, that he found it requisite to say that to them which would shake their vain hopes; here multitudes of publicans and sinners drew near to him, with a humble, modest fear of being rejected by him, and to them he found it requisite to give encouragement, especially because there were some haughty, supercilious people that frowned upon them. The publicans, that collected the tribute paid to the Romans, were perhaps some of them ill men, but they were all industriously put into an ill name, because of the prejudices of the Jewish nation against their office; they are sometimes ranked with harlots, Mat. xxi. 31, here and elsewhere with sinners, such as were openly vicious, that traded with harlots, known rakes. Some think the sinners here were heathen, and that Christ was now on the other side Jordan, or in Galilee of the Gentiles. These drew near, when perhaps the multitude of the Jews that had followed him were, upon his discourse in the close of the foregoing chapter, dropped off; thus afterwards the Gentiles took their turn in hearing the apostles, when the Jews had rejected them. They drew near to hear him, being afraid of drawing nearer than just to come within hearing. They drew near to him, not as some did, for curiosity, to see him, nor as others did, to solicit for cures, but to hear his excellent doctrine. Note, In all our approaches to Christ, this we must have in our eye, to hear him, to hear the instructions he gives us, and his answers to our prayers.

11. The offence which the scribes and Pharisees took at this, ver. 2; they murmured, and turned it to the reproach of our Lord Jesus, "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them." 1. They were angry that publicans and heathen had the means of grace allowed them, were called to repent, and encouraged to hope for pardon upon repentance; for they looked upon their case as desperate, and that none but Jews had the privilege of repenting and being pardoned, though the prophets preached repentance to the nations, and Daniel particularly to Nebuchadnezzar. 2. They thought it a disparagement to Christ, and inconsistent with the dignity of his character, to make himself familiar with such sort of people, to admit them into his company, and to eat with them. They could not for shame condemn him for preaching to them, though that violates the first principles of sound criticism. Whatever the words mean in themselves, they are part of a parable, and as such they must be taken parabolically. Besides, the only service acceptable to God is willing service, which men will not and cannot render who are driven to a church like sheep to a fold. It might be consistent with Oriental rules to force men to a feast, but it is only consistent with a spiritual religion to employ moral influences.

xiv. 26. Here and elsewhere our Lord seems to use the word was the thing they were most enraged at, and therefore they reproached him for eating with them, which was more expressly contrary to the tradition of the elders. Censure will fall not only upon the most innocent and the most excellent persons, but upon the most innocent and most excellent actions, and we must not think it strange.

III. Christ's justifying of himself in it, by shewing that the worse these people were to whom he preached, the more glory would redound to God, and the more joy there would be in heaven, if, by his preaching, they were brought to repentance. It would be a more pleasing sight in heaven to see Gentiles brought to the worship of the true God, than to see Jews go on in it; and to see publicans and sinners live an orderly sort of life, than to see scribes and Pharisees go on in living such a life. This he here illustrates by two parables, the reddition of both which is the same.

First. The parable of the lost sheep. Something like it we had Mat. xviii. 12; there it was designed to shew the care God takes for the preservation of saints, as a reason why we should not offend them; here it is designed to shew the pleasure God takes in the conversion of sinners, as a reason why we should rejoice in it. We have here,

1. The case of a sinner that goes on in sinful ways; he is like a lost sheep, a sheep gone astray; lost to God, who has not the honour and service he should have from him; lost to the flock, that has not communion with him; lost to himself, he knows not where he is, wanders endlessly, is continually exposed to the beasts of prey, subject to frights and terrors, from under the shepherd's care, and wanting the green pastures; and it cannot of itself find the way back to the fold.

2. The care the God of heaven takes of poor wandering sinners. He continues his care of the sheep that did not go astray, they are safe in the wilderness; but there is a particular care to be taken of this lost sheep; and though he has a hundred sheep, a considerable flock, yet he will not lose that one, but he goes after it, and shews abundance of care, 1st. In finding it out; he follows it, inquiring after it, and looking about for it, till he finds it. God follows backsliding sinners with the calls of his Word, and the strivings of his Spirit, till at length they are wrought upon to think of returning. 2nd. In bringing it home; though he finds it weary, and perhaps worried, and worn away with its wanderings, and not able to bear being driven home, yet he doth not leave it to perish, and say, It is not worth carrying home; but "lays it on his shoulders," and with a great deal of tenderness and labour, brings it to the fold. This is very applicable to the great work of our redemption; mankind was gone astray, Isa. liii. 6. The value of the whole race to God was not so much as that of one sheep to him that had a hundred; what loss would it have been to God, if they had all been left to perish? There is a world of holy angels, that are as the ninety-nine sheep, a noble flock, yet God sends his Son to "seek and save that which was lost," ch. xix. 10. Christ is said to "gather the lambs in his arms, and carry them in his bosom," noting his pity and tenderness towards poor sinners; here he is said to bear them upon his shoulder, noting the power wherewith he supports and bears them up; those can never perish whom he carries upon his shoulders.

3. The pleasure that God takes in repenting, returning sinners; "he lays it on his shoulders, rejoicing" that he had not lost his labour in seeking; and the joy is the greater, because he began to be out of hope of finding it. And he "calls his friends and neighbours," the shepherds that kept their flocks about him, "saying, Rejoice with me;" perhaps among the pastoral songs which the shepherds used to sing, there was one for such an occasion as this, which these words might be the burden of, "Rejoice with me, for I have found my sheep which was lost;" whereas they never sung, "Rejoice with me, for I have lost none." Observe, he calls it his sheep, though a stray, a wandering sheep; he has a right to it, "all souls are mine;" and he will claim his own, and recover his right; therefore he looks after it himself; I have found it; did not send a servant, but his own Son, the great and good Shepherd, who will find what he seeks, and will be found of those that seek him not.

Secondly. The parable of the lost piece of silver.

1. The loser is here supposed to be a woman, who will more passionately grieve for her loss, and rejoice in the finding of what she lost, than perhaps a man would do, and therefore it the better serves the purpose of the parable. She hath ten pieces of silver, and out of them loses only one. Let this keep up in us high thoughts of the Divine goodness, notwithstanding the sinfulness and misery of the world of mankind, that there is nine to one, nay, in the foregoing parable there are ninety-nine to one of God's creation that retain their integrity, in whom God is praised, and never was dishonoured. O the numberless beings, for aught we know, numberless worlds of beings, that never were lost, or stepped aside from the laws and ends of their creation!

2. That which is lost is a piece of silver, δραχμήν, the fourth part of a shekel. The soul is silver, of intrinsic worth and value; not of base metal, as iron or lead, but of silver, the mines of which are royal mines. The Hebrew word for silver is taken from the desirableness of it. It is silver coin, for so the drachma was; it is stamped with God's image and superscription, and therefore must be rendered to him. Yet it is comparatively but of small value; it was but seven pence halfpenny; intimating, that if sinful men be left to perish, God would be no loser. This silver was lost in the dirt; a soul plunged in the world, and overwhelmed with the love of it, and care about it, is like a piece of money in the dirt; any one would say, It is a thousand pities it should lie there.

3. Here is a great deal of care and pains taken in quest of it. The woman lights a candle, to look behind the door, under the table, and in every corner of the house, sweeps the house, and seeks diligently till she find it. This represents the various means and methods God makes use of to bring lost souls home to himself; he hath lighted the candle of the Gospel, not to shew himself the way to us, but to shew us the way to him, to discover us to ourselves; he hath swept the house by the convictions of the Word; he seeks diligently, his heart is upon it, to bring lost souls to himself.

4. Here is a great deal of joy for the finding of it; ver. 9, "Rejoice with me, for I have found the piece which I had lost." Those that rejoice, desire that others should rejoice with them; that are merry, would have others merry with them; she was glad she had found the piece of money, though she should spend it in entertaining those whom she called to make merry with her. The pleasing surprise of finding it, put her for the present into a kind of transport, εὐρηκα, εὐρηκα, "I have found, I have found," is the language of joy.

Thirdly. The reddition of these two parables is to the same purpose, ver. 7, 10: "There is joy in heaven, joy in the presence of the angels of God, over one sinner that repenteth," as those publicans and sinners did, some of them at least, (and if but one of them did repent, Christ would reckon it worth his while,) more than over a great number of "just persons which need no repentance." Observe,

1. The repentance and conversion of sinners on earth is matter of joy and rejoicing in heaven. It is possible that the greatest sinners may be brought to repentance; while there is life there is hope, and the worst are not to be despaired of; and the worst of sinners, if they repent and turn, shall find mercy. Yet that is not all, 1st. God will delight to shew them mercy; will reckon their conversion a return for all the expence he has been at upon them.

"hate" in the sense of disregard. Men are to hate, i.e., to disregard their nearest and dearest relations, and even life itself, when they come into competition with Christ, and interfere with duty to him.

xiv. 31, 32. This passage has been discussed in connection with the question whether the Gospel is favourable to human warfare. It contains an illustration drawn from human affairs, and intended to teach caution and prudence. We do not think, however, that it has any bearing upon the war question, because our Lord was accustomed

There is always joy in heaven; God rejoiceth in all his works, but particularly in the works of his grace; he rejoiceth to do good to penitent sinners with his whole heart and his whole soul. He rejoiceth not only in the conversion of churches and nations, but even over "one sinner that repenteth," though but one. 2nd. The good angels will be glad that mercy is shewn them, so far are they from repining at it, though those of their nature that sinned be left to perish, and no mercy shewed to them; though those sinners that repent, that are so mean, and have been so vile, are upon their repentance to be taken into communion with them, and shortly to be made like them, and equal to them. The conversion of sinners is the joy of angels, and they gladly become ministering spirits to them for their good, upon their conversion. The redemption of mankind was matter of joy in the presence of the angels, for they sung "Glory to God in the highest," ch. ii. 14.

2. There is more joy over one sinner that repenteth, and turns to be religious, from a course of life that had been notoriously vile and vicious, than there is "over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance." 1st. More joy for the redemption and salvation of fallen man than for the preservation and confirmation of the angels that stand, and did indeed need no repentance. 2nd. More joy for the conversion of the sinners of the Gentiles, and of those publicans that now heard Christ preach, than for all the praises and devotions, and all the "God, I thank thee," of the Pharisees and other the self-justifying Jews, who thought that they needed no repentance, and that therefore God should abundantly rejoice in them, and make his boast of them, as those that were most his honour; but Christ tells them it was quite otherwise, that God was more praised in, and pleased with, the penitent, broken heart of one of those despised, envied sinners, than all the long prayers which the scribes and Pharisees made, that could not see any thing amiss in themselves. Nay, 3rd. More joy for the conversion of one such great sinner, such a Pharisee as Paul had been in his time, than for the regular conversation of one that had always carried himself decently and well, and comparatively needs no repentance, needs not such a universal change of the life as those great sinners need. Not but that it is best not to go astray; but the grace of God, both the power and the pity of that grace, is most manifested in the reducing of great sinners, more than in the conducting of those that never went astray. And many times those that have been great sinners before their conversion, prove more eminently and zealously good after; of which Paul is an instance, and therefore in him God was greatly glorified, Gal. i. 24. They to whom much is forgiven, will love much. It is spoken after the manner of men; we are moved with a more sensible joy for the recovery of what we had lost, than for the continuance of what we had always enjoyed; for health out of sickness, than for health from sickness; it is a life from the dead. A constant course of religion may in itself be more valuable; and yet a sudden return from an evil course and way of sin may yield a more surprising pleasure. Now if there is such joy in heaven for the conversion of sinners, then the Pharisees were very much strangers to a heavenly spirit, who did all they could to hinder it, and were grieved at it, and who were exasperated at Christ when he was doing a piece of work that was of all other most grateful to Heaven.

11 And he said, A certain man had two sons:
12 And the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living.
13 And not many days after the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living.
14 And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want.
15 And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine.
16 And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him. 17 And when he came to himself, to introduce circumstances good and bad into his teaching. Every parable embodies a principle and enforces it, and for the sake of this principle it was uttered. Accessories and details must therefore be cautiously dealt with.

xv. 4. "A man who loses one sheep out of a hundred will leave the rest of his flock for awhile, to seek for the one that is astray." In this parable, as in the next, Jesus draws his lessons from the analogies of human nature and daily life.

he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger! 18 I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, 19 And am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants. 20 And he arose, and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. 21 And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son. 22 But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet: 23 And bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry: 24 For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found. And they began to be merry. 25 Now his elder son was in the field: and as he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard musick and dancing. 26 And he called one of the servants, and asked what these things meant. 27 And he said unto him, Thy brother is come; and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe and sound. 28 And he was angry, and would not go in: therefore came his father out, and intreated him. 29 And he answering said to his father, Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment: and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends: 30 But as soon as this thy son was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf. 31 And he said unto him, Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine. 32 It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found.

We have here the parable of the prodigal son; the scope of which is the same with those before, to shew how pleasing to God the conversion of sinners is, of great sinners, and how ready he is to receive and entertain such upon their repentance; but the circumstances of the parable do much more largely and fully set forth the riches of gospel grace than those did; and it has been, and will be while the world stands, of unspeakable use to poor sinners, both to direct and to encourage them in repenting and returning to God. Now,

1. The parable represents God as a common Father to all mankind, to the whole family of Adam; we all are his offspring; have all one father, and one God created us, Mal. ii. 10. From him we had our being, in him we still have it, and from him we receive our maintenance: he is our Father, for he has the educating and portioning of us, and will put us in his testament, or leave us out, according as we are or are not dutiful children to him. Our Saviour hereby intimates to those proud Pharisees that these publicans and sinners whom they thus despised were their brethren, partakers of the same nature, and therefore they ought to be glad of any kindness shewn them. God is the God, not of the Jews only, but of the Gentiles, Rom. iii. 29, the "same Lord over all, that is rich in mercy to all that call upon him."

2. It represents the children of men as of different characters, though all related to God as their common Father. He had two sons, one of them a solid, grave youth, reserved and austere, sober himself, but not at all good humoured to those about him; such a one would adhere to his education, and not be easily drawn from it; but the other volatile and mercurial, and impatient of restraint, roving, and willing to try his fortune, and, if he fall into ill hands, likely to be a rake, notwithstanding his virtuous education. Now this latter represents the publicans and sinners, whom Christ is endeavouring to bring to repentance, and the Gentiles, whom the apostles were to be sent forth to preach repentance to; the former, the Jews in general, and particularly the Pharisees, whom he was endeavouring to reconcile to that grace of God which was offered to and bestowed upon sinners. The younger son is the prodigal, whose character and case is here designed to represent that of a sinner, that of every one of us in our natural state, but especially of some. Now we are to observe concerning him,

First. His riot and ramble, when he was a prodigal, and the extravagances and miseries he fell into. We are told,

1. What his request to his father was, ver. 12: "He said to his father," proudly and pertly enough, "Father, give me," (he might have put a little more in his mouth, and have said, "Pray, give me," or, "Sir, if you please, give me," but he makes an imperious demand,) "Give me the portion of goods that falleth to me;" not so much as you think fit to allot me, but that which falls to me as my due. Note. It is ill, and the beginning of worse, when men look upon God's gifts as due debts. "Give me the portion," all my child's part that falls to me; not, Try me with a little, and see how I can manage that, and accordingly trust me with more, but, Give it me all at present in possession, and I will never expect any thing in reversion, any thing hereafter. Note. The great folly of sinners, and that which ruins them is, being content to have their portion in hand; now in this lifetime to receive their good things. They look only at the things that are seen, that are temporal, and covet only a present gratification, but have no care for a future felicity, when that is spent and gone.

And why did he desire to have his portion in his own hands? Was it that he might apply himself to business, and trade with it, and so make it more? No, he had no thought of that. But, 1st. He was weary of his father's government; sick of the good order and discipline of his father's family, and was fond of liberty, falsely so called; but indeed the greatest slavery, for so a liberty to sin is. See the folly of many young men, that are religiously educated, but are impatient of the confinement of their education, and never think themselves their own masters, their own men, till they have broke all God's bands in sunder, and cast away his cords from them, and, instead of them, bound themselves with the cords of their own lust. Here is the original of the apostasy of sinners from God; they will not be tied up to the rules of God's government; will themselves be as gods, knowing no other good and evil but what themselves please. 2nd. He was willing to get from under his father's eye, for that was always a check upon him, and often gave a check to him. A shyness of God, and a willingness to disbelieve his omniscience, is at the bottom of the wickedness of the wicked. 3rd. He was distrustful of his father's management; he would have his portion of goods himself, for he thought his father would be laying up for hereafter for him; and in order to that would limit him in his present expenses, and that he did not like. 4th. He was proud of himself, and had a great conceit of his own sufficiency. He thought if he had but his portion in his own hands, he could manage it better than his father did, and make a better figure with it. There are more young people ruined by pride than by any one lust whatsoever. Our first parents ruined themselves, and all theirs, by a foolish ambition to be independent, and not to be beholden to God himself; and this is at the bottom of sinners' persisting in their sin, they will be for themselves.

2. How kind his father was to him: "He divided unto them his living." He computed what he had to dispose of between his sons, and gave the younger son his share, and offered the elder his, which ought to be a double portion; but it should seem he desired his father to keep it in his own hands still, and we may see what he got by it, ver. 31: "All that I have is thine." He got all, by staying for something in reserve. He gave the younger son what he asked, and the son had no reason to complain that he did him any wrong in the dividend; he had as much as he expected, and perhaps more. 1st. Thus he might now see his father's kindness, how willing he was to please him, and make him easy; and that he was not such an unkind father as he was willing to represent him, when he wanted an excuse to be gone. 2nd. Thus he would in a little time be made to see his own folly, and that he was not such a wise manager for himself as he would be thought to be. Note. God is a kind father to all his children, and gives to them all "life and breath, and all things," even to the evil and unthankful; δίδωκεν αὐτοῖς τὸν βίον, "he divided to them life;" God's giving us life is putting us in a capacity to serve and glorify him.

3. How he managed himself when he had got his portion in his own hands; he set himself to spend it as fast as he could, and, as prodigals use to do, in a little time he made himself a beggar: "not many days after," ver. 13. Note, If God leaves us never so little to ourselves, it will not be long ere we depart from him. As soon as ever the bridle of restraining grace is taken off, we are soon gone. That which the younger son determined was, to be gone presently, and in order to that, "he gathered all together." Sinners that go astray from God venture their all.

Now the condition of the prodigal in this ramble of his represents to us a sinful state, that miserable state into which man is fallen.

1st. A sinful state is a state of departure and distance from God. First. It is the sinfulness of sin that it is an apostasy from God. He "took his journey" from his father's house. Sinners are fled from God, they go a whoring from him; they revolt from their allegiance to him, as a servant that outruns his service, or a wife that treacherously departs from her husband, and they say unto God, Depart. They get as far off him as they can. This world is the far country in which they take up their residence, and are as at home; and in the service and enjoyment of it they spend their all. Secondly. It is the misery of sinners that they are afar off from God, from him who is the fountain of all good, and are going farther and farther from him. What is hell itself but being afar off from God?

2nd. A sinful state is a spending state. There he "wasted his substance with riotous living," ver. 13; devoured it "with harlots," ver. 30; and in a little time "he had spent all," ver. 14. He bought fine clothes, spent a deal in meat and drink, treated high, conversed with those that helped him to make an end of what he had in a little time. As to this world, they that live riotously waste what they have, and will have a great deal to answer for, that they spend that upon their lusts which should be for the necessary subsistence of themselves and their families;—but this is to be applied spiritually; wilful sinners waste their patrimony, for they misemploy their thoughts and all the powers of their souls, misspend their time and all their opportunities, do not only bury, but embezzle the talents they are intrusted to trade with for their Master's honour; and the gifts of Providence, which were intended to enable them to serve God, and do good with, are made the food and fuel of their lusts. The soul that is made a drudge, either to the world or to the flesh, wastes its substance, and lives riotously: "One sinner destroys much good," Eccl. ix. 18. The good he destroys is valuable, and it is none of his own; they are his Lord's goods that he wastes, which must be accounted for.

3rd. A sinful state is a wanting state. "When he had spent all" upon his harlots, they left him, to seek such another prey; and "there arose a mighty famine in that land," every thing was scarce and dear, "and he began to be in want," ver. 14. Note, Wilful waste brings woful want. Riotous living in little time, perhaps in a little time, brings men to a morsel of bread; especially when ill times hasten on the consequences of ill husbandry, which good husbandry would have provided for. This represents the misery of sinners, who have thrown away their own mercies, the favour of God, their interest in Christ, the strivings of the Spirit, the admonitions of conscience; these they game away for the pleasures of sense, and the wealth of the world, and then are ready to perish for want of them. Sinners want necessities for their souls; they have neither food nor raiment for them, nor any provision for hereafter. A sinful

xv. 12. The portion of his father's property which the younger son was entitled to was one-third. The elder son took the other two-thirds. (See Deut. xxi. 17.)

xv. 15. To feed swine would be in the eyes of a Jew almost as low a stage of degradation as could well be imagined.

xv. 16. The word for "husks" is not to be understood of husks in the common sense, but of the pods of the carob or locust-tree. They contain a seed like a bean, which becomes too hard to be crushed between the teeth. The pods are sweet, and used to feed cattle with; they are neither unwholesome nor unpleasant, and to this day are often eaten by the poor in Spain, Africa, and the East.

xv. 23. As meat was not habitually eaten daily, it was customary to mark any specially joyous event by the killing of an animal for food.

xv. 25. The musicians and dancers would be hired for the purpose, as it was not customary for the host and his guests to play and state is like a land where famine reigns—a mighty famine; for the heaven is as brass, the dews of God's favour and blessing are withheld, and we must needs want good things if God deny them us; and the earth is as iron; the sinner's heart, that should bring forth good things, is dry and barren, and has no good in it; those sinners are wretchedly and miserably poor; and what aggravates it, they brought themselves into that condition, and keep themselves in it by refusing the supplies offered.

4th. A sinful state is a vile, servile state. When this young man's riot had brought him to want, his want brought him to servitude, ver. 15: "he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country." The same wicked life that is before represented by riotous living, is here represented by servile living; for sinners are perfect slaves. The devil is the citizen of that country, for he is both in city and country; sinners join themselves to him, hire themselves into his service, to do his work, to be at his beck, and to depend upon him for maintenance and a portion. They that commit sin are the servants of sin, Jno. viii. 34. How did this young gentleman debase and disparage himself, when he hired himself into such a service, and under such a master as this. He "sent him into the fields," not to feed sheep,—there had been some credit in that employment; Jacob, and Moses, and David kept sheep,—but "to feed swine." The business of the devil's servants, is to make provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof; and that is no better than feeding greedy, dirty, noisy swine; and how can rational, immortal souls more disgrace themselves?

5th. A sinful state is a state of perpetual dissatisfaction. When the prodigal began to be in want, he thought to help himself by going to service; and he must be content with the provision which, not the house, but the field afforded; but it is poor provision, ver. 16: "he would fain have filled his belly," satisfied his hunger, and nourished his body "with the husks that the swine did eat." A fine pass my young master had brought himself to, to be fellow-commoner with the swine. Note, That which sinners when they depart from God promise themselves satisfaction in, will certainly disappoint them; they are labouring for that which satisfies not, Isa. lv. 2. That which is the stumbling-block of their iniquity will never satisfy their souls, nor fill their bowels, Eze. vii. 19; husks are food for swine, but not for men. The wealth of the world, and the entertainments of sense, will serve for bodies; but what are those to precious souls? They neither suit their nature, nor satisfy their desires, nor supply their needs. He that takes up with them feeds on wind, Hos. xii. 1; feeds on ashes, Isa. xlv. 20.

6th. A sinful state is a state which cannot expect relief from any creature. This prodigal, when he could not earn his bread by working, took to begging; but "no man gave unto him," because they knew he had brought all this misery upon himself, and because he was rakish and provoking to every body: such poor are least pitied. This, in the application of the parable, intimates that those who depart from God cannot be helped by any creature. In vain do we cry to the world and the flesh, those gods we have served; they have that which will poison a soul, but have nothing to give it which will feed and nourish it. If thou refuse God's help, whence shall any creature help thee?

7th. A sinful state is a state of death, ver. 24, 32: "This my son was dead." A sinner is not only dead in law, as he is under sentence of death, but dead in state too, dead in trespasses and sins, destitute of spiritual life; no union with Christ, no spiritual senses exercised, no living to God, and therefore dead. The prodigal in the far country was dead to his father and his family, cut off from them, as a member from the body, or a branch from the tree; and therefore dead, and it is his own doing.

8th. A sinful state is a lost state: "This my son was lost," lost to every thing that was good, lost to all virtue and honour, lost to his father's house; they had no joy of him. Souls that are separated from God, are lost souls, lost as a traveller that is out of his way; and, if Infinite Mercy prevent not, will soon be lost as a ship that is sunk at sea, lost irrecoverably.

9th. A sinful state is a state of madness and frenzy. This is intimated in that expression, ver. 17: "when he came to himself," which intimates that he had been beside himself; sure he was so when he left his father's house, and much more so when he joined himself to the citizen of that country. Madness is said to be in the heart of sinners, Ecc. ix. 3. Satan has got possession of the soul, and how raging mad was he that was possessed by Legion! Sinners, like those that are mad, destroy themselves with foolish lusts, and yet at the same time deceive themselves with foolish hopes; and they are, of all diseased persons, most enemies to their own cure.

Secondly. We have here his return from this ramble, his penitent return to his father again. When he was brought to the last extremity, then he bethought himself how much it was his interest to go home. Note, We must not despair of the worst, for while there is life there is hope. The grace of God can soften the hardest heart, and give a happy turn to the strongest stream of corruption. Now observe here,

1. What was the occasion of his return and repentance; it was his affliction; when he was in want, then he "came to himself." Note, Afflictions, when they are sanctified by Divine grace, prove happy means of turning sinners from the error of their ways. By them the ear is opened to discipline, and the heart disposed to receive instruction; and they are sensible proofs both of the vanity of the world and of the mischievousness of sin. Apply it spiritually; when we find the insufficiency of creatures to make us happy, and having tried all other ways of relief for our poor souls in vain, then it is time to think of returning to God. When we see what miserable comforters, what physicians of no value, all but Christ are, for a soul that groans under the guilt and power of sin, and no man gives unto us what we need, then sure we will apply ourselves to Jesus Christ.

2. What was the preparative in it; and that was consideration. He said within himself, he reasoned within himself, when he recovered his right mind, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough? Note, Consideration is the first step towards conversion, Eze. xviii. 28. He considers and turns. To consider, is to retire into ourselves, to reflect upon ourselves, and to compare one thing with another, and determine accordingly. Now observe what it was that he considered. 1st. He considered how bad his condition was; "I perish with hunger." Not only, I am hungry, but, "I perish with hunger," for I see not what way to expect relief. Note, Sinners will not come to the service of Christ till they are brought to see themselves just ready to perish in the service of sin, and the consideration of that should drive us to Christ: "Master, save us, we perish." And though we be thus driven to Christ, he will not therefore reject us, nor think himself dishonoured by our being forced to him, but rather honoured by his being applied to in a desperate case. 2nd. He considered how much better it might be made if he would but return: "How many hired servants of my father's," the meanest in his family, the very day labourers, "have bread enough and to spare," such a good house doth he keep. Note, First, In our Father's house there is bread for all his family; this was taught by the twelve loaves of shewbread that were constantly upon the holy table in the sanctuary, a loaf for every tribe. Secondly, There is enough and to spare, enough for all, enough for each, enough to spare to such as will join themselves to his domestics; enough, and to spare for charity. Yet there is room; there are crumbs that fall from his table, which many would be glad of, and thankful for. Thirdly, Even the hired servants in God's family are well provided for; the meanest that will but hire themselves into his family to do his work, and depend upon his rewards, shall be well provided for. Fourthly, The consideration of this should encourage sinners that have gone astray from God to think of returning to him. Thus that adulteress reasons with herself, when she is disappointed in her new lovers: "I will go and return to my first husband, for then it was better with me than now," Hos. ii. 7.

3. What was the purpose of it. Since it is so, that his condition is so bad, and may be bettered by returning to his father, his consideration issues at length in this conclusion, "I will arise, and go to my father." Note, Good purposes are good things, but still good performances are all in all. 1st. He determined what to do; "I will arise, and go to my father." He will not take any longer time to consider of it, but will forthwith arise and go. Though he be in a far country, a great way off from his father's house, yet, as far as it is, he will return. Every step of backsliding from God, must be a step back again in return to him. Though he be joined to a citizen of this country, he makes no difficulty of breaking his bargain with him; we are not debtors to the flesh, we are under no obligation at all to our Egyptian taskmasters, to give them warning, but are at liberty to quit the service when we will. Observe with what resolution he speaks; "I will arise, and go to my father;" I am resolved I will, whatever the issue be, rather than stay here and starve. 2nd. He determined what to say. True repentance is a rising and coming to God: "Behold we come unto thee." But what words shall we take with us? He here considers what to say. Note, In all our addresses to God, it is good to deliberate with ourselves beforehand what we shall say, that we may order our cause before him, and fill our mouth with arguments. We have liberty of speech, and we ought to consider seriously with ourselves how we may use that liberty to the utmost, and yet not abuse it. Let us observe what he purposed to say.

First, He would confess his fault and folly; "I have sinned." Note, Forasmuch as we have all sinned, it behoves and well becomes us to own that we have sinned. The confession of sin is required and insisted upon as a necessary condition of peace and pardon. If we plead, not guilty, we put ourselves upon a trial by the covenant of innocence, which will certainly condemn us. If we plead, guilty, with a contrite, penitent, and obedient heart, we refer ourselves to the covenant of grace, which offers forgiveness to those that confess their sins.

Secondly, He would aggravate it, and would be so far from extenuating the matter, that he would lay load upon himself for it: "I have sinned against heaven and before thee." Let those that are undutiful to their earthly parents think of this; they sin against heaven, and before God. Offences against them are offences against God. Let us all think of this, as that which renders our sin exceeding sinful, and should render us exceeding sorrowful for it. 1st. That sin is committed in contempt of God's authority over us; we have sinned against heaven. God is here called heaven, to signify how highly he is exalted above us, and the dominion he has over us, for the heavens do rule. The malignity of sin aims high, it is against heaven. The daring sinner is said to have set his mouth against the heavens, Ps. lxxiii. 9. Yet it is impotent malice, for we cannot hurt the heavens; nay, it is foolish malice; what is shot against the heavens will return upon the head of him that shoots it, Ps. vii. 16. Sin is an affront to the God of heaven; it is a forfeiture of the glories and joys of heaven; and a contradiction to the designs of the kingdom of heaven. 2nd. It is committed in contempt of God's eye upon us: "I have sinned against heaven," and yet "before thee," and under thine eye, than which there could not be a greater affront put upon him.

Thirdly, He would judge and condemn himself for it, and acknowledge himself to have forfeited all the privileges of the family; "I am no more worthy to be called thy son," ver. 29. He doth not deny the relation, for that was all he had to trust to; but he owns his father might justly deny the relation, and shut his doors against him. He had at his own demand the portion of goods that belonged to him, and had reason to expect no more. Note, It becomes sinners to acknowledge themselves unworthy to receive any favour from God, and to humble and abase themselves before him.

Fourthly, He would nevertheless sue for admission into the family, though it were into the meanest post there: "Make me as one of thy hired servants;" that is good enough, and too good for me. Note, True penitents have a high value for God's house, and the privileges of it, and will be glad of any place, so they may but be in it, though it be but as doorkeepers, Ps. lxxxix. 10. If it be imposed on him as a mortification to sit with the servants, he will not only submit to it, but count it a preferment in comparison with his present state. Those that return to God, from whom they have revolted, cannot but be desirous some way or other to be employed for him, and put into a capacity of serving and honouring him: "Make me as a hired servant," that I may shew I love my father's house as much as ever I slighted it.

Fifthly, In all this he would have an eye to his father as a father: "I will arise, and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father." Note, Eyeing God as a Father, and our Father, will be of great use in our repentance and return to him. It will make our sorrow for sin genuine; our resolutions against it strong, and encourage us to hope for pardon. God delights, both by penitents and petitioners, to be called Father. Is not Ephraim a dear son?

4. What was the performance of this purpose; "He arose and came to his father." His good resolve he put in execution without delay; he struck while the iron was hot; and did not adjourn the thought to some more convenient season. Note, It is our interest speedily to close with our convictions. Have we said, we will arise and go? let us immediately arise and come. He did not come half way, and then pretend he was tired, and could get no farther; but, weak and weary as he was, he made a thorough business of it. "If thou wilt return, O Israel, return unto me," and "do thy first works."

Thirdly, We have here his reception and entertainment with his father. "He came to his father;" but was he welcome? Yes, heartily welcome. And by the way, it is an example to parents whose children have been foolish and disobedient, if they repent and submit themselves, not to be harsh and severe with them, but to be governed in such a case by the wisdom that is from above, which is gentle and easy to be intreated; herein let them be followers of God, and merciful as he is. But it is chiefly designed to set forth the grace and mercy of God to poor sinners that repent and return to him, and his readiness to forgive them. Now here observe,

1. The great love and affection wherewith the father received the son, ver. 20: "when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him." He expressed his kindness before the son expressed his repentance; for God prevents us with the blessings of his goodness; even before we call, he answers; for he knows what is in our hearts: "I said, I will confess, and thou forgavest." How lively are the images of this here! 1st. Here were eyes of mercy, and those eyes quick-sighted; "when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him," before any other of the family were aware of him, as if from the top of some high tower he had been looking that way that his son was gone, with such a thought an answer. The phrase "that they may receive me," &c., is equivalent to "that I may be received into the houses of my friends."

xvi. 6. "A hundred measures" here would be "a hundred baths." The bath, according to Arbuthnot, was the same as the ephah, and equal to seven gallons and four pints. Hence a hundred measures of oil would be seven hundred and fifty gallons.

xvi. 7. "A hundred measures" here would be "a hundred cors." The cor was a Hebrew measure for corn, and, according to Arbuthnot, dance in Oriental towns. At present the hired musicians are men, and the dancers usually women trained for the purpose.

xv. 31. Burckhardt notes of a tribe in Lebanon that it is customary for the sons, as soon as they are fifteen or sixteen years of age, to demand their share of the family property. The father retains one share for himself, which is disposed of at his death.

xvi. 4. The steward does not say who are to receive him, nor need we ask, although the creditors to be mentioned might supply as this, O that I could see yonder wretched son of mine coming home! This intimates God's desire of the conversion of sinners, and his readiness to meet them that are coming towards him. He looketh on men when they are gone astray from him, to see whether they will return to him, and he is aware of the first inclination towards him. 2nd. Here were bowels of mercy, and those bowels turning within him, and yearning at the sight of his son, "he had compassion." Misery is the object of pity; even the misery of a sinner, though he has brought it upon himself, yet God compassionates; "his soul was grieved for the misery of Israel," Hos. xi. 8; Jud. x. 16. 3rd. Here were feet of mercy, and those feet quick-paced; "he ran;" this notes how swift God is to shew mercy. The prodigal son came slowly, under a burthen of shame and fear; but the tender father ran to meet him with his encouragements. 4th. Here were arms of mercy, and those arms stretched out to embrace him; "he fell on his neck," though guilty, and deserving to be beaten; though dirty, and newly come from feeding swine, that any one that had not the strongest and tenderest compassions of a father would have loathed to touch him; yet he thus takes him in his arms, and lays him in his bosom. Thus dear are true penitents to God, thus welcome to the Lord Jesus. 5th. Here are lips of mercy, and those lips dropping as a honeycomb, "he kissed him;" this kiss not only assured him of his welcome, but sealed his pardon; his former follies shall be all forgiven, and not mentioned against him, nor is one word said by way of upbraiding. This was like David's kissing Absalom, 2 Sam. xiv. 33; and all this speaks how ready, and free, and forward the Lord Jesus is to receive and entertain poor returning, repenting sinners, according to his Father's will.

2. The penitent submission which the poor prodigal made to his father, ver. 21; "he said unto him, Father, I have sinned." As it commends the good father's kindness, that he shewed it before the prodigal expressed his repentance; so it commends the prodigal's repentance, that he expressed it after his father had shewed him so much kindness. When he had received the kiss which sealed his pardon, yet he said, "Father, I have sinned." Note, Even those that have received the pardon of their sins, and the comfortable sense of their pardon, yet must have in their hearts a sincere contrition for it, and with their mouths must make a penitent confession of it, even of those sins which they have reason to hope are pardoned. David penned Psal. li. after Nathan had said, "The Lord hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die." Nay, the comfortable sense of the pardon of sin should increase our sorrow for it; and that is ingenious evangelical sorrow which is increased by such a consideration; see Eze. xvi. 6, "Thou shalt be ashamed and confounded, when I am pacified towards thee." The more we see of God's readiness to forgive us, the more difficult it should be to us to forgive ourselves.

3. The splendid provision which this kind father made for the returning prodigal. He was going on in his submission, but one word we find in his purpose what to say, ver. 19, which we do not find he did say, ver. 21, and that was, "make me as one of the hired servants." We cannot think he forgot it, much less that he changed his mind, and was now either less desirous to be in the family, or less willing to be a hired servant there, than when he made that purpose; but his father interrupted him, prevented his saying it; Hold, son, talk no more of this unworthiness, thou art heartily welcome, and though not worthy to be called a son, shalt be treated as a dear son, as a pleasant child. He who is thus entertained at first, needs not ask to be made as a hired servant. Thus when Ephraim bemoaned himself, God comforted him, Jer. xxxi. 18, 20. It is strange that here is not one word of rebuke, Why did you not stay with your harlots and your swine? You could never find the way home until beaten hither with your own rod. No, here is nothing like this; which intimates, that when God forgives the sins of true penitents, he forgets them, he remembers them no more, they shall not be mentioned against them, Eze. xviii. 22.

But this is not all; here is rich and royal provision made for him, according to his birth and quality, far beyond what he did or could expect. He would have thought it sufficient, and been very thankful, if his father had but taken notice of him, and bid him go to the kitchen and get his dinner with the servants; but God doth for those who return to their duty, and cast themselves upon his mercy, abundantly above what they are able to ask or think. The prodigal came home between hope and fear; fear of being rejected, and hope of being received; but his father was not only better to him than his fears, but better to him than his hopes; not only received him, but received him with respect.

1st. He came home in rags; and his father not only clothed him, but adorned him; "he said to the servants" who all attended their master, upon notice that his son was come, "Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him." The worst old clothes in the house might have served, and had been good enough for him; but the father calls not for a coat, but for a robe, the garment of princes and great men; the best robe, την ἀριστην τὴν πρώτην, there is a double emphasis, "that robe, that principal robe," you know which I mean; "the first robe," so it may be read, the robe he wore before he ran his ramble. When backsliders repent, and do their first works, they shall be received and dressed in their first robes. Bring hither that robe, and put it on him; he will be ashamed to wear it, and think it ill becomes him, who comes home in such a dirty pickle; but put it on him, and do not offer it him only; and "put a ring on his hand," a signet ring, with the arms of the family, in token of his being owned as a branch of the family. Rich people wore rings, and his father hereby signified, that though he had spent one portion, yet upon his repentance he intended him another. He came home barefoot; his feet perhaps sore with travel, and therefore "put shoes on his feet," to make him easy.

Thus doth the grace of God provide for true penitents. First. The righteousness of Christ is the robe, that principal robe with which they are clothed; they "put on the Lord Jesus Christ," are clothed with that sun. The robe of righteousness is the garment of salvation, Isa. lxi. 10. A new nature is this best robe; true penitents are clothed with that, being sanctified throughout. Secondly. The earnest of the Spirit, "by whom we are sealed to the day of redemption," is the ring on the hand; "after that ye believed, ye were sealed." They that are sanctified, are adorned and dignified; are put in power, as Joseph was by Pharaoh's giving him a ring. "Put a ring on his hand," to be before him a constant memorial of his father's kindness, that he may never forget it. Thirdly. The preparation of the Gospel of peace is shoes for our feet, Eph. vi. 15; so that compared with this here signifies, saith Grotius, that God when he receives true penitents into his favour, makes use of them for the convincing and converting of others by their instructions, at least, by their examples. David, when pardoned, will teach transgressors God's ways; and Peter, when he is converted, will strengthen his brethren. Or, it intimates that they shall go on cheerfully, and with resolution in the way of religion; as a man doth when he hath shoes on his feet, over as he doth when he is barefoot.

2nd. He came home hungry; and his father not only fed him, but feasted him; ver. 23, "Bring hither the fatted calf," that has been stall fed, and long reserved for some special occasion; and kill it, that my son may have his bellyful of the best we have. Cold meat might have served, or the leavings of the last meal, but he shall have fresh meat, and hot meat, and the fatted calf can never be better bestowed. Note. There is excellent food provided by our heavenly Father for all those that arise and come to him. Christ himself is the bread of life; his flesh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed; in him there is a feast for souls, a feast of fat things. It was a great change with the prodigal, who but a while ago "would fain have filled his belly with husks." How sweet will the supplies of the new covenant be, and the relishes of its comforts, to those who have been labouring in vain for satisfaction in the creature! Now he found his own words made good, "In my father's house there is bread enough and to spare."

4. The great joy and rejoicing that there was for his return. The bringing of the fatted calf was designed to be not only a feast for him, but a festival for the family; "Let us all eat and be merry," for it is a good day; "for this my son was dead," when he was in his ramble, but his return is as life from the dead, "he is alive again;" we thought he was dead, having heard nothing from him of a long time, but behold he lives; "he was lost," we gave him up for lost, we despaired of hearing of him, "but he is found." Note, 1st. The conversion of a soul from sin to God, is the raising of that soul from death to life, and the finding of that which seemed to be lost. It is a great, and wonderful, and happy change. What was in itself dead, is made alive; what was lost to God and his church, is found; and what was unprofitable becomes profitable, Phil. 11; it is such a change as that upon the face of the earth when the spring returns. 2nd. The conversion of sinners is greatly pleasing to the God of heaven, and all that belong to his family ought to rejoice in it; those in heaven do, and those on earth should. Observe, it was the father that began the joy, and set all the rest on rejoicing; therefore we should be glad of the repentance of sinners, because it accomplishes God's designs, it is the bringing of those to Christ whom the Father had given him, and in whom he will be for ever glorified. "We joy for your sakes before our God," with an eye to him, 1 Thes. iii. 9; and "ye are our rejoicing in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ," who is the master of the family, 1 Thes. ii. 19. The family complied with the master, "they began to be merry." Note, God's children and servants ought to be affected with things as he is.

Fourthly. We have here the repining and envying of the elder brother, which is described by way of reproof to the scribes and Pharisees, to shew them the folly and wickedness of their discontent at the repentance and conversion of the publicans and sinners, and the favour Christ shewed them; and he represents it so as not to aggravate the matter, but as allowing them still the privileges of elder brethren; the Jews had so, though the Gentiles were favoured, for the preaching of the Gospel must begin at Jerusalem. Christ, when he reproves them for their fault, yet spoke them fair, to smooth them into a good temper towards the poor publicans. But by the elder brother here, we may understand those that are really good, and have been so from their youth up, and never went astray into any vicious course of living, who comparatively need no repentance. And to such these words in the close, "Son, thou art ever with me," are applicable without any difficulty, but not to the scribes and Pharisees. Now concerning the elder brother, observe,

1. How foolish and fretful he was upon occasion of his brother's reception, and how he was disgusted at it. It seems he was abroad in the field, in the country, when his brother came, and by that time he was returned home the mirth was begun; when "he drew nigh to the house he heard music and dancing," either while the dinner was in getting ready, or rather after they had eaten and were full, ver. 25. He inquired "what those things meant," ver. 26, and was informed that his brother was come, and his father had made him a feast for his welcome home, and great joy there was, "because he had received him safe and sound," ver. 27. It is but one word in the original, he had received him ἐν ὑγιαίνοντι, "in health," well both in body and mind. He received him not only well in body, but a penitent; returned to his right mind, and well reconciled to his father's house, cured of his vices and his rakish disposition, else he had not been received safe and sound. Now this disoblinded him to the highest degree; "he was angry, and would not go in," ver. 28; not only because he was resolved he would not himself join in the mirth, but because he would shew his displeasure at it, and would intimate to his father that he should have kept out his younger brother. This shews, what is a common fault, 1st. In men's families, that those who have been a comfort to their parents think they should have the monopoly of their parents' favours, and are apt to be too sharp upon those who have transgressed, and to grudge their parents' kindness to them. 2nd. In God's family, those that are comparatively innocents seldom know how to be compassionate towards those that are manifestly penitents. The language of such we have here in what the elder brother said, ver. 29, 30; and it is written for warning to those that by the grace of God are kept from scandalous sin, and kept in the way of virtue and sobriety, that they sin not after the similitude of this transgression. Let us observe the particulars of it.

First. He boasted of himself, and of his own virtue and obedience. He had not only not outrun his father's house, as his brother did, but had made himself as a servant in it, and had done so long; "Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment." Note, It is too common for those that are better than their neighbours to brag of it, yea, and to make their boasts of it before God himself, as if he were indebted to them for it. I am apt to think this elder brother said more than was true, when he gloried that he had never transgressed his father's commands, for then I believe he would not have been so obstinate as now he was to his father's entreaties. However, we will admit it comparatively, he had not been so disobedient as his brother had been. O, what need have good men to take heed of pride, a corruption that ariseth out of the ashes of other corruptions. Those that have long served God, and been kept from gross sin, have a great deal to be humbly thankful for, but nothing proudly to boast of.

Secondly. He complained of his father, as if he had not been so kind to him as he ought to have been, who had been so dutiful; "thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends." He was out of humour now, else he would not have made this complaint; for, no question, if he had asked such a thing at any time, he might have had it at first word; and we have reason to think he did not desire it; but the killing of the fatted calf put him upon making this peevish reflection. When men are in passion they are apt to reflect so as they would not if they were in their right mind. He had been fed at his father's table, and had many a time been merry with him and the family, but his father had never given him so much as a kid, which was but a small token of love compared with the fatted calf. Note, Those that think highly of themselves and their services, are apt to think hardly of their master, and meanly of his favours. We ought to own ourselves utterly unworthy of those mercies which God hath thought fit to give us, much more of those that he hath not thought fit to give us, and therefore we must not complain. He would have had a kid to make merry with his friends abroad; whereas the fatted calf he grudged so much, was given to his brother, not to make merry with his friends abroad, but with the family at home. The mirth of God's children should be with their Father and his family, in communion with God and his saints, and not with any other friends.

Thirdly. He was very ill-humoured towards his younger brother, and harsh in what he thought and said concerning him. Some good people are apt to be overtaken in this fault; nay, and to indulge themselves too much in it, to look with disdain upon those who have not preserved their reputation so clean as was equal to a homer, or thirty-two pecks and one pint. A hundred cors, therefore, equal somewhat over one hundred English quarters.

xvi. 8. Our version is unhappy in the phrase "the lord," which perverse men pounce upon to prove that the Lord Jesus commended an unjust man and deed. All through the passage the word "lord" means the man's master, and so here "his master." Here again we have an example of illustrations conveying moral lessons, while based upon utterly unjustifiable conduct. No praise is conveyed by the word "wisely," which merely means "ingeniously." In the next clause it has no other signification. With respect to the last clause, "for the children," &c., we see no reason to doubt that it is a comment made by the Saviour himself.

xvi. 9. To the popular mind the precept here causes little difficulty, unless warped by some prejudice. Yet the passage is one from which the most opposite conclusions have been drawn. The "mammon of unrighteousness" here is the "unrighteous mammon" of verse 11.

they have done, and to be sour and morose towards them; yea, though they have given very good evidences of their repentance and reformation: this is not the spirit of Christ, but of the Pharisees. Let us observe the instances of it:

1st. "He would not go in," except his brother be turned out; one house shall not hold him and his own brother, no, not his father's house. The language of this was that of the Pharisee, Isa. lxxv. 5, "Stand by thyself, come not near me, for I am holier than thou;" and ch. xviii. 11, "I am not as other men are, nor even as this publican." Note, Though we are to shun the society of those sinners whom we are in danger of being infected by, yet we must not be shy of the company of penitent sinners, whom we may get good by. He saw his father had taken him in, and yet he would not go in to him. Note, We think too well of ourselves, if we cannot find in our hearts to receive those God hath received; and to admit those into favour and friendship and fellowship with us whom we have reason to think God has a favour for, and are taken into friendship and fellowship with him.

2nd. He would not call him brother; but, "this thy son," which sounds arrogantly, and not without reflection upon his father, as if his indulgence had made him a prodigal; he is thy son, thy darling. Note, Forgetting the relation we stand in to our brethren, as brethren, and disowning that, is at the bottom of all our neglects of our duty to them, and our contradictions to that duty. Let us give our relations, both in the flesh and in the Lord, the titles that belong to them. Let the rich call the poor brethren, and let the innocents call the penitents so.

3rd. He aggravated his brother's faults, and made the worst of them, endeavouring to incense his father against him; he is "thy son, who hath devoured thy living with harlots." It is true he had spent his own portion foolishly enough, whether upon harlots or no, we are not told before; perhaps that was only the language of his elder brother's jealousy and ill-will; but that he had devoured all his father's living was false; the father had still a good estate. Now this shews how apt we are, in censuring our brethren, to make the worst of every thing, and to set it out in the blackest colours; which is not doing as we would be done by, nor as our heavenly Father doth by us, who is not extreme to mark iniquities.

4th. He grudged him the kindness that his father shewed him; "thou hast killed for him the fatted calf," as if he were such a son as should be. Note, It is an ill thing to envy penitents the grace of God, and to have our eye evil because his is good. As we must not envy those that are the worst of sinners the gifts of common providence, "Let not thine heart envy sinners," so we must not envy those that have been the worst of sinners the gifts of covenant love, upon their repentance; we must not envy them their pardon, and peace, and comfort, no, nor any extraordinary gift God bestows upon them, which makes them eminently acceptable or useful. Paul, before his conversion, had been a prodigal, had devoured his heavenly Father's living by the havoc he made of the church; yet, when after his conversion he had greater measures of grace given him, and more honour put upon him than the other apostles, they who were the elder brethren, that had been serving Christ when he was persecuting him, and had not transgressed at any time his commandments, did not envy him his visions and revelations, nor his more extensive usefulness, but glorified God in him, which ought to be an example to us, as the reverse of this elder brother.

2. Let us now see how favourable and friendly his father was in his carriage towards him, when he was thus sour and ill-humoured; and this is as surprising as the former. Methinks the mercy and grace of our God in Christ shine almost as bright in his tender and gentle bearing with peevish sinners, represented by the elder brother here, as before, in his reception of prodigal sinners upon their repentance, represented before by the younger brother. The disciples of Christ themselves had many infirmities, and were men subject to like passions as others, yet Christ bare with them, as a nurse with her children: see 1 Thes. ii. 7.

1st. When he would not come in, "his father came out and entreated him," spoke him fair, gave him good words, and desired him to come in. He might justly have said, "If he will not come in, let him stay out; shut the doors against him, and send him to seek a lodging where he can find it. Is not the house my own, and may I not do what I please in it? the fatted calf my own, and may I not do what I please with it?" No, as he went to meet the younger son, so now he goes to court the elder; did not send a servant out with a kind message to him, but went himself. Now, First, This is designed to represent to us the goodness of God; how strangely gentle and winning he has been towards those that were strangely froward and provoking. He reasoned with Cain, "Why art thou wroth?" He bare Israel's manners in the wilderness, Acts xv. 18. How mildly did God reason with Elijah, when he was upon the fret, 1 Kin. xix. 4-6; and especially with Jonah, whose case was very parallel with this here, for he was there disquieted at the repentance of Nineveh, and the mercy shewn it, as the elder brother here; and those questions, "Dost thou well to be angry?" and, "Should not I spare Nineveh?" are not unlike these expostulations of the father with the elder brother here. Secondly, It is to teach all superiors to be mild and gentle with their inferiors, even when they are in a fault, and passionately justify themselves in it, than which nothing can be more provoking; and yet even in that case let fathers not provoke their children to more wrath, and masters forbear threatening, and both shew all meekness.

2nd. His father assured him that the kind entertainment he gave his younger brother neither was any reflection upon him, nor should be any prejudice to him, ver. 31. Thou shalt far never the worse for it, nor have ever the less for it; "son, thou art ever with me," the reception of him is no rejection of thee, nor what is laid out on him any sensible diminution of what I design for thee; thou shalt still remain entitled to the pars emtia, so our law calls it; a double portion, so the Jewish law called it; "thou shalt be heres ex asse," so the Roman law called it; "all that I have is thine," by an indefeasible title. If he had not given him a kid to make merry with his friends, he had eaten bread at his table continually; and it is better he should be happy with our Father in heaven, than merry with any friend we have in this world. Note, First, It is the unspeakable happiness of all the children of God, who keep close to their Father's house, that they are and shall be ever with him; they are so in this world by faith, they shall be so in the other world by fruition, and all that he has is theirs; for if children, then heirs, Rom. viii. 17. Secondly, Therefore we ought not to envy others God's grace to them, because we shall have never the less for their sharing in it. If we be true believers, all that God is, and all that he has, is ours; and if others come to be true believers, all that he is, and all that he has, is theirs too; and yet we have not the less. As they that walk in the light and warmth of the sun have all the benefit they can have by it, and yet not the less for others having as much; for Christ in his church is like as thry say of the soul in the body, it is tota in toto,—"the whole in the whole," and yet tota in qualibet parte,—"the whole in each part."

3rd. His father gave him a good reason for this uncommon joy in the family: ver. 32, "It was meet that we should make merry and be glad." He might have insisted upon his own authority; "It was my will that the family should make merry and be glad," stat pro ratione voluntas,—"my reason is, I will it to be so." But it doth not become even those that have authority to be vouching and appealing to it upon every occasion; that doth but make it cheap and common; it is better give a convincing reason, as the father doth here; "it was meet," and very becoming, "that we should make merry" for the return of a prodigal son, more than for the perseverance of a dutiful son; for, though the latter be a greater blessing to a family, yet the former is a more sensible pleasure. Any family would be much more transported with joy at the raising of a dead child to life, yea, or at the recovery of a child from a sickness that was adjudged mortal, than for the continued life and health of many children. Note, God will be justified when he speaks, and all flesh shall sooner or later be silent before him. We do not find any reply that the elder brother made to what his father said, which intimates that he was entirely satisfied, and acquiesced in his father's will, and was well reconciled to his prodigal brother; and his father put him in mind that he was his brother; "this thy brother." Note, A good man, though he have not such command of himself at all times as to keep his temper, yet will, with the grace of God, recover his temper; "though he fall, yet shall he not be utterly cast down;" but as for the scribes and Pharisees, for whose conviction it was primarily intended, for aught appears, they continued the same disaffection to the sinners of the Gentiles, and to the Gospel of Christ because it was preached to them.

CHAPTER XVI.

The scope of Christ's discourse in this chapter is to awaken and quicken us all so to use this world as not to abuse it; so to manage all our possessions and enjoyments here as that they may make for us, and may not make against us, in the other world; for they will do either the one or the other, according as we use them now. I. If we do good with them, and lay out what we have in works of piety and charity, we shall reap the benefit of it in the world to come; and this he shews in the parable of the unjust steward, who made so good a hand of his lord's goods, as that, when he was turned out of his stewardship, he had a comfortable subsistence to betake himself to. The parable itself we have, ver. 1-8; the reddition and application of it, ver. 9-13; and the contempt which the Pharisees put upon the doctrine which Christ preached to them, for which he sharply reproved them, adding some other weighty sayings, ver. 14-18. II. If, instead of doing good with our worldly enjoyments, we make them the food and fuel of our lusts, of our luxury and sensuality, and deny relief to the poor, we shall certainly perish eternally, and the things of this world which were thus abused will but add to our misery and torment. This he shews in the other parable, of the rich man and Lazarus, which has likewise a farther reach, and that is, to awaken us all to take the warning given us by the written Word, and not to expect immediate messages from the other world, ver. 19-31.

AND he said also unto his disciples, There was a certain rich man, which had a steward; and the same was accused unto him that he had wasted his goods. 2 And he called him, and said unto him, How is it that I hear this of thee? give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward. 3 Then the steward said within himself, What shall I do? for my lord taketh away from me the stewardship: I cannot dig; to beg I am ashamed. 4 I am resolved what to do, that, when I am put out of the stewardship, they may receive me into their houses. 5 So he called every one of his lord's debtors unto him, and said unto the first, How much owest thou unto my lord? 6 And he said, An hundred measures of oil. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and sit down quickly, and write fifty. 7 Then said he to another, And how much owest thou? And he said, An hundred measures of wheat. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and write fourscore. 8 And the lord commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely: for the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light. 9 And I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations. 10 He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much: and he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much. 11 If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches? 12 And if and is worldly wealth, which is too often associated with injustice. The possessor of this wealth is bidden so to use it as to conciliate friends by means of it. For "when ye fail," the better reading is "when it fails," i.e., the wealth, the endurance of which is uncertain. On its failure the friends secured will welcome its former owner into everlasting habitations, or tabernacles, as the Greek is. It would be contrary to the spirit of the Gospel to infer from this that all who are made friends by means of wealth either go to heaven, and that before those who have made them friends, or have the power to receive them there. Nor can we infer that rich men who make friends by their money are sure to go to heaven. If it were so, then beggary and almsgiving would be more than virtues, they would give a title to salvation. True, our Lord mentions neither alms nor paupers, and the preceding parable favours the introduction of neither. There the friends are made by bribery, and are not poor. Hence we must conclude the general leading idea of this verse to be such a prudent ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own? 13 No servant can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. 14 And the Pharisees also, who were covetous, heard all these things: and they derided him. 15 And he said unto them, Ye are they which justify yourselves before men; but God knoweth your hearts: for that which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God. 16 The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it. 17 And it is easier for heaven and earth to pass, than one tittle of the law to fail. 18 Whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, committeth adultery: and whosoever marrieth her that is put away from her husband committeth adultery.

We mistake if we imagine that the design of Christ's doctrine and holy religion was either to amuse us with notions of Divine mysteries, or to entertain us with notions of Divine mercies. No, the Divine revelation of both those in the Gospel is intended to engage and quicken us to the practice of Christian duties, and as much as any one thing, to the duty of beneficence, and doing good to those who stand in need of any thing that either we have or can do for them. This our Saviour is here pressing us to, by minding us that we are but "stewards of the manifold grace of God;" and since we have in divers instances been unfaithful, and have forfeited the favour of our Lord, it is our wisdom to think how we may some other way make what we have in the world turn to a good account. Parables must not be forced beyond their primary intention, and therefore we must not hence infer that any one can befriend us if we lie under the displeasure of our Lord; but that, in the general, we must so lay out what we have in works of piety and charity, as that we may meet it again with comfort on the other side death and the grave. If we would act wisely, we must be as diligent and industrious to employ our riches in the acts of piety and charity, in order to promote our future and eternal welfare, as worldly men are in laying them out to the greatest temporal profit, in making to themselves friends with them, and securing other secular interests. So Dr. Clark. Now let us consider,

First. The parable itself, in which all the children of men are represented as stewards of what they have in this world; and we are but stewards; whatever we have, the property of it is God's; we have only the use of it, and that according to the direction of our great Lord, and for his honour. Rabbi Kimchi, quoted by Dr. Lightfoot, saith, 'This world is a house, heaven the roof; the stars the lights; the earth, with its fruits, a table spread; the master of the house is the holy and blessed God; man is the steward, into whose hands the goods of this house are delivered; if he behave himself well, he shall find favour in the eyes of his Lord; if not, he shall be turned out of his stewardship.' Now,

1. Here is the dishonesty of this steward; he "wasted his lord's goods," embezzled them, misapplied them, or, through carelessness, suffered them to be lost and damaged; and for this he was accused to his lord, ver. 1. We are all liable to the same charge; we have not made a due improvement of what God has intrusted us with in this world, but have perverted his purpose; and that we may not be for this judged of our Lord, it concerns us to judge ourselves.

2. His discharge out of his place: "His lord called for him, and said, How is it that I hear this of thee?" "I expected better things from thee." He speaks as one sorry to find himself disappointed in him, and under a necessity of dismissing him from his service. It troubles him to hear it, but the steward cannot deny it, and therefore there is no remedy; he must make up his accounts, and be gone in a little time, ver. 2. Now this is designed to teach us, 1st. That we must all of us shortly be discharged from our stewardship in this world; we must not always enjoy those things we now enjoy. Death will come and dismiss us from our stewardship, will deprive us of the abilities and opportunities we now have of doing good, and others will come in our places and have the same. 2nd. That our discharge from our stewardship at death is just, and what we have deserved; for we have wasted our Lord's goods, and thereby forfeited our trust; so that we cannot complain of any wrong done us. 3rd. That when our stewardship is taken from us, we must give an account of it to our Lord; "after death the judgment;" both which, both our discharge and our account, we are fairly warned of, and ought to be frequently thinking of.

3. His after-wisdom; now he began to consider, "What shall I do?" ver. 3. He would have done well to have considered that before he had so foolishly thrown himself out of a good place by his unfaithfulness; but it is better to consider late than never. Note, Since we have all received notice that we must shortly be turned out of our stewardship, we are concerned to consider what we shall do then. He must live; which way shall he have a livelihood?

1st. He knows he has not such a degree of industry in him as to get his living by work; "I cannot dig;" "I cannot earn my bread by my labour." But why can he not dig? It doth not appear that he was either old or lame; but the truth is, he is lazy; his cannot is a will not; it is not a natural, but a moral disability that he labours under; if his master, when he turned him out of the stewardship, had continued him in his service as a labourer, and set a taskmaster over him, he would have made him dig. He cannot dig, for he was never used to it. Now this intimates that we cannot get a livelihood for our souls by any labour for this world, nor indeed can do any thing to purpose for our souls by any ability of our own.

2nd. He knows he has not such a degree of humility as to get his bread by begging: "to beg I am ashamed." This was the language of his pride, as the former of his slothfulness; those whom God in his providence has disabled to help themselves should not be ashamed to ask relief of others. This steward had more reason to be ashamed of his cheating his master than of begging his bread.

3rd. He therefore determines to make friends of his lord's debtors, or his tenants that were behind of their rent, and had given notes under their hand for it; ver. 4, "I am resolved what to do." My lord turns me out of his house; I have none of my own to go to; I am acquainted with my lord's tenants, have done them many a good turn, and now I will do them one more, which will so oblige them that they will bid me welcome to their houses and the best entertainment they afford; and so long as I live, at least till I can better dispose of myself, I will quarter upon them, and go from one good house to another. Now the way he would take to make them his friends was, by striking off a considerable part of their debt to his lord, and giving it in his accounts so much less than it was. Accordingly he sent for one that owed his lord "a hundred measures of oil;" in that commodity he paid his rent: "Take thy bill," said he; here it is, "and sit down quickly, and write fifty," ver. 6; so he reduced his debt one half. Observe, He was in haste to have it done: "sit down quickly" and do it, lest we be taken treating, and suspected. He took another, that owed his lord an hundred measures of wheat, and from his bill he cut off a fifth part, and bid him write fourscore, ver. 7; and probably he did the like by others; abating more or less, according as he expected kindness from them. See here what uncertain things our worldly possessions are, and most so to those that have most of them, who devolve upon others all the care concerning them, and so put it into their power to cheat them, because they will not trouble themselves to see with their own eyes. See also what treachery is to be found even among those in whom trust is reposed. How hard is it it to find one that a confidence can be reposed in! "Let God be true, but every man a liar." Though this steward is turned out for dealing dishonestly, yet still he doth so. So rare is it for men to mend a fault, though they smart for it.

4. The approbation of this: ver. 8, "The lord commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely." Whether it be meant of his lord, the lord of that servant, who, though he could not but be angry at his knavery, yet was pleased with his ingenuity and policy for himself; but taking it so, the latter part of the verse must be the words of our Lord, and therefore I think the whole is meant of him. Christ did as it were say, 'Now commend me to such a man as this, that knows how to do well for himself, how to improve a present opportunity, and how to provide for a future necessity.' He doth not commend him because he had done falsely to his master, but because he had done wisely for himself. Yet perhaps herein he did well for his master too, and but justly with the tenants. He knew what hard bargains he had set them, so that they could not pay their rent, but, having been screwed up by his rigour, were thrown behindhand, and they and their families were likely to go to ruin; and in consideration of this, he now, at going off, did as he ought to do, both in justice and charity; not only easing them of part of their arrears, but abating of their rent for the future. "How much owest thou?" may be meant, 'What rent dost thou sit upon?' 'Come,' saith he, 'I will set thee an easier bargain, and yet no easier than what thou oughtest to have.' He had been all for his lord, but now he begins to consider the tenants, that he might have their favour when he had lost his lord's. The abating of their rent would be a lasting kindness, and more likely to engage them than abating their arrears only.

Now this forecast of his, for a comfortable subsistence in this world, shames our improvidence for another world. "The children of this world," that choose and have their portion in it, "are wiser for their generation," act more considerately, and better consult their worldly interest and advantage, "than the children of light," who enjoy the Gospel in their generation, that is, in the concerns of their souls and eternity. Note, 1st. The wisdom of worldly people in the concerns of this world is to be imitated by us in the concerns of our souls; it is their principle to improve their opportunities, to do that first which is most needful; in summer and harvest to lay up for winter; to take a good bargain when it is offered them; to trust the faithful, and not the false. O that we were thus wise in our spiritual affairs! 2nd. The children of light are commonly outdone by the children of this world. Not that the children of this world are truly wise, but only in their generation; but in that they "are wiser than the children of light" in theirs; for though we are told that we must shortly be turned out of our stewardship, yet we do not provide as we should for such a day; we live as if we were to be here always, and as if there were not another life after this, and are not solicitous, as this steward was, to provide for hereafter; though as children of light, that light to which life and immortality are brought by the Gospel, we cannot but see another world before us, yet do not prepare for it, do not send our best effects and best affections thither, as we should.

5. The application of this parable, and the inferences drawn from it, ver. 9: "I say unto you," you my disciples, for to them this parable is directed, ver. 1, though you have but little in this world, consider how you may do good with that little. Observe,

1st. What it is that our Lord Jesus here exhorts us to; to provide for our comfortable reception to the happiness of another world, by making good use of our possessions and enjoyments in this world; "make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness," as the steward with his lord's goods made his lord's tenants his friends. It is the wisdom of the men of this world so to manage their money as that they may have the benefit of it hereafter, and not for the present only; therefore they put it out to interest, buy land with it, put it into this or the other fund. Now we should learn of them to make use of our money so as that we may be the better for it hereafter in another world, as they do in hopes to be the better for it hereafter in this world; so cast it upon the waters as that we may find it again after many days, Eccl. xi. 1. And in our case, though whatever we have is our Lord's goods, yet as long as we dispose of them among our Lord's tenants, and for their advantage, it is so far reckoned from being a wrong to our Lord, that it is duty to him, as well as policy for ourselves.

Note, First. The things of this world are the mammon of unrighteousness, or the false mammon; not only because often got by fraud and unrighteousness, but because those who trust to it for satisfaction and happiness will certainly be deceived; for riches are perishing things, and will disappoint those that raise their expectations from them. Secondly. Though this mammon of unrighteousness is not to be trusted to for a happiness, yet it may and must be made use of, in subserviency to our pursuit of that which is our happiness. Though we cannot find true satisfaction in it, yet we may make to ourselves friends with it, not by way of purchase or merit, but recommendation; so we may make God and Christ our friends, the good angels and saints our friends, and the poor our friends; and it is a desirable thing to be befriended in the account and state to come. Thirdly. At death we must all fail, ὅταν ἐκλίνωμεν, "when ye suffer an eclipse;" death eclipseth us. A tradesman is said to fail when he becomes a bankrupt; we must all thus fail shortly; death shuts up the shop, seals up the hand. Our comforts and enjoyments on earth will all fail us; flesh and heart fail. Fourthly. It ought to be our great concern to make it sure to ourselves, that when we fail, at death, we may be received into use of wealth as shall be of advantage when the wealth itself shall depart, be it soon or be it late. Yet it is usual to limit the application of the passage to gifts bestowed upon the poor. This has given occasion to a materialising exegesis, which has confounded poverty of spirit with literal poverty, and excluded the greater by glorifying the lesser. Almsgiving is in truth a virtuous deed and a Christian duty; but when it is made a means of pardon and salvation, it is put in the place of Christ. The annotators of the Rhemish version have done all this and more; they have gathered from this text the doctrine that dead saints pray for their living benefactors. Nay, they make it teach that "alms bestowed specially upon holy men, who by their merits and prayers are great in God's grace, may much more help us than our charitable deeds done upon vulgar men in necessity, though that be of exceeding great merit also." Such doctrine tends directly to turn aside Christian charity from the sinners whom Christ came to call, and makes almsgiving a everlasting habitations in heaven. The habitations in heaven are everlasting; not made with hands, but eternal, 2 Cor. v. 1. Christ is gone before, to prepare a place for those that are his, and is there ready to receive them; the bosom of Abraham is ready to receive them; and when a guard of angels carries them thither, a choir of angels is ready to receive them there. The poor saints, that are gone before to glory, will receive those that in this world distributed to their necessities. Fifthly. This is a good reason why we should use what we have in the world for the honour of God and the good of our brethren, that thus we may with them lay up in store a good bond, a good security, "a good foundation for the time to come," for an eternity to come: see 1 Tim. vi. 17—19, which explains this here.

2nd. With what arguments he presseth this exhortation to abound in works of piety and charity.

First. If we do not make a right use of the gifts of God's providence, how can we expect from him those present and future comforts which are the gifts of his spiritual grace? Our Saviour here compares these, and shews that though our faithful use of the things of this world cannot be thought to merit any favour at the hand of God, yet our unfaithfulness in the use of them may be justly reckoned a forfeiture of that grace which is necessary to bring us to glory, and that is it which our Saviour here shews, ver. 10—12. 1st. The riches of this world are the less; grace and glory are the greater. Now if we be unfaithful in the less, if we use the things in this world to other purposes than those for which they were given us, it may justly be feared we shall be so in the gifts of God's grace, that we will receive them also in vain, and therefore they will be denied us: "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much." He that serves God, and doth good with his money, will serve God, and do good with the more noble and valuable talents of wisdom and grace, and spiritual gifts, and the earnestness of heaven; but he that buries the one talent of this world's wealth, will never improve the five talents of spiritual riches. God withholdeth his grace from covetous worldly people more than we are aware of. 2nd. The riches of this world are deceitful and uncertain; it is "the unrighteous mammon," which is hastening from us apace, and which, if we will make any advantage of, we must bestir ourselves quickly; but if we do not, how can we expect to be intrusted with spiritual riches, which are the only true riches? ver. 11. Let us be convinced of this, that those are truly rich, and very rich, who are rich in faith, and rich towards God, rich in Christ, and in the promises, and in the earnestness of heaven; and therefore let us lay up our treasure in them, and expect our portion from them, and mind them in the first place, "the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof," and then, if other things be added to us, use them in ordine ad spiritualia,—with a spiritual reference; so as that, by using them well, we may take the faster hold of the true riches, and may be qualified to receive yet more grace from God, for "God giveth to a man that is good in his sight," that is, to a free-hearted, charitable man, "wisdom, and knowledge, and joy," Eccl. ii. 26; that is, to a man that is faithful in the unrighteous mammon he gives the true riches. 3rd. The riches of this world are another man's; they are τά ἀλλότρια, not 'our own,' for they are foreign to the soul and its nature and interest: they are not our own, for they are God's; his title to them is prior and superior to ours, the property remains in him; we are but usufructuaries, they are another man's; we have them from others, we use them for others; and what good has the owner from his goods that increase, save the beholding of them with his eyes, while still they are increased that eat them? and we must shortly leave them to others, and we know not who. But spiritual and eternal interests are our own; they enter into the soul that becomes possessed of them, and inseparably; they are a good part, that will never be taken away from us: if we make Christ our own, and the promises our own, and heaven our own, we have that which we may truly call our own. But how can we expect God should enrich us with these, if we do not serve him with our worldly possessions, which we are but stewards of?

Secondly. We have no other way to prove ourselves the servants of God, but by giving up ourselves so entirely to his service as to make mammon, that is, all our worldly gain, serviceable to us in his service; ver. 13. "no servant can serve two masters," whose commands are so inconsistent as those of God and mammon are. If a man will love the world, and hold to that, it cannot be but he will hate God, and despise him: he will make all his pretensions of religion truckle to his secular interests and designs, and the things of God shall be made to help him in serving and seeking the world; but on the other hand, if a man will love God, and adhere to him, he will comparatively hate the world, (whenever God and the world come in competition,) and will despise it, and make all his business and success in the world some way or other conducive to the furtherance of him in the business of religion; and the things of the world shall be made to help him in serving God, and working out his salvation. The matter is here laid plainly before us, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon;" so divided are their interests, that their services can never be compounded. If therefore we be determined to serve God, we must disclaim and abjure the service of the world.

3rd. We are here told what entertainment this doctrine of Christ met with among the Pharisees, and what rebuke he gave them.

First. They wickedly ridiculed him, ver. 14. The "Pharisees, who were covetous, heard all these things," and could not contradict him, but "they derided him." Let us consider this, 1st. As their sin, and the fruit of their covetousness, which was their reigning sin, their own iniquity. Note, Many that make a great profession of religion, have much knowledge, and abound in the exercise of devotion, yet are ruined by the love of the world; nor doth any thing harden the heart more against the word of Christ. These covetous Pharisees could not bear to have that touched which was their Delilah, their darling lust, for this they derided him; ἐξευκρίνον αὐτόν,—they snuffed up their noses at him, or blew their noses on him; it is an expression of the utmost scorn and disdain imaginable; "the word of the Lord was to them a reproach," Jer. vi. 10. They laughed at him for going so contrary to the opinion and way of the world, for endeavouring to recover them from a sin which they were resolved to hold fast. Note, It is common for those to make a jest of the word of God who are resolved they will not be ruled by it; but they will find at last it cannot be turned off so. 2nd. As his suffering. Our Lord Jesus endured not only the contradiction of sinners, but their contempt; they had him in derision all the day. He that spake as never man spake, yet was bantered and ridiculed, that his faithful ministers, whose preaching is unjustly derided, may not be disheartened at it. It is no disgrace to a man to be laughed at, but to deserve to be laughed at: Christ's apostles were mocked, and no wonder; "the disciple is not greater than his Lord."

Secondly. He justly reproved them; not for deriding him, he knew how to despise the shame; but for deceiving themselves with the shows and colours of piety, when they were strangers to the power of it, ver. 15. Here is, 1st. Their specious outside; nay, it was a splendid one. First. They justified themselves before men; they denied whatever ill was laid to their charge, even by Christ himself; they claimed to be looked upon as men of singular sanctity and devotion, and justified themselves in that claim. "You are they that" do that so as none ever did, that make it your business to court the opinion of men, and right or wrong will "justify yourselves" before the world; so you are notorious for this. Secondly. They were highly esteemed among men; men did not only acquit them from any blame they were under, but applauded them, and had them in veneration, not only as good men, but as the best of men. Their sentiments were esteemed as oracles, their directions as laws, and their practices as inviolable prescriptions. 2nd. Their odious inside, which was under the eye of God: he knows your heart; and it is in his sight an abomination, for it is full of all manner of wickedness. Note, First. It is folly to justify ourselves before men, and to think this enough to bear us out, and bring us off in the judgment of the great day, that men know no ill by us; for God, who knows our hearts, knows that ill by us which no one else can know. This ought to check our value for ourselves, and our confidence in ourselves, that God knows our hearts, and how much there is there; for we have reason to abase and distrust ourselves. Secondly. It is folly to judge of persons and things by the opinion of men concerning them, and to go down with the stream of vulgar estimate; "for that which is highly esteemed among men," who judge according to outward appearance, "is," perhaps, "an abomination in the sight of God," who sees things as they are, and whose judgment we are sure is according to truth; and on the contrary there are those whom men despise and condemn, that yet are accepted and approved of God, 2 Cor. x. 18.

Thirdly. He turned from them to the publicans and sinners, as more likely to be wrought upon by his Gospel than those covetous, conceited Pharisees; ver. 16. "The law and the prophets were" indeed "until John." The Old Testament dispensation, which was confined to you, Jews, continued till John Baptist appeared; and you seemed to have the monopoly of righteousness and salvation, and you are puffed up with this; and this gains you esteem among men, that you are students in the law and the prophets. But since John Baptist appeared, "the kingdom of God is preached," a New Testament dispensation, which doth not value men at all for their being doctors of the law; but "every man presseth into" the Gospel kingdom, Gentiles as well as Jews; and no man thinks himself bound in good manners to let his betters go before him into it, or to stay till the rulers and the Pharisees have led him that way. It is not so much a political, national constitution as the Jewish economy was, when salvation was of the Jews; but it is made a particular personal concern, and therefore every man that is convinced he has a soul to save, and an eternity to provide for, thrusts to get in, lest he should come short by trifling and complimenting. Some give this sense of it; they derided Christ for speaking in contempt of riches; for, thought they, were there not many promises of riches and other temporal good things in the law and the prophets; and were not many of the best of God's servants very rich, as Abraham and David? It is true, saith Christ, so it was; but now the kingdom of God is begun to be preached, things take a new turn; now, blessed are the poor, and the mourners, and the persecuted. The Pharisees, to requite the people for their high opinion of them, allowed them in a cheap, easy, formal religion; but, saith Christ, now the Gospel is preached, the eyes of the people are opened, and as they cannot now have a veneration for the Pharisees, as they have had, so they cannot content themselves with such an indifferency in religion as they have been trained up in, but they press with a holy violence into the kingdom of God. Note, Those that would go to heaven must take pains, must strive against the stream, must press against the crowd that are going the contrary way.

Fourthly. Yet still he protests against any design to invalidate the law, ver. 17; "It is easier for heaven and earth to pass,"—παρελθεῖν, 'to pass by, to pass away,' (though the foundations of the earth, and the pillars of heaven are so firmly established,)—"than one tittle of the law to fail." The moral law is confirmed and ratified, and not one tittle of that fails; the duties enjoined by it are duties still; the sins forbidden by it are sins still: nay, the precepts of it are explained and enforced by the Gospel, and made to appear more spiritual. The ceremonial law is perfected in the Gospel, and its shades filled up with the Gospel colours; not one tittle of that fails, for it is found printed off in the Gospel, where, though the force of it as a law is taken off, yet the figure of it as a type shines very bright; witness the epistle to the Hebrews. And there were some things which were connived at by the law, for the preventing of greater mischiefs, which the Gospel has indeed taken away the permission of, but without any detriment or disparagement to the law, for it has thereby reduced them to the primitive intention of the law, as in the case of divorce, ver. 18, which we had before, Mat. v. 32; xix. 9. Christ will not allow divorces, for his Gospel is intended to strike at the bitter root of men's corrupt appetites and passions, to kill them, and pluck them up; and therefore they must not be so far indulged as that permission did indulge them; for the more they are indulged, the more impetuous and headstrong they grow.

19 There was a certain rich man, which was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day: 20 And there was a certain beggar named Lazarus, which was laid at his gate mere commercial speculation and matter of investment and dividends. This transforms charity itself into pure selfishness. On the whole, we infer our Lord's meaning is, that the just and even generous use of wealth is one of the virtues which is required of us; and that hereafter our conduct will be testified to, and our uprightness in this regard reckoned among the proofs of our fidelity to God. That our works will be brought into judgment is taught in many texts, and this we take to be the doctrine here. We do not find in it the Pelagian and Popish doctrine that alms confer merit on us, nor the Ebionite doctrine that a Christian cannot hold wealth, but the best use of wealth is enjoined. There is probably a temporal application of the words to this effect, that he who uses his wealth well while he has it will profit from it when it fails.

xvi. 12. They who are unfaithful in the employment of worldly wealth and talents are not fit to receive the riches of truth and grace.

xvi. 15. "That which is highly esteemed among men" is not full of sores, 21 And desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table: moreover the dogs came and licked his sores. 22 And it came to pass, that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom: the rich man also died, and was buried; 23 And in hell he lift up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. 24 And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame. 25 But Abraham said, Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented. 26 And beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence. 27 Then he said, I pray thee therefore, father, that thou wouldest send him to my father's house: 28 For I have five brethren; that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of torment. 29 Abraham saith unto him, They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them. 30 And he said, Nay, father Abraham: but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent. 31 And he said unto him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead.

As the parable of the prodigal son set before us the grace of the Gospel, which is encouraging to us all; so this sets before us the wrath to come, and is designed for our awakening; and very fast asleep those are in sin that will not be awakened by it. The Pharisees made a jest of Christ's sermon against worldliness: now this parable was intended to make those mockers serious. The tendency of the Gospel of Christ is both to reconcile us to poverty and affliction, and to arm us against temptations to worldliness and sensuality: now this parable, by drawing the curtain, and letting us see what will be the end of both in the other world, goes very far in prosecuting those two great intentions.

This parable is not like Christ's other parables, in which spiritual things are represented by similitudes borrowed from worldly things, as those of the sower and the seed, except that of the sheep and goats, the prodigal son, and indeed all the rest but this. But here the spiritual things themselves are represented in a narrative or description of the different state of good and bad in this world and the other: yet we need not call it a history of a particular occurrence; but is matter of fact, that is true every day; that poor godly people, whom men neglect and trample upon, die away out of their miseries, and go to heavenly bliss and joy, which is made the more pleasant to them by their preceding sorrows; and that rich epicures, that live in luxury, and are unmerciful to the poor, die and go into a state of insupportable torment, which is the more grievous and terrible to them, because of the sensual lives they lived, and that there is no gaining any relief for their torments. Is this a parable? What similitude is there in this? The discourse indeed between Abraham and the rich man is only an illustration of the description, to make it the more affecting, like that between God and Satan in the story of Job. Our Saviour came to bring us acquainted with another world, and to shew us the reference which this world has to that; and here he doth it. In this description (for so I shall choose to call it) we may observe,

First. The different condition of a wicked rich man, and a godly poor man, in this world. We know that as some of late, so the Jews of old, were ready to make prosperity one of the marks of a true church, of a good man, and a favourite of Heaven; so that they could hardly have any favourable thoughts of a poor man. This mistake Christ, upon all occasions, set himself to correct; and here very fully; where we have,

1. A wicked-man, and one that will be for ever miserable, in the height of prosperity, ver. 19: "There was a certain rich man," from the Latin we commonly call him Dives, a rich man; but, as Bishop Tillotson observes, he has no name given him, as the poor man has, because it had been invidious to have named any particular rich man in such a description as this, and apt to provoke and gain ill-will. But others observe, that Christ would not do the rich man so much honour as to name him; though when perhaps he called his lands by his own name, he thought it should long survive that of the beggar at his gate, which yet is here preserved, when that of the rich man is buried in oblivion. Now we are told concerning this rich man, 1st. That he "was clothed in purple and fine linen;" and that was his adorning. He had fine linen for pleasure, and clean, no doubt, every day; night linen, and day linen. He had purple for state, for that was the wear of princes; which has made some conjecture that Christ had an eye to Herod in it. He never appeared abroad but it was in great magnificence. 2nd. "He fared" deliciously and "sumptuously every day." His tables were furnished with all the varieties and dainties that nature and art could furnish him with. His side-table richly adorned with plate, and his servants that waited at table in rich liveries; and the guests at his table, no doubt, such as he thought graced it.

Well, and what harm was there in all this? It is no sin to be rich, no sin to wear purple and fine linen, nor to keep a plentiful table, if a man's estate will afford it. Nor are we told that he got his estate by fraud, oppression, or extortion; no, nor that he was drunk, or made others drunk. But, First, Christ would hereby shew, that a man may have a great deal of the wealth, and pomp, and pleasure of this world, and yet lie and perish for ever under God's wrath and curse. We cannot infer from men's living great, either that God loves them, in giving them so much, or that they love God, for giving them so much. Happiness consists not in these things. Secondly, That plenty and pleasure is a very dangerous, and to many a fatal, temptation to luxury and sensuality, and forgetfulness of God and another world. This man might have been happy if he had not had great possessions and enjoyments. Thirdly, That the indulgence of the body, and the ease and pleasure of that, is the ruin of many a soul, and the interests of it. It is true, eating good meat, and wearing good clothes, is lawful; but it is as true, that it often becomes the food and fuel of pride and luxury, and so turns into sin to us. Fourthly, That feasting ourselves and our friends, and at the same time forgetting the distresses of the poor and afflicted, is very provoking to God, and damning to the soul. The sin of this rich man was not so much his dress or his diet, but his providing for himself only.

2. Here is a godly man, and one that will be for ever happy, in the depth of adversity and distress, ver. 20: "there was a certain beggar named Lazarus;" a beggar of that name, eminently devout, and in great distress, was probably well known among good people at that time. A beggar, suppose such a one as Eleazar or Lazarus. Some think Eleazar a proper name for any poor man, for it signifies the help of God, which they must fly to that are destitute of other helps. This poor man was reduced to the last extremity, as miserably as you can lightly suppose a man to be in this world as to outward things. 1st. His body was full of sores, like Job. To be sick and weak in body is a great affliction; but sores are more painful to the patient, and more loathsome to those about him. 2nd. He was forced to beg his bread, and to take up with such scraps as he could get at rich people's doors. He was so sore and lame that he could not go himself, but he was carried by some compassionate hand or other, and laid at the rich man's gate. Note, Those that are not able to help the poor with their purses, should help them with their pains; that cannot lend them a penny, should lend them a hand; that have not wherewithal to give to them themselves, should either bring them, or go for them, to those that have. Lazarus, in his distress, had nothing of his own to subsist on, no relation to go to, nor did the parish take care of him. It is an instance of the degeneracy of the Jewish church at this time, that such a godly man as Lazarus was should be suffered to perish for want of necessary food. Now observe,

First. His expectations from the rich man's table; "he desired to be fed with the crumbs," ver. 21. He did not look for a mess from off his table, though he ought to have had one, one of the best; but would be thankful for the crumbs from under the table, the broken meat, which was the rich man's leavings; nay, the leavings of his dogs. "The poor useth entreaties," and must be content with such as they can get. Now this is taken notice of to shew, 1st. What was the distress, and what the disposition, of the poor man. He was poor, but he was poor in spirit, contentedly poor. He did not lie at the rich man's gate complaining, and howling, and making a noise, but silently and modestly desiring to be fed with the crumbs. This miserable man was a good man, and in favour with God. Note, It is often the lot of some of the dearest of God's saints and servants to be greatly afflicted in this world, while wicked people prosper and have abundance; see Ps. lxxiii. 7, 10, 14. Here is a child of wrath, and an heir of hell, sitting in the house, faring sumptuously; and a child of love, and an heir of heaven, lying at the gate, perishing for hunger. And is men's spiritual state to be judged of, then, by their outward condition? 2nd. What was the temper of the rich man towards him. We are not told that he abused him, or forbade him his gate; or did him any harm; but it is intimated that he slighted him, he had no concern for him, took no care about him. Here was a real object of charity, and a very moving one, which spoke for itself; it was presented to him at his own gate; the poor man had a good character, and a good carriage, and every thing that could recommend him. A little thing would be a great kindness to him, and yet he took no cognizance of his case, did not order him to be taken in and lodged in the barn, or some of the outbuildings, but let him lie there. Note, It is not enough not to oppress and trample upon the poor; we shall be found unfaithful stewards of our Lord's goods in the great day if we do not succour and relieve them. The reason given for the most fearful doom is, "I was hungry, and you gave me no meat." I wonder how those rich people, that have read the Gospel of Christ, and say they believe it, can be so unconcerned, as they often are, in the necessities and miseries of the poor and afflicted.

Secondly. The usage he had from the dogs; "the dogs came and licked his sores." The rich man kept a kennel of hounds, it may be, or other dogs, for his diversion, and to please his fancy; and those were fed to the full, when poor Lazarus could not get enough to keep him alive. Note, Those will have a great deal to answer for hereafter, that feed their dogs, but neglect the poor; and it is a great aggravation of the uncharitableness of many rich people, that they bestow that upon their fancies and follies which would supply the necessity, and rejoice the heart, of many a good Christian in distress. Those offend God, nay, and they put a contempt upon the human nature, that pamper their dogs and horses, and let the families of their poor neighbours starve. Now, those "dogs came and licked the sores" of poor Lazarus, which may be taken, 1st. As an aggravation of his misery. His sores were bloody, which tempted the dogs to come and lick them, as they did the blood of Naboth and Ahab, 1 Kin. xxi. 19. And we read of the tongue of the dogs dipped in the blood of enemies, Ps. lxxviii. 22. They attacked him while he was yet alive, as if he had been already dead; and he had not strength himself to keep them off, nor would any of the servants be so civil as to check them. The dogs were like their master, and thought they fared sumptuously when they regaled themselves with human gore. Or it may be taken, 2nd. As some relief to him in his misery; ἀλλὰ καὶ, the master was hard-hearted towards him, but the dogs came and licked his sores, which mollified and eased him; it is not said they sucked them, but licked them, which was good for them. The dogs were more kind to him than their master was.

Secondly. Here is the different condition of this godly poor man, and this wicked rich man, at and after death. Hitherto the wicked man seems to have the advantage, but exitus acta probat,—"let us wait a while, to see the end hereof."

1. They both die, ver. 22; "the beggar died: the rich man also died." Death is the common lot of rich and poor, godly and ungodly; there they meet together. "One dieth in his full strength, and another in the bitterness of his soul," but "they shall lie down alike in the dust," Job xxi. 23, 25, 26. Death favours not, either the rich man for his riches, or the poor man for his poverty. Saints die, that they may bring their sorrows to an end, and may enter upon their joys; sinners die, that they may go to give up their account. It concerns everything which stands high in human opinion. The sense rather is, that some things stand high among men which before God are abominable; what is said of things is equally applicable to men.

xvi. 18. This may have an allusion to Herod, as was suspected by Tertullian, but it may be a reference to the laxity of the times. Thus Josephus says of his wife, "I put away my wife, who did not please me by her manners, when she had been the mother of three children."

xvi. 19. Here also Tertullian supposes Herod is alluded to. Mr. Prescott says, "The idea of Schleiermacher and others, that Herod and the Baptist are represented by the two characters, has nothing to support it; and the interpretation of Augustine, Theophylact, and their followers, concerning the relations of Jew and Gentile, is also quite beside the purpose of the parable." The name of Lazarus has been explained to mean "without help;" but the proper sense, as shown by the Syriac form of the word, is "God is my help;" i.e., b. th rich and poor to prepare for death, for it waits for them both. Mors aequa ligonibus aequat.—Death blends the sceptre with the spade.

Aequo pulsat pede pauperum tabernas, Regumque turres.

With equal pace, impartial fate
 Knocks at the palace as the cottage gate.

2. The beggar died first. God many times takes godly people out of the world, when he leaves the wicked to flourish still. It was an advantage to the beggar that such a speedy end was put to his miseries; and, since he could find no other shelter or resting-place, he was hid in the grave, where the weary are at rest.

3. "The rich man died, and was buried." Nothing is said of the interment of the poor man; they digged a hole any where, and tumbled his body in without any solemnity; he was "buried with the burial of an ass." Nay, it is well, if they that let the dogs lick his sores did not let them gnaw his bones. But the rich man had a pompous funeral, lay in state, had a train of mourners to attend him to his grave, and a stately monument set up over it; probably he had a funeral oration, in praise of him and his generous way of living, and the good table he kept, which those would commend that had been feasted at it. It is said of the wicked man, that he is "brought to the grave" with no small ado, and laid in the tomb; and "the clouds of the valley," were it possible, are made "sweet to him," Job xxi. 32, 33. How foreign is the ceremony of a funeral to the happiness of the man!

4. "The beggar died, and was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom." How much did the honour done to his soul, by this convey of it to its rest, exceed the honour done to the rich man, by the carrying of his body with so much magnificence to its grave! Observe, 1st. His soul existed in a state of separation from its body. It did not die or fall asleep with the body: his candle was not put out with him, but lived and acted, and knew what it did, and what was done to it. 2nd. His soul removed to another world, to the world of spirits; it returned to God who gave it, to its native country; this is implied in its being carried. The spirit of a man goes upward. 3rd. Angels took care of it, it was carried by angels. They are ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation, not only while they live, but when they die; and have a charge concerning them, to bear them up in their hands, not only in their journeys to and fro on earth, but in their great journey to their long home in heaven, to be both their guide and their guard through regions unknown and unsafe. The soul of man, if not chained to this earth, and clogged by it, as unsanctified souls are, has in itself an elastic virtue, by which it springs upward as soon as it gets clear of the body; but Christ will not trust those that are his to that, and therefore will send special messengers to fetch them to himself. One angel, one would think, were sufficient; but here are more, as were sent for Elijah. Amasis, king of Egypt, had his chariot drawn by kings; but what was that honour to this? Saints ascend in the virtue of Christ's ascension, but this convey of angels is added for state and decorum; saints shall be brought home, not only safely, but honourably. What were the bearers at the rich man's funeral, though probably those of the first rank, compared with Lazarus' bearers? The angels were not shy of touching him, for his sores were on his body, not on his soul; that was presented to God "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing." "Now, blessed angels," said a good man, just expiring, "now come, and do your office." 4th. It was carried into Abraham's bosom. The Jews expressed the happiness of the righteous at death three ways: they go to the garden of Eden, they go to be under the throne of glory, and they go to the bosom of Abraham; and that is it our Saviour here makes use of. Abraham was the father of the faithful; and whither should the souls of the faithful be gathered but to him who, as a tender father, lays them in his bosom, especially at their first coming, to bid them welcome, and to refresh them when newly come from the sorrows and fatigues of this world? He was carried to his bosom, that is, to feast with him, for at feasts the guests are said to lean on one another's breasts; and the saints in heaven "sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob." Abraham was a great and rich man, yet in heaven he doth not disdain to lay poor Lazarus in his bosom. Rich saints and poor meet in heaven. This poor Lazarus, that might not be admitted within the rich man's gate, is conducted into the dining-room, into the bed-chamber of the heavenly palace; and he is laid in the bosom of Abraham whom the rich glutton scorned to set with the dogs of his flock.

5. The next news you hear of the rich man, after the account of his death and burial is, that "in hell he lift up his eyes, being in torment," ver. 23.

1st. His state is very miserable; he is in hell, in Hades, in the state of separate souls, and there he is in the utmost misery and anguish possible. As the souls of the faithful, immediately after they are delivered from the burthen of the flesh, are in joy and felicity, so wicked and unsanctified souls, immediately after they are fetched from the pleasures of the flesh by death, are in misery and torment—endless, useless, and remediless, and which will be much increased and completed at the resurrection. This rich man had entirely devoted himself to the pleasures of the world of sense, was wholly taken up with them, and took up with them for his portion; and therefore was wholly unfit for the pleasures of the world of spirits; and to such a carnal mind as his they would indeed be no pleasure, nor could he have any relish of them, and therefore he is of course excluded from them. Yet that is not all, he was hardened to God's poor; and therefore he is not only cut off from mercy, but he has judgment without mercy, and falls under a punishment of sense, as well as a punishment of loss.

2nd. The misery of his state is aggravated by his knowledge of the happiness of Lazarus: "He lift up his eyes, and sees Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom." It is the soul that is in torment, and they are the eyes of the mind that are lifted up. He now began to consider what was become of Lazarus; he doth not find him where he is; nay, he plainly sees him, and with as much assurance as if he had seen him with his bodily eyes, afar off in the bosom of Abraham. This same aggravation of the miseries of the damned we had before, ch. xiii. 28, "Ye shall see Abraham, and all the prophets in the kingdom of God, and yourselves thrust out." First. He "saw Abraham afar off." To see Abraham we would think a pleasing sight, but to see him afar off was a tormenting sight. Near him he saw devils and damned companions, frightful sights, and painful ones; afar off he saw Abraham. Note, Every sight in hell is aggravating. Secondly. He saw "Lazarus in his bosom;" that same Lazarus whom he had looked upon with so much scorn and contempt, as not worthy his notice, he now sees preferred, and to be envied. The sight of him brought to his mind his own cruel and barbarous carriage towards him; and the sight of him in that happiness made his own misery the more grievous.

Thirdly. Here is an account of what passed between the rich man and Abraham, in the separate state—a state of separation one from another, and of both from this world; and though it is probable there will not be, nor are, any such dialogues or discourses between glorified saints and damned sinners, yet it is very proper, and what is usually done in descriptions, especially such as are designed to be pathetic and moving, by such dialogues to represent what will be the mind and sentiments both of the one and of the other. And since we find damned sinners tormented in the presence of the Lamb, Rev. xiv. 10, and the faithful servants of God looking upon them that have transgressed the covenant, there "where their worm dies not, and their fire is not quenched," Isa. lxxvi. 23, 24, such a discourse as this is not incongruous to be supposed. Now in this discourse we have,

1. The request which the rich man made to Abraham for some mitigation of his present misery, ver. 24. Seeing Abraham afar off, "he cried to him;" cried aloud, as one in earnest, and as one in pain and misery, mixing shrieks with his petitions, to enforce them by moving compassion. He that used to command aloud, now begs aloud, louder than ever Lazarus did at his gate. The songs of his riot and revels are all turned into lamentations. Observe here,

1st. The title he gives to Abraham: "Father Abraham." Note, There are many in hell that can call Abraham father, that were Abraham's seed after the flesh; nay, and many that were in name and profession the children of the covenant made with Abraham. Perhaps this rich man, in his carnal mirth, had ridiculed Abraham, and the story of Abraham, as the scoffers of the latter days do; but now he gives him a title of respect, "Father Abraham." Note, The day is coming when wicked men will be glad to scrape acquaintance with the righteous, and to claim kindred to them, though now they slight them. Abraham, in this description, represents Christ, for to him all judgment is committed, and it is his mind that Abraham here speaks. Those that now slight Christ will shortly make their court to him, "Lord, Lord."

2nd. The representation he makes to him of his present deplorable condition: "I am tormented in this flame." It is the torment of his soul that he complains of, and therefore such a fire as will operate upon souls; and such a fire the wrath of God is, fastening on a guilty conscience; such a fire horror of mind is, and the reproaches of a self-accusing, self-condemning heart. Nothing more painful and terrible to the body than to be tormented with fire; by that therefore the miseries and agonies of damned souls are represented.

3rd. His request to Abraham, in consideration of this misery: "Have mercy on me." Note, The day is coming when those that make light of Divine mercy will beg hard for it. O for mercy, mercy; when the day of mercy is over, and offers of mercy no more made. He that had no mercy on Lazarus, yet expects Lazarus should have mercy on him; 'for,' thinks he, 'Lazarus is better natured than ever I was.' The particular favour he begs is, "Send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue."

First. Here he complains of the torment of his tongue particularly, as if he were more tormented there than in any other part, the punishment answering the sin. The tongue is one of the organs of speech, and by the torment of that he is put in mind of all the wicked words that he had spoken against God and man; his cursing, and swearing, and blasphemy; all his hard speeches, and filthy speeches; by his words he is condemned, and therefore in his tongue he is tormented. The tongue is also one of the organs of tasting, and therefore the torments of that will mind him of his inordinate relish of the delights of sense, which he had rolled under his tongue.

Secondly. He desires a drop of water to cool his tongue. He doth not say, 'Father Abraham, send for me to thy bosom, to lie where Lazarus lies;' unsanctified souls do not, cannot truly desire the happiness of heaven; nay, he doth not say, 'Father Abraham, order me a release from this misery, help me out of this pit,' for he utterly despaired of that; but he asks as small a thing as could be asked, a drop of water, to cool his tongue for one moment.

Thirdly. He desires that Lazarus might bring it. I have sometimes suspected that he had herein an ill design upon Lazarus, and hoped, if he could get him within his reach, he would keep him from returning to the bosom of Abraham again. The heart that is filled with rage against God is filled with rage against the people of God. But we will think more charitably even of a damned sinner, and suppose he intended here to shew respect to Lazarus, as one whom he would now gladly be beholden to; he names him, because he knows him, and thinks Lazarus will not be unwilling to do him this good office for old acquaintance sake. Grotius here quotes Plato, describing the torments of wicked souls; and, among other things, he saith they are continually raving on those whom they have murdered, or been any way injurious to, calling upon them to forgive them the wrongs they did them. Note, There is a day coming when those who now hate and despise the people of God would gladly receive kindness from them.

2. The reply which Abraham gave to this request. In general, he did not grant it; he would not allow him one drop of water to cool his tongue. Note, The damned in hell shall not have any the least abatement or mitigation of their torment. If we now improve the day of our opportunities, we may have a full and lasting satisfaction in the streams of mercy; but if we now slight the offer, it will be vain in hell to expect the least drop of mercy. See how justly this rich man is paid in his own coin. He that denied a crumb is denied a drop. Now it is said to us, "Ask, and it shall be given you;" but if we let slip this accepted time, we may ask and it shall not be given us. But this is not all; had Abraham only said, 'You shall have nothing to abate your torment,' it had been sad; but he saith a great deal which would add to his torment, and make the flame the hotter, for every thing in hell will be tormenting.

1st. He calls him son, a kind and civil title, but here serves only to aggravate the denial of his request, which shut up the bowels of the compassion of a father from him. He had been a son, but a rebellious one, and now an abandoned, disinherited one. See the folly of those who rely on that plea, "we have Abraham to our father," when we find one in hell, and likely to be there for ever whom Abraham calls son.

2nd. He puts him in mind of what had been both his own condition and the condition of Lazarus in their lifetime: "Son, remember." This is a cutting word. The memories of damned souls will be their tormentors, and conscience will then be awakened and stirred up to do its office, which here they would not suffer it to do. Nothing will bring more oil to the flames of hell than "son, remember." Now sinners are called upon to remember; but they do not, they will not, they find ways to avoid it: 'Son, remember thy Creator, thy Redeemer; remember thy latter end;' but they turn a deaf ear to these mementos, and forget that for which they have their memories; justly therefore will their everlasting misery arise from a "son, remember," which they will not be able to turn a deaf ear to. What a dreadful peal will this ring in our ears, 'Son, remember the many warnings that were given thee not to come to this place of torment, which thou wouldst not regard; remember the fair offers made thee of eternal life and glory, which thou wouldst not accept?' But that which he is here put in mind of is,

First. That "thou in thy lifetime receivest thy good things." He doth not tell him he had abused them, but he had received them. 'Remember what a bountiful benefactor God has been to thee, how ready he was to do thee good; thou canst not therefore say he owes thee any thing, no, not a drop of water. What he gave thee thou receivest, and that was all; thou never gavest him a receipt for them, in a thankful acknowledgment of them, much less didst thou ever make any grateful return for them, or improvement of them; thou hast been the grave of God's blessings, in which they were buried, not the field of them, in which they were sown. "Thou receivest thy good things;" that is, thou receivest them, and usdest them, as if they had been thine own, and thou hadst not been at all accountable for them; or rather, they were the things which thou didst choose for thy good things, which were in thine eye the best things, which thou didst content thyself with, and portion thyself in: thou hadst meat and refreshment hereafter. By a common figure, heaven was spoken of as a banquet-house, over which Abraham in a manner presided with other patriarchs. The whole parable may be compared with Matt. viii. 11, 12. The imagery here employed can scarcely be viewed as representing more than the current opinions of the Jews in the time of Christ.

xvi. 23. "In hell" is literally "in hades," which word denotes the separate state, irrespective of the condition of its inhabitants.

Elazar. The rich man is sometimes called "Dives," which is only the Latin word for "rich." No name is given him. "Purple" was a colour chiefly confined to royal, noble, and wealthy persons. Tyre was famous for its production. "Fine linen" was very generally obtained from Egypt.

xvi. 20, 22. The word for "beggar" in these two verses simply signifies "poor," or a "poor man," and should have been so translated. The phrase "into Abraham's bosom" means the place of rest and drink, and clothes of the richest and finest, and those were the things thou didst place thine happiness in; they were thy reward, thy consolation, the penny thou didst agree for, and thou hast had it. Thou wast for the good things of thy lifetime, and hadst no thoughts of better things in another life, and therefore hast no reason to expect them. The day of thy good things is past and gone, and now is the day of thine evil things—of recompence for all thine evil deeds. Thou hast already had the last drop of the vials of mercy that thou couldst expect to fall to thy share, and there remains nothing but vials of wrath without mixture.

Secondly. Remember, too, what evil things Lazarus received. Thou enviest him his happiness here, but think what a large share of miseries he had in his lifetime. Thou hadst as much good as could be thought to fall to the lot of so ill a man, and he as much evil as could be thought to fall to the lot of so good a man. He received his evil things, that is, he bore them patiently; received them from the hand of God, as Job ii. 10, "Shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord, and shall we not receive evil also?" He received them as physic appointed for the cure of his spiritual distempers, and the cure was effected. As wicked people have good things only in this life, and at death they are for ever separated from all good; so godly people have evil things only in this life, and at death they are for ever put out of the reach of them. Now Abraham, by putting him in mind of both these together, awaking his conscience to mind him how he had carried it towards Lazarus when he was revelling in his good things, and Lazarus groaning under his evil things: he cannot forget that then he would not help Lazarus, and then how could he expect that Lazarus should now help him? Had Lazarus in his lifetime afterwards grown rich, and he poor, Lazarus would have thought it his duty to relieve him, and not to have upbraided him with his former unkindness: but in the future state of recompence and retribution, those that are now dealt with, both by God and man, better than they deserve, must expect to be rewarded "every man according to his works."

3rd. He puts him in mind of Lazarus' present bliss, and his own misery. "But now" the tables are turned, and so they must abide for ever; now "he is comforted, and thou art tormented." He did not need to be told that he was tormented, he felt it to his cost; he knew likewise that one that lay in the bosom of Abraham could not but be comforted there; yet Abraham puts him in mind of it, that he might, by comparing one thing with another, observe the righteousness of God, in recompensing tribulation to them who trouble his people, and to those who are troubled, rest, 2 Thes. i. 6, 7. Observe, First. Heaven is comfort, and hell is torment: heaven is joy, hell is weeping and wailing, and pain in perfection. Secondly. The soul, as soon as it leaves the body, goes either to heaven or hell, to comfort or torment immediately, and doth not sleep or go into purgatory. Thirdly. Herein will be heaven indeed to those that go thither through many and great calamities in this world; those that had grace, but little of the comfort of it here; perhaps their souls refused to be comforted; yet, when they are fallen asleep in Christ, you may truly say, Now they are comforted; now all their tears are wiped away, and all their fears are vanished. In heaven there is everlasting consolation. And, on the other hand, hell will be hell indeed to those that go thither from the midst of the enjoyment of all the delights and pleasures of sense; to them the torture is the greater, as temporal calamities are described to be to the "tender and delicate woman that would not set so much as the sole of her foot to the ground for tenderness and delicacy," Deu. xxviii. 56.

4th. He assures him it was to no purpose to think of having any relief by the ministry of Lazarus; for, ver. 26, "beside all this," worse yet, "between us and you there is a great gulf fixed," an impassable one, a great chasm, that so there can be no communication between glorified saints and damned sinners. First. The kindest saint in heaven cannot make a visit to the congregation of the dead and damned, to comfort or relieve any there, that, when time was, were their friends; "they that would pass from hence to you cannot;" they cannot leave beholding the face of their father, nor the work about his throne, to fetch water for you; that is no part of their business. Secondly. The most daring sinner in hell cannot force his way out of that prison, cannot get over that great gulf; "they cannot pass to us that would come from thence." It was not to be expected, for the door of mercy is shut, the bridge is drawn; there is no coming upon parole or bail, no, not for one hour. In this world, blessed be God, there is no gulf fixed between a state of nature and grace; but we may pass from the one to the other, from sin to God; but if we die in our sins, if we throw ourselves into the pit of destruction, there is no coming out. It is a pit in which there is no water, and out of which there is no redemption. The decree and counsel of God has fixed this gulf, which all the world cannot unfix. This abandons this miserable creature to despair; it is now too late for any change of his condition, or any the least relief; it might have been prevented in time, but it cannot now be remedied to eternity. The state of damned sinners is fixed by an irreversible and unalterable sentence. A stone is rolled to the door of the pit, which cannot be rolled back.

3. The farther request he had to make to his father Abraham; not for himself, his mouth is stopped, and he has not a word to say in answer to Abraham's denial of a drop of water. Damned sinners are made to know that the sentence they are under is just, and they cannot alleviate their own misery by making any objection against it. Since he cannot obtain a drop of water to cool his tongue, we may suppose he gnawed his tongue for pain, as those are said to do on whom one of the vials of God's wrath is poured out, Rev. xvi. 10; and hideous shrieks and outcries we may suppose to be now uttered by him; but since he has an opportunity of speaking to Abraham, he will improve it for his relations whom he had left behind, since he cannot improve it for his own advantage. Now as to this.

1st. He begs that Lazarus might be sent to his father's house, upon an errand thither; ver. 27, "I pray thee therefore, father." Again he calls Abraham father; and in this request he is importunate, "I pray thee;" "O deny me not this." When he was on earth he might have prayed and been heard, but now he prays in vain. Therefore, because thou hast denied me the former request, surely thou wilt be so compassionate as not to deny this. Or, therefore, because there is a great gulf fixed, seeing there is no getting out hence when they are once here, O send to prevent their coming hither. Or, though there is a great gulf fixed between you and me, yet since there is no such gulf fixed between you and them, send him thither; send him back to my father's house; he knows well enough where it is, has been there many a time by the same token that he was denied the crumbs that fell from the table. He knows I have five brethren there; if he appear to them they will know him, and will regard what he saith, for they knew him to be an honest man. Let him testify to them; let him tell them what condition I am in, and that I brought myself to it by my luxury and sensuality, and my unmercifulness to the poor. Let him warn them not to tread in my steps, nor to go on in the way wherein I led them, and left them, "lest they also come into this place of torment," ver. 28. Some observe that he speaks of five brethren only; whence they infer that he had no children, else he would have mentioned them; and then it was an aggravation of his uncharitableness, that he had no children to provide for. Now he would have them stopped in their sinful course. He doth not say, Give me leave to go to them, that I may testify to them, for he knew that there was a gulf fixed, and despaired of a permission so favourable to himself: his going would frighten them out of their wits; but send Lazarus, whose address will be less terrible, and yet his testimony sufficient to frighten them out of their sins.

Now he desired the preventing of their ruin, partly in tenderness to them, for whom he could not but retain a natural affection; he knew their temper, their temptations, their ignorance, their infidelity, their inconsideration, and wished to prevent the destruction they were running into. Partly in tenderness to himself, for their coming to him to that place of torment would but aggravate the misery to him, who had helped to shew them the way thither, as the sight of Lazarus helped to aggravate his misery. When partners in sin come to be sharers in woe, as tares bound in bundles for the fire, they will be a terror to one another.

2nd. Abraham denies him this favour too. There is no request granted in hell. Those who make the rich man's praying to Abraham a justification of their praying to saints departed, as they are far to seek for proofs, when the practice of a damned sinner must be valued for an example, so they have little encouragement to follow the example, when all his prayers are made in vain. Abraham leaves them to the testimony of Moses and the prophets, the ordinary means of conviction and conversion; they have the written Word, which they may read, and hear read; let them attend to that sure Word of prophecy, for God will not go out of the common method of his grace for them. Here is their privilege, "they have Moses and the prophets;" and their duty, "let them hear them," and mix faith with them, and that will be sufficient to keep them from this place of torment. By this it appears that there is sufficient evidence in the Old Testament, in Moses and the prophets, to convince those that will hear them impartially that there is another life after this, and a state of rewards and punishments for good and bad men, for that was the thing which the rich man would have his brethren assured of, and for that they are turned over to Moses and the prophets.

3rd. He urgeth his request yet farther, ver. 30, "Nay, father Abraham;" Give me leave to press this. It is true, they have Moses and the prophets, and if they would but give a due regard to them, it would be sufficient; but they do not, they will not; yet it may be hoped "if one went to them from the dead, they would repent;" that would be a more sensible conviction to them. They are used to Moses and the prophets, and therefore regard them the less, but this would be a new thing, and more startling; surely that would bring them to repent, and to change their wicked habit and course of life. Note, Foolish men are apt to think any method of conviction better than that which God has chosen and appointed.

4th. Abraham insists upon the denial of it, with a conclusive reason, ver. 31, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets," and will not believe the testimony, nor take the warning they give, "neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." If they regard not the public revelation which is confirmed by miracles, neither would they be wrought upon by a private testimony to themselves. First. The matter was long since settled upon trial, that God should speak by Moses, and such prophets, and not by immediate messengers from heaven. Israel chose it, in mount Sinai, because they could not bear the terrors of such expresses. Secondly. A messenger from the dead could say no more than what is said in the Scriptures, nor say it with more authority. Thirdly. There would be every jot as much reason to suspect that to be a cheat and a delusion, as to suspect the Scriptures to be so, and much more; and infidels in one case would certainly be so in another. Fourthly. The same strength of corruption that breaks through the convictions of the written Word, would certainly triumph over those by a witness from the dead; and though a sinner might be frightened at first by such a testimony, when the fright was over, he would soon return to his hardness. Fifthly. The Scripture is now the ordinary way of God's making known his mind to us, and it is sufficient, and it is presumption for us to prescribe any other way, nor have we any ground to expect or pray for the grace of God to work upon us in any other way, abstracted from that, and when that is rejected and set aside. This that our Saviour here said was soon after verified in the unbelieving Jews, who would not hear Moses and the prophets, Christ and the apostles, and then would not be persuaded though Lazarus "rose from the dead;" (and perhaps it was with some eye to him that Christ named this poor man Lazarus;) nay, they consulted to put him to death, and did put him that raised him to death, and would not be persuaded by Him neither, though he also rose from the dead. When Eutychus was raised to life, the people that were present continued to hear Paul preach, but did not turn to inquire of him, Acts xx. 10, 11. Let us not therefore desire visions and apparitions, nor seek to the dead, but "to the law and to the testimony," Isa. viii. 19, 20, for that is "the more sure word of prophecy," which we may depend upon.

CHAPTER XVII.

In this chapter we have, I. Some particular discourses Christ had with his disciples, in which he teaches them to take heed of giving offence, and to forgive the injuries done them, ver. 1-4: encourageth them to pray for the increase of their faith, ver. 5, 6; and then teacheth them humility, whatever service they had done for God, ver. 7-10. II. His cleansing of ten lepers, and the thanks he had from one of them only, and a Samaritan, ver. 11-19. III. His discourse with his disciples upon occasion of an inquiry of the Pharisees, when the kingdom of God should appear, ver. 20-37.

HEN said he unto his disciples, It is impossible but that offences will come: but woe unto him, through whom they come! 2 It were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he cast into the sea, than that he should offend one of these little ones. 3

Take heed to yourselves: If thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him. 4 And if he trespass against thee seven times

Among the Jews, sheol or hades included Paradise as well as Gehenna; just as the Greeks hades included Elysium and Tartarus.

xvi. 31. This verse is the application of a large part of the previous parable: They who disobey a divine revelation, and especially such as do not question its divinity, are not likely to be turned away from a course of worldly indifference by a messenger from eternity. The notions of a future state advocated by Swedenborg, and promulgated by modern spiritualists, are quite inconsistent with this parable in many important respects. This subject is one, however, which cannot here be gone into, though we must refer to it.

xvii. 6. It is well known that the mustard-seed was employed in the East as the emblem of something very small. Our Lord uses it not only for this purpose, but to illustrate the great effects which may result from apparently minute causes. On the sycamine-tree Mr. Prescott says, "The sycamine, which is the regular mulberry, in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him. 5 And the apostles said unto the Lord, Increase our faith. 6 And the Lord said, If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye might say unto this sycamore tree, Be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea; and it should obey you. 7 But which of you, having a servant plowing or feeding cattle, will say unto him by and by, when he is come from the field, Go and sit down to meat? 8 And will not rather say unto him, Make ready wherewith I may sup, and gird thyself, and serve me, till I have eaten and drunken; and afterward thou shalt eat and drink? 9 Doth he thank that servant because he did the things that were commanded him? I trow not. 10 So likewise ye, when ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which was our duty to do.

We are here taught,

First. That giving offences is a great sin, and that which we should every one of us avoid, and carefully watch against; ver. 1, 2, we can expect no other but that offences will come, considering the perverseness and frowardness that is in the nature of man, and the wise purpose and counsel of God, which will carry on his work even by those offences, and bring good out of evil. "It is," almost "impossible but that offences will come," and therefore we are concerned to provide accordingly; "but woe to him through whom they come;" his doom will be heavy, ver. 2, more terrible than that of the worst of the malefactors, who are condemned to be thrown into the sea, for they perish under a load of guilt more ponderous than that of millstones.

This speaks a woe, 1. To persecutors, that offer any injury to the least of Christ's little ones, in word or deed, by which they are discouraged in serving Christ, and doing their duty, or in danger of being driven off from it. 2. To seducers, that corrupt the truths of Christ and his ordinances, and so trouble the minds of the disciples, for they are those by whom offences come. 3. To those that under the profession of the Christian name live scandalously, and thereby weaken the hands, and sadden the hearts, of God's people, for by them the offence comes; and it is no abatement of their guilt, nor will be any of their punishment, that it is impossible but offences will come.

Secondly. That forgiving offences is a great duty, and that which we should every one of us make conscience of; ver. 3, "Take heed to yourselves." This may refer either to what goes before, or to what follows; "take heed that ye offend not one of these little ones." Ministers must be very careful not to say or do any thing that may be a discouragement to weak Christians; there is need of great caution, and they ought to speak and act very considerably for fear of this; or, when your brother trespasseth against you, doth you any injury, puts any slight or affront upon you, if he be accessory to any damage done you in your property or reputation, take heed to yourselves at such a time, lest you be put into a passion—lest when your spirits are provoked, you speak unadvisedly, and rashly vow revenge, Pr. xxiv. 29, "I will do so to him as he hath done to me." Take heed what you say at such a time, lest you say amiss.

1. If you are permitted to rebuke him, you are advised to do so; smother not the resentment, but give it vent; tell him his faults, shew him wherein he has not done well, nor fairly by you, and it may be you will perceive (and you must be very willing to perceive it) that you mistook him; that it was not a trespass against you, or not designed, but an oversight; and then you will beg his pardon for misunderstanding him, as Jos. xxii. 30, 31.

2. You are commanded, upon his repentance, to forgive him, and to be perfectly reconciled to him: "If he repent, forgive him;" forget the injury, never think of it again, much less upbraid him with it. Though he do not repent, you must not therefore bear malice to him, or meditate revenge; but if he do not at least say he repents, you are not bound to be so free and familiar with him as you have been. If he be guilty of gross sin, to the offence of the Christian community he is a member of, let him be gravely and mildly reproved for his sin, and upon his repentance received into friendship and communion again. This the apostle calls forgiveness, 2 Cor. ii. 7.

3. You are to repeat this every time he repeats his trespass, ver. 4; if he could be supposed to be either so negligent or so impudent as to "trespass against thee seven times in a day," and as often professes himself sorry for his fault, and promiseth not again to offend in like manner, continue to forgive him: humanum est errare,—"to err is human." Note, Christians should be of a forgiving spirit, willing to make the best of every body, and all about them easy; forward to extenuate faults, and not to aggravate them, and should contrive as much to shew that they have forgiven an injury, as others to shew that they resent it.

Thirdly. That we have all need to get our faith strengthened, because as that grace grows, all other graces grow. The more firmly we believe the doctrine of Christ, and the more confidently we rely upon the grace of Christ, the better it will be with us every way. Now observe here,

1. The address which the disciples made to Christ for the strengthening of their faith, ver. 5. The apostles themselves, so they are here called, though they were prime ministers of state in Christ's kingdom, yet acknowledged the weakness and deficiency of their faith, and saw the need of Christ's grace for the improvement of it; they "said unto the Lord, Increase our faith," and perfect what is lacking in it. Let the discoveries of faith be more clear, the desires of faith more strong, the dependencies of faith more firm and fixed, the dedications of faith more entire and resolute, and the delights of faith more pleasing. Note, The increase of our faith is what we should earnestly desire, and offer up that desire to God in prayer. Some think they put up this prayer to Christ upon occasion of his pressing upon them the duty of forgiving injuries;

"Lord, Increase our faith," or we shall never be able to practise such a difficult duty as this. Faith in God's pardoning mercy will enable us to get over the greatest difficulties that lie in the way of our forgiving our brother. Others think it was upon some other occasion, when the apostles were run aground in working some miracle, and were reproved by Christ for the weakness of their faith, as Mat. xvii. 16. To him that blamed them they must apply themselves for grace to mend them; to him they cry, "Lord, Increase our faith."

2. The assurance Christ gave them of the wonderful efficacy of true faith; ver. 6, "If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed," so small as mustard seed,—but yours is yet less than the least,—or so sharp as mustard seed, so pungent, so exciting to all other graces, as mustard to the animal spirits, and therefore used in palsies, you might do wonders much beyond what you now do; nothing would be too hard for you, that were fit to be done for the glory of God and the confirmation of the doctrine you preach; yea, though it were the transplanting of a tree from the earth to the sea; see Mat. xvii. 20. As with God nothing is impossible, so are all things possible to him that can believe.

Fourthly. That whatever we do in the service of Christ, we must be very humble, and not imagine that we can merit any favour at his hand, or claim it as a debt; even the apostles themselves, who did so much more for Christ than others, must not think they had thereby made him their debtor.

1. We are all God's servants, his apostles and his ministers, are in a special manner so, and, as servants, are bound to do all we can for his honour; our whole strength and our whole time are to be employed for him; for we are not our own, not at our own dispose, but at our Master's.

2. As God's servants, it becomes us to fill up our time with duty; and we have a variety of work appointed us to do; we ought to make the end of one service the beginning of another. The servant that has been ploughing, or feeding cattle in the field, when he comes home at night has work to do still, he must wait at table, ver. 7, 8. When we have been employed in the duties of a religious conversation, that will not excuse us from the exercises of devotion; when we have been working for God, still we must be waiting on God, waiting on him continually.

3. Our principal care here must be to do the duty of our religion; and leave it to our Master to give us the comfort of it, when and how he thinks fit. No servant expects that his Master should say to him, "Go and sit down to meat," it is time enough to do that when we have done our day's work. Let us be in care to finish our work, and to do that well, and then the reward will come in due time.

4. It is fit Christ should be first served before us: "Make ready wherewith I may sup, and afterwards they shall eat and drink." Doubting Christians say they cannot give to Christ the glory of his love as they should, because they have not yet obtained the comfort of it: but this is wrong; first let Christ have the glory of it, let us attend him with our praises, and then we shall eat and drink in the comfort of that love, and in that there is a feast.

5. Christ's servants, when they are to wait upon him, must gird themselves, must free themselves from every thing that is entangling and encumbering, and fit themselves with a close application of mind to go on and go through with their work, must gird up the loins of their mind. When we have prepared for Christ's entertainment, have made ready wherewith he may sup, we must then gird ourselves to attend him. This is expected from servants, and Christ might require it from us, but he doth not insist upon it. He was among his disciples as one that served; and came not as other masters, to take state, and to be ministered unto, but to minister; witness his washing his disciples' feet.

6. Christ's servants do not so much as merit his thanks for any service they do him: "Doth he thank that servant?" Doth he reckon himself indebted to him for it? No, by no means. No good works of ours can merit any thing at the hand of God. We expect God's favour, not because we have by our services made him a debtor to us, but because he has by his promises made himself a debtor to his own honour, and that we may plead with him, but cannot sue for a quantum meruit—"according to merit."

7. Whatever we do for Christ, though it should be more perhaps than some others do, yet it is no more than is our duty to do; though we should do all things that are commanded us,—and, alas! in many things we come short of that,—yet there is no work of supererogation; it is but what we are bound to by that first and great commandment of loving God with all our heart and soul, which includes the utmost.

8. The best servants of Christ, even when they do the best services, must humbly acknowledge that they are unprofitable servants, though they are not those unprofitable servants that bury their talent, and shall be cast into utter darkness; yet, as to Christ, and any advantage that can accrue to him by their services, they are unprofitable; our goodness extendeth not unto God, neither if we are righteous is he the better, Ps. xvi. 2; Job xxii. 2; xxxv. 7. God cannot be a gainer by our services, and therefore cannot be made a debtor by them. He has no need of us, nor can our services make any addition to his perfections; it becomes us therefore to call ourselves unprofitable servants, but to call his service a profitable service; for God is happy without us, but we are undone without him.

11 And it came to pass, as he went to Jerusalem,

COUNTRY NEAR SAMARIA.

that he passed through the midst of Samaria and and by no means, as has been asserted, uncommon in Palestine, is only mentioned here in the New Testament; but there seems to be a confusion with the sycamore in the Septuagint version of the Old Testament. The Egyptian fig, or fig-mulberry (sycamore), so called from the form of its leaves, bears fruit of much value as a food for the poor, and its wood was used in Egypt for mummy-cases. Its great size and strong roots were not at all necessary to give point to our Saviour's words here, although they have led commentators into error." Our sycamore is quite a different tree, and is not meant in the Gospels, where the word sometimes stands for sycamore.

xvii. 11. This verse is remarkable on several accounts. It says that as our Lord went to Jerusalem, "he passed through the midst of Samaria and Galilee." The direct route from the north to Jerusalem lay through Galilee and Samaria. If this was the course followed, why is Samaria put first? A reference to other places, as Matt. xix. 1, Mark x. 1, will show that Jesus went to Jerusalem by Galilee. 12 And as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten men that were lepers, which stood afar off: 13 And they lifted up their voices, and said, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us. 14 And when he saw them, he said unto them, Go shew yourselves unto the priests. And it came to pass, that, as they went, they were cleansed. 15 And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God, 16 And fell down on his face at his feet, giving him thanks: and he was a Samaritan. 17 And Jesus answering said, Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine? 18 There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger. 19 And he said unto him, Arise, go thy way: thy faith hath made thee whole.

We have here an account of the cure of ten lepers, which we had not in any other of the evangelists. The leprosy was a disease which the Jews supposed to be inflicted for the punishment of some particular sin, and to be, more than other diseases, a mark of God's displeasure; and therefore Christ, who came to take away sin, and turn away wrath, took particular care to cleanse the lepers that fell in his way. Christ was now in his way to Jerusalem, about the mid-way, where he had least acquaintance, in comparison with what he had either at Jerusalem or in Galilee; he was now in the frontier country, the marches that lay between Samaria and Galilee; he went that road to find out these lepers, and to cure them, for he is found of them that sought him not. Observe,

First. The address of these lepers to Christ; they were ten in a gang. For though they were shut out from society with others, yet those that were infected were at liberty to converse with one another, which would be some comfort to them, as giving them an opportunity to compare notes, and to condole with one another. Now observe,

1. They met Christ "as he entered into a certain village:" they did not stay till he had refreshed himself for some time after the fatigue of his journey, but met him as he entered the town, weary as he was, and yet he did not put them off, or adjourn their cause. They stood afar off, knowing that by the law their disease obliged them to keep their distance. Sense of our spiritual leprosy should make us very humble in all our approaches to Christ: We are we, that we should draw near to him that is infinitely pure? Who are impure.

2. Their request was unanimous and very importunate; ver. 13, "they lifted up their voices," being at a distance, and cried, "Jesus, Master, have mercy on us." Those that expect help from Christ, must take him for their Master, and be at his command. If he be Master, he will be Jesus, a Saviour, and not otherwise. They ask not in particular to be cured of their leprosy, but "have mercy on us;" and it is enough to refer ourselves to the compassions of Christ, for they fail not. They had heard the fame of this Jesus, though he had not been much conversant in that country, and that was such as encouraged them to make application to him; and if but one of them began in so cheap and easy an address, they would all join.

3. Christ sent them to the priests, to be inspected by him, who was the judge of the leprosy. He did not tell them positively they should be cured, but bade them go shew themselves to the priests, ver. 14. This was a trial of their obedience; and, it was fit it should be so tried, as Naaman's in a like case, "Go wash in Jordan." Note. Those that expect Christ's favours, must take them in his way and method. Some of these lepers perhaps would be ready to quarrel with the prescription, Let him either cure or say he will not, and not send us to the priests on a fool's errand, but, overruled by the rest, they all went to the priest. While the ceremonial law was yet in force, Christ took care it should be observed, and the reputation of it kept up, and due honour paid to the priests in things pertaining to their function; but probably he had here a farther design, which was to have the priest's judgment of, and testimony to the perfectness of the cure, and that the priest might be awakened, and others by him, to inquire after one that had such a commanding power over bodily diseases.

4. "As they went, they were cleansed;" and so became fit to be looked upon by the priest, and to have a certificate from him that they were clean. Observe, Then we may expect God to meet us with mercy, when we are found in the way of duty. If we do what we can, God will not be wanting to do that for us which we cannot. Go, attend upon instituted ordinances, go and pray, and read the Scriptures; "Go, shew thyself to the priest," go and open thy case to a faithful minister, and though the means will not heal thee of thyself, God will heal thee, in the diligent use of those means.

5. "One of them," and but one, returned to give thanks; ver. 15, "when he saw that he was healed," instead of going forward to the priest, to be by him declared clean, and so discharged from his confinement, which was all that the rest aimed at, he turned back towards him that was the author of his cure, who he is desirous should have the glory of it, before he received the benefit of it. He appears to have been very hearty and affectionate in his thanksgiving, "with a loud voice he glorified God;" acknowledging it to come originally from him; and he lifted up his voice in his praises, as he had done in his prayers, ver. 13. Those that have received mercy from God should publish it to others; that they may praise God too, and may be encouraged by our experiences to trust in him. But he also made a particular address of thanks to Christ, ver. 16, "he fell down at his feet," put himself into the most humble, reverent posture he could, and gave him thanks. Note. We ought to give thanks for the favours Christ bestows upon us; and particularly for recoveries from sickness; and we ought to be speedy in our returns of praise, and not to defer them, lest time wear out the sense of the mercy. And it becomes us to be very humble in our thanksgivings, as well as in our prayers. It becomes the seed of Jacob, like him, to own themselves less than the least of all God's mercies, when they have received them, as well as when they are in pursuit of them.

6. Christ took notice of this one that had thus distinguished himself, for it seems he was a Samaritan, whereas the rest were Jews, ver. 16. The Samaritans were separatists from the Jewish church, and had not that pure knowledge and worship of God among them that the Jews had; and yet it was one of them that glorified God, when the Jews forgot, or, when it was moved to them, refused to do it. Now observe here,

1st. The particular notice Christ took of him; of the grateful return he made, and the ingratitude of those that were sharers with him in the mercy—that he, who was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, was the only one that returned to give glory to God, ver. 17, 18. See here, First. How rich Christ is in doing good: "Were there not ten cleansed?" Here was a cure by wholesale, a whole hospital healed with one word's speaking. Note. There is an abundance of healing, cleansing virtue in the blood of Christ, sufficient for all his patients, though never so many. Here is ten at a time cleansed; we shall have never the less grace for others' sharing. Secondly. How poor we are in our returns: "Where are the nine?" why did they not return to give thanks? This intimates that ingratitude is a very common sin. Of the many that receive mercy from God, there are but few, very few, that return to give thanks in a right manner; scarce one in ten, who render according to the benefit done unto them. Thirdly. How those often prove most grateful from whom it was least expected; a Samaritan gives thanks, and a Jew doth not. Thus many who profess revealed religion are outdone and quite shamed by some that are governed only by natural religion, not only in moral virtue, but in piety and devotion. This serves here to aggravate the ingratitude of those Jews of whom Christ speaks, as taking it very ill that his kindness was so slighted; and it intimates how justly he resents the ingratitude of the world of mankind, for whom he had done so much, and from whom he has received so little.

2nd. The great encouragement Christ gave him, ver. 19. The rest had their cure, and had it not revoked, as justly it might have been for their ingratitude, though they had such a good example of gratitude set before them; but he had his cure confirmed particularly with an encomium, "Thy faith hath made thee whole." The rest were made whole by the power of Christ, in compassion to their distress, and in answer to their prayer; but he was made whole by his faith, which Christ saw him differentiated by from the rest. Note. Temporal mercies are then doubled and sweetened to us when they are fetched in by the prayers of faith, and returned by the praises of faith.

20 And when he was demanded of the Pharisees, when the kingdom of God should come, he answered them and said, The kingdom of God cometh not with observation: 21 Neither shall they say, Lo here! or, lo there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you. 22 And he said unto the disciples, The days will come, when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, and ye shall not see it. 23 And they shall say to you, See here; or, see there: go not after them, nor follow them. 24 For as the lightning, that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven, shineth unto the other part under heaven; so shall also the Son of man be in his day. 25 But first must he suffer many things, and be rejected of this generation. 26 And as it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man. 27 They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and the flood came, and destroyed them all. 28 Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; 29 But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. 30 Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed. 31 In that day, he which shall be upon the housetop, and his stuff in the house, let him not come down to take it away: and he that is in the field, let him likewise not return back. 32 Remember Lot's wife. 33 Whosoever shall seek to save his life shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose his life shall preserve it. 34 I tell you, in that night there shall be two men in one bed; the one shall be taken, and the other shall be left. 35 Two women shall be grinding together; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 36 Two men shall be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. 37 And they answered and said unto him, the road east of the Jordan, and not southward through Samaria. At first all seems confused and discrepant, but the explanation is easy. Jesus went first northwards, by way of Samaria, into Galilee; then turning eastward, he crossed the Jordan and came to Jerusalem by the course described by Matthew and Mark, who on this theory mention a later stage of the journey or circuit here introduced by Luke. That this theory is the right one seems proved by the incidental mention of Jericho in chap. xviii. 35, xix. 1.

xvii. 14. Romish divines, and all who draw from this and like passages a plea for auricular confession as needful to pardon, strangely err. They say leprosy means sin, and going to the priest means confession; but these men were healed by Christ before they went to the priests. And in the Mosaic system, it was the leper already cleansed who had to appear before the priests to perform the customary rites which commemorated the healing as already past.

Where, Lord? And he said unto them, Wheresoever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together.

We have here a discourse of Christ's concerning the kingdom of God, that is, the kingdom of the Messiah, which was now shortly to be set up, and of which there was great expectation.

1. Here is, The demand of the Pharisees concerning it, which occasioned this discourse; they asked "when the kingdom of God should come." Forming a notion of it as a temporal kingdom, which should advance the Jewish nation above the nations of the earth, they were impatient to hear some tidings of its approach; they understood perhaps that Christ had taught his disciples to pray for the coming of it, and they had long preached that it was at hand. Now say the Pharisees, when will that glorious view open? when shall we see this long-looked-for kingdom?

2. Christ's reply to that demand, directed to the Pharisees first, and afterwards to his own disciples, who knew better how to understand it, ver. 22; what he said to both, he saith to us.

First. That the kingdom of the Messiah was to be a spiritual kingdom, and not temporal and external. They asked when it would come; You know not what you ask, saith Christ; it may come, and you not be aware of it: for it has not an external show, as other kingdoms have, the advancements and revolutions of which are taken notice of by the nations of the earth, and fill the newspapers; so they expected this kingdom of God would do. No, saith Christ,

1. It will have a silent entrance; without pomp, without noise; it "cometh not with observation;" μετὰ παύτης φωνῆς, "with outward show." They desired to have their curiosity satisfied concerning the time of it, to which Christ doth not give them any answer, but will have their mistakes rectified concerning the nature of it. "It is not for you to know the times" of this kingdom, those are secret things which belong not to you; but the great intentions of this kingdom, those are things revealed. When Messiah the Prince comes to set up his kingdom, they shall not say, "Lo here, or lo there;" as when a prince goes in progress to visit his territories, it is in everybody's mouth, he is here, or he is there; for where the king is there is the court. Christ will not come with all that talk; it will not be set up in this or that particular place; nor will the court of that kingdom be here or there. Nor will it be here or there, what country men are of, or where they dwell, as if that would place them nearer to, or farther from, that kingdom. Those who confine Christianity and the church to this place, or that party, cry, "Lo here, or lo there;" than which nothing is more contrary to the designs of catholic Christianity; so do they who make prosperity and external pomp a mark of the true church.

2. It has a spiritual influence; "the kingdom of God is within you." It is not of this world, Jno. xviii. 36; its glory doth not strike men's fancies, but affect their spirits; and its power is over their souls and consciences, and from them it receives homage, and not their bodies only. The kingdom of God will not change men's outward condition, but their hearts and lives; then it comes when it makes those humble, and serious, and heavenly, that were proud, vain, and carnal; when it weans those from the world that were wedded to the world; and therefore look for the kingdom of God in the revolutions of the heart, not of the civil government. "The kingdom of God is among you," so some read it; you inquire when it will come, and are not aware that it is already begun to be set up in the midst of you. The Gospel is preached, it is confirmed by miracles, it is embraced by multitudes, so that it is in your nation, though not in your hearts. Note, It is the folly of many curious inquirers concerning the times to come, that they look for that before them which is already among them.

Secondly. That the setting up of this kingdom was a work that would meet with a great deal of opposition and interruption, ver. 22. The disciples thought they should carry all before them, and expected a constant series of success in their work; but Christ tells them it would be otherwise; "the days will come," before you have finished your testimony, and done your work, "when you shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man," one such day as we now have, of the prosperity and progress of the Gospel, "and shall not see it." At first, indeed, you will have wonderful success; so they had, when thousands were added to the church in a day; but do not think it will be always so; no, you will be persecuted and scattered, silenced and imprisoned, so that you will not have opportunities of preaching the Gospel without fear, as you now have; people will grow cool to it when they have enjoyed it awhile, so that you will not see such harvests of souls gathered in to Christ afterwards, as at first; nor such multitudes flocking to him, as doves to their windows. This looks forward to his disciples in after ages; they must expect much disappointment; the Gospel will not be always preached with like liberty and success. Ministers and churches will sometimes be under outward restraints; teachers will be removed into corners, and solemn assemblies scattered; then they will wish to see such days of opportunity as they have formerly enjoyed, sabbath days, sacrament days, preaching days, praying days; those are days of the Son of man, in which we hear from him, and converse with him; the time may come when we may in vain wish for such days. God teacheth us to know the worth of such mercies by the want of them; it concerns us, while they are continued, to improve them, and in the years of plenty to lay up in store for the years of famine. Sometimes they will be under inward restraints, will not have such tokens of the presence of the Son of man with them, as they have sometimes had; the Spirit is withdrawn from them, they see not their signs, the angel comes not down to stir the waters, there is a great stupidity among the children of men, and a great lukewarmness among the children of God; then we would wish to see such victorious, triumphant days of the Son of man as we have sometimes seen, when he has ridden forth with his bow and his crown, conquering and to conquer, but we cannot see them. Note, We must not think that Christ's church and cause are lost, because not always alike visible and prevailing.

Thirdly. That Christ and his kingdom are not to be looked for in this or that particular place, but his appearance will be general, in all places at once, ver. 23, 24. "They will say to you, See here, or see there;" here is one that will deliver the Jews out of the hands of the oppressing Romans, or there is one that will deliver the Christians out of the hands of the oppressing Jews; here is the Messiah, and there is his prophet; here, in this mountain, or there, at Jerusalem, you will find the true church. "Go not after them, or follow them;" do not heed such suggestions; the kingdom of God was not designed to be the glory of one people only, but to give light to the Gentiles; "for as the lightning that lightens out of one part under heaven, shines," all on a sudden, irresistibly, "to the other part under heaven; so shall also the Son of man be in his day."

1. The judgments that are to destroy the Jewish nation, to lay them waste, and to deliver the Christians from them, shall fly like lightning through the land, shall lay all waste from one end of it to another; and those that are marked for this destruction can no more avoid it or oppose it than they can a flash of lightning.

xvii. 18. It has been noted, with reference to the Samaritan mentioned in this narrative, "The Samaritans were Gentiles; not a mixed race, as is sometimes erroneously supposed. They had a mixed religion, but were themselves originally from other countries (see 2 Kings xvii. 24-41). There may have been a reason for the nine Jews not returning—that they held the ceremonial duty imposed on them to be paramount, which the Samaritans might not rate so highly;" so Alford. The Samaritan went back to Christ before he

2. The Gospel, that is to set up Christ's kingdom in the world, shall fly like lightning through the nations; the kingdom of the Messiah is not to be a local thing, but is to be dispersed far and wide over the face of the whole earth; it shall shine from Jerusalem to all parts about, and that in a moment; the kingdoms of the earth shall be leavened by the Gospel ere they are aware of it. The trophies of Christ's victories shall be erected on the ruins of the devil's kingdom, even in those countries that could never be subdued to the Roman yoke. The design of the setting up Christ's kingdom was not to make one nation great, but to make all nations good, some at least of all nations; and this point shall be gained, though the nations rage, and the kings of the earth set themselves with all their might against it.

Fourthly. That the Messiah must suffer before he must reign, ver. 25: "first must he suffer many things," many hard things, "and be rejected of this generation;" and if he be thus treated, his disciples must expect no other but to suffer and be rejected too, for his sake. They thought of having the kingdom of the Messiah set up in external splendour: No, saith Christ, we must go by the cross to the crown. The Son of man must suffer many things; pain, and shame, and death, are those many things; he must be rejected by this generation of unbelieving Jews, before he be embraced by another generation of believing Gentiles; that his Gospel might have the honour of triumphing over the greatest opposition from those who ought to have given it the greatest assistance; and thus the excellency of the power would appear to be of God, and not of man; for though Israel be not gathered, yet he will be glorious to the ends of the earth.

Fifthly. That the setting up the kingdom of the Messiah would introduce the destruction of the Jewish nation, whom it would find in a dead sleep of security, and drowned in sensuality, as the old world was in the days of Noah, and Sodom in the days of Lot, ver. 26, &c. Observe,

1. How it had been with sinners formerly, and what posture the judgments of God, which they had been fairly warned of, did at length find them in. Look as far back as the old world, when all flesh had corrupted their way, and the earth was filled with violence; come a little lower, and think how it was with the men of Sodom, who were wicked, and sinners before the Lord exceedingly. Now observe concerning both these, 1st. That they had fair warning given them of the ruin that was coming upon them for their sins. Noah was a preacher of righteousness to the old world, so was Lot to the Sodomites; they gave them timely notice what would be in the end of their wicked ways, and that it was not far off. 2nd. That they did not regard the warning given them, and gave no credit, no heed to it; they were very secure, went on in their business as unconcerned as you would imagine; "they did eat, they drank," indulged themselves in their pleasures, and took no care of any thing else but to make provision for the flesh; counted upon the perpetuity of their present flourishing state, and therefore married wives and were given in marriage, that their families might be built up; they were all very merry; so were the men of Sodom, and yet very busy too; "they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded." These were lawful things, but the fault was, they minded these inordinately, and their hearts were entirely set upon them, so that they had no heart at all to prepare against the threatened judgments; when they should have been, as the men of Nineveh, fasting and praying, repenting and reforming, upon warning given them of an approaching judgment, they were going on securely, eating flesh and drinking wine, when God called to weeping and to mourning, Isa. xxii. 12, 13. 3rd. That they continued in their security and sensuality till the threatened judgment came; until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and Lot went out of Sodom, nothing said or done to them served to alarm or awaken them. Note, The stupidity of sinners in a sinful way, though it is as strange as it is without excuse, yet we are not to think it strange, for it is not without example. It is the old way that wicked men have trodden, that have gone slumbering to hell, as if their damnation slumbered while they did. 4th. That God took care for the preservation of those that were his, who believed and feared and took the warning themselves which they gave to others. Noah entered into the ark, and there he was safe; Lot went out of Sodom, and so went out of harm's way. If some run on heedless and headlong into destruction, that shall be no prejudice to the salvation of them that believe. 5th. That they were surprised with the ruin which they would not fear, and were swallowed up in it, to their unspeakable horror and amazement. The flood came, and destroyed all the sinners of the old world; fire and brimstone came, and destroyed all the sinners of Sodom. God has many arrows in his quiver, and useth which he will in making war upon his rebellious subjects, for he can make which he will effectual. But that which is especially intended here is, to shew what a dreadful surprise destruction will be to those who are secure and sensual.

2. How it will be with sinners still, ver. 30: "Thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed;" when Christ comes to destroy the Jewish nation by the Roman armies, the generality of that nation will be found under such a reigning security and stupidity as this. They have warning given by Christ now, and will have it repeated to them by the apostles after him, as they had by Noah and Lot, but it will be all in vain. They will continue secure will go on in their neglect and opposition of Christ and his Gospel, till all the Christians are withdrawn from among them, and gone to the place of refuge—God will provide for them on the other side Jordan, and then a deluge of judgments shall flow in upon them, which shall destroy all the unbelieving Jews. One would have thought this discourse of our Saviour's, which was public, and not long after published to the world, should have awakened them; but it did not, for the hearts of that people were hardened to their destruction. And in like manner, when Jesus Christ shall come to judge the world at the end of time, sinners will be found in the same secure and careless posture, altogether regardless of the judgment approaching, which will therefore come upon them as a snare; and in like manner the sinners of every age go on securely in their evil ways, and remember not their latter end, nor the account that they must give: "Woe to them that are thus at ease in Zion."

Sixthly. That it ought to be the care of his disciples and followers to distinguish themselves from the unbelieving Jews in that day, and leaving them, their city and country, to themselves, to flee at the signal given, according to the direction that should be given; let them retire as Noah to his ark, and Lot to his Zoar. You "would have healed Jerusalem," as of old Babylon, "but she is not healed;" and therefore "forsake her, flee out of the midst of her, and deliver every man his soul," Jer. li. 6, 9.

1. This flight of theirs from Jerusalem must be expeditious, and must not be retarded by any concern about their worldly affairs, ver. 31: "He that shall be on the housetop," when the alarm is given, "let him not come down to take his stuff away," both because he cannot spare so much time, and because the carrying away of his effects will but encumber him and retard his flight. Let him not regard his stuff at such a time, when it will be next to a miracle of mercy if he have his life given him for a prey. Better leave his stuff behind him, than stay to look after it, and perish with them that believe not. It will be their concern to do as Lot and his family were charged to do, "escape for thy life." "Save yourselves from this untoward generation."

2. When they have made their escape, they must not think of returning ver. 32. "Remember Lot's wife," and take warning by her, not only to flee went on to the priest; the Jews went on to the priest, apparently more anxious to recover their social status than grateful for the gracious interposition of Christ on their behalf.

xvii. 20. The phrase, "and when he was demanded of the Pharisees," means "and when he was asked by the Pharisees."

xvii. 21. "The kingdom of God is within you," or, as some prefer, "among you," though on the whole we think the common rendering best. "The kingdom of God" is God's dominion, the government from this Sodom, for so Jerusalem is become, Isa. i. 10, but to persevere in your flight; and do not look back, as she did; be not loath to leave a place marked for destruction, whoever or whatever you leave behind you that is ever so dear to you. Those who have left the Sodom of a natural state, let them go forward, and not so much as look a kind look towards it again. Let them not look back, lest they should be tempted to go back; nay, lest that be construed a going back in heart, or an evidence that the heart was left behind. Lot's wife was turned into a pillar of salt, that she might remain a lasting monument of God's displeasure against apostates, that begin in the spirit, and end in the flesh.

3. There would be no other way of saving their lives but by quitting the Jews; and if they thought to save themselves by a coalition with them, they would find themselves mistaken, ver. 31: "Whosoever shall seek to save his life," by declining from his Christianity, and complying with the Jews, he "shall lose it," with them, and perish in the common calamity; but whosoever is willing to venture his life with the Christians, upon the same bottom on which they venture, to take his lot with them, in life and in death, he shall preserve his life, for he shall make sure of eternal life, and is in a likelier way at that time to save his life than those who embark in a Jewish bottom, or ensure upon their securities. Note, Those do best for themselves that trust God in the way of duty.

Seventhly. That all good Christians should certainly escape, but many of them very narrowly, from that destruction, ver. 34-36. When God's judgments are laying all waste, he will take an effectual course to preserve those that are his, by remarkable providences, distinguishing between them and others that were nearest to them: "Two in a bed; one taken, and the other left," one snatched out of the burning, and taken into a place of safety, while the other is left to perish in the common ruin. Note, Though the sword devours one as well as another, and all things seem to come alike to all, yet, sooner or later, it shall be made to appear that the Lord knows them that are his, and are not, and how to take out the precious from the vile. We are sure the Judge of all the earth will do right; and therefore when he sends a judgment on purpose to avenge the death of his Son upon those that crucified him, he will take care that none of those who glorified him, and gloried in his cross, shall be taken away by that judgment.

Lastly. That this distinguishing, dividing, discriminating work, shall be done in all places, as far as the kingdom of God shall extend, ver. 37. "Where, Lord?" They had inquired concerning the time, and he would not gratify their curiosity with any information concerning that; they therefore tried him with another question, "Where, Lord?"—where shall those be safe that are taken?—where shall those perish that are left? The answer is proverbial, and may be explained so as to answer each side of the question, "Whosoever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together."

1. Wherever the wicked are, that are marked for perdition, they shall be found out by the judgments of God; as wherever a dead carcase is, the birds of prey will smell it out, and make a prey of it. The Jews having made themselves a dead and putrefied carcase, odious to God's holiness, and obnoxious to his justice, wherever any of that unbelieving generation is, the judgments of God shall fasten upon them, as the eagles do upon the prey, "thine hand shall find out all thine enemies," Ps. cxi. 9, "though they set their nests among the stars," Obad. 4. The Roman soldiers will hunt the Jews out of all their recesses and fastnesses, and none shall escape.

2. Wherever the godly are, that are marked for preservation, they shall be found happy in the enjoyment of Christ. As the dissolution of the Jewish church shall be extended to all parts, so shall the constitution of the Christian church; wherever Christ is, believers will flock to him, and meet in him, as eagles about the prey, without being directed or shewed the way, by the instinct of the new nature. Now Christ is where his Gospel and his ordinances and church are; "for where two or three are gathered in his name, there is he in the midst of them," and thither therefore others will be gathered to him. The kingdom of the Messiah is not to have one particular place for its metropolis, such as Jerusalem was to the Jewish church, to which all Jews were to resort; but wherever the body is, wherever the Gospel is preached, and ordinances are ministered, thither will pious souls resort, there they will find Christ, and by faith feast upon him. Wherever Christ records his name, he will meet his people and bless them, Jno. iv. 21; 1 Tim. ii. 8. Many good interpreters understand it of the gathering of the saints together to Christ in the kingdom of glory. Ask not where the carcase will be, and how they shall find the way to it; for they shall be under an infallible conduct to Him who is their living, quickening head, and the centre of their unity; to him shall the gathering of the people be.

CHAPTER XVIII.

In this chapter we have, I. The parable of the importunate widow, designed to teach us fervency in prayer, ver. 1-8. II. The parable of the Pharisee and publican, designed to teach us humility, and humiliation for sin in prayer, ver. 9-14. III. Christ's favour to little children that were brought to him, ver. 15-17. IV. The trial of a rich man that had a mind to follow Christ, whether he loved better Christ or his riches, his coming short upon that trial, and Christ's discourse with his disciples upon that occasion, ver. 18-30. V. Christ's foretelling of his own death and sufferings, ver. 31-34. VI. His restoring sight to a blind man, ver. 35-43. And these four passages we had before, in Matthew and Mark.

AND he spake a parable unto them to this end, that men ought always to pray, and not to faint; 2 Saying, There was in a city a judge, which feared not God, neither regarded man: 3 And there was a widow in that city; and she came unto him, saying, Avenge me of mine adversary.

4 And he would not for a while: but afterward he said within himself, Though I fear not God, nor regard man; 5 Yet because this widow troubleth me, I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me. 6 And the Lord said, Hear what the unjust judge saith. 7 And shall not God avenge his own elect, which cry day and night unto him, though he bear long with them? 8 I tell you that he will avenge them speedily. Nevertheless when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?

This parable has its key hanging at the door; the drift and design of it is prefixed; Christ spoke it with this intent, to teach us that "men ought always to pray, and not to faint," ver. 1. It supposeth that all God's people are praying people; all God's children keep up both a constant and an occasional correspondence with him; send to him steadily, and upon every emergence. It is our privilege and honour that we may pray; it is our duty, we ought to pray, we sin if we neglect it. It is to be our constant work, we "ought always to pray;" it is that which the duty of every day requires; we must pray, and never grow weary of praying, nor think of giving it off till it comes to be swallowed up in everlasting praise. But that which seems particularly designed here is, to teach us constancy and perseverance in our requests for some spiritual mercies that we are in pursuit of, relating either to ourselves or to the church of God; when we are praying for strength against our spiritual enemies, our lusts and corruptions, which are our worst enemies; we must continue instant in prayer, must pray and not faint; for we shall not seek God's face in vain. So we must likewise in our prayers for the deliverance of the people of God out of the hands of their persecutors and oppressors.

First. Christ shews, by a parable, the power of importunity among men, who will be swayed by that, when nothing else will influence, to do that which is just and right. He gives you an instance of an honest cause that was carried before an unjust judge, not by the equity or compassionableness of it, but purely by dint of importunity. Observe here,

1. The ill character of the judge that was in a certain city, he "neither feared God nor regarded man," that is, he had no manner of concern either for his conscience or for his reputation; he stood in no awe either of the wrath of God against him, or of the censures of men concerning him. Or he took no care to do his duty either to God or man. He was a perfect stranger both to godliness and honour, and had no notion of either. Those that have cast off the fear of their Creator, it is not strange if they be altogether regardless of their fellow creatures; where no fear of God is, no good is to be expected. Such a prevalency of irreligion and inhumanity is bad in any, but very bad in a judge that has power in his hand, in the use of which he ought to be guided by the principles of religion and justice; and if he be not, instead of doing good with his power, he will be in danger of doing hurt. Wickedness in the place of judgment was one of the sorest evils Solomon saw under the sun, Ecc. iii. 16.

2. The distressed case of a poor widow that was necessitated to make her appeal to him, being wronged by some one that thought to bear her down with power and terror: she had manifestly right on her side; but it should seem, in soliciting to have right done her, she tied not herself to the formalities of the law, but made personal application to the judge from day to day at his own house, still crying, "Avenge me of mine adversary;" that is, Do me justice against mine adversary; not that she desired to be revenged on him for any thing he had done against her; but that he might be obliged to restore what effects he had of hers in his hands, and might be disabled any more to oppress her. Note, Poor widows have often many adversaries, who barbarously take advantage of their weak and helpless state, to invade their rights, and defraud them of what little they have; and magistrates are particularly charged, not only not to do "violence to the widow," Jer. xlii. 3, but to "judge the fatherless, and plead for the widow," Isa. i. 17, to be their patrons and protectors; then they are as gods, for God is so, Ps. lxxviii. 5.

3. The difficulty and discouragement she met with in her cause; "he would not for a while;" according to his usual practice, he frowned upon her, took no notice of her cause, but connived at all the wrong her adversary did her; for she had no bribe to give him, no great man whom he stood in any awe of to speak for her; so that he did not at all incline to redress her grievances; and he himself was conscious of the reason of his dilatoriness, and could not but own within himself that he "neither feared God nor regarded man:" it is said a man should know so much amiss by himself, and be in no care to amend it.

4. The gaining of her point by continual dunning of this unjust judge; ver. 5, "because this widow troubles me," gives me a continual toil, I will hear her cause, and do her justice; not so much lest by her clamour against me she bring me into an ill name, as lest by her clamour to me she weary me; for she is resolved she will give me no rest till it is done, and therefore I will do it to save myself farther trouble: as good at first as at last. Thus she got justice done by her continual craving; she begged it at his door, followed him in the streets, solicited him in open court, and still her cry was, "Avenge me of my adversary;" which he was forced to do, to get rid of her; for his conscience, as bad as he was, would not suffer him to send her to prison for an affront upon the court.

Secondly. He applies this for the encouragement of God's praying people, to pray with faith and fervency, and to persevere therein.

1. He assures them that God will at length be gracious to them; ver. 7, "Hear what the unjust judge saith;" how he owns himself quite overcome by a constant importunity, and from thence infers, "Shall not God avenge his own elect?" Observe,

1st. What is it that they desire and expect? That God would "avenge his own elect." Note, First. There is a people in the world that are God's people, his elect, his own elect, a choice people, a chosen people; and this he has an eye to in all he doth for them: it is because they are his chosen, and in pursuance of the choice he has made of them. Secondly. God's own elect meet with a great deal of trouble and opposition in this world; there are many adversaries that fight against them: Satan is their great adversary. Thirdly. That which is wanted and waited for, is God's preserving and protecting them, and the work of his own hands in them; his securing the interest of the church in the world, and of his grace in the heart.

2nd. What is it that is required of God's people in order to the obtaining of this; they must "cry day and night to him;" not that he needs their remonstrances, or can be moved by their pleadings; but this he has made their duty, and to this he has promised mercy. We ought to be particular in praying against our spiritual enemies, as St. Paul was: "For this thing I besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me," like this importunate widow. Lord, mortify this corruption; Lord, arm me against this temptation. We ought to concern ourselves for the persecuted and oppressed churches, and to pray that God would do them justice, and set them in safety. And which he exercises, and its seat is in the souls of men, not in outward array. If the kingdom of God here means specifically the Messianic dispensation, we may still regard it as rather an empire of souls than an external and visible institution. Whatever it was intended to become, at that time it was not in any sense a regular organisation.

xvii. 22. "One of the days of the Son of Man" is one of the days on which he manifests himself.

xvii. 23. On this verse and those which follow there has been much speculation. Two opinions especially have been advocated. One is that Luke here collects utterances which fell from the lips of Jesus on various occasions; the other is, that Jesus himself spoke the same things at different times. The question is one of considerable difficulty, and is not of much practical importance.

xviii. 2. "According to Deut. xvi. 18, the Israelites were to have judges in all the gates of their towns, who were bound to judge the people with just judgment, without respect of persons (see Exod.

herein we must be very urgent; ~~we~~ must cry with earnestness; we must "cry day and night," as those that believe prayer will be heard at last; we must wrestle with God, as those that know how to value the blessing, and will have no nay. God's praying people are bid to give him no rest, Isa. lxii. 6, 7.

3rd. What discouragements they may perhaps meet with in their prayers and expectations; he may "bear long with them," and may not presently appear for them, in answer to their prayers. He is μακροθυμῶν ἐν αὐτοῖς,—he "exerciseth patience towards the adversaries of his people," and doth not take vengeance on them; and he exerciseth the patience of his people, and doth not plead for them: he bore long with the cry of the sin of the Egyptians that oppressed Israel, and with the cry of the sorrows of those that were oppressed.

4th. What assurance they have that mercy will come at last, though it be delayed; and how it is supported by what the unjust judge saith: if this widow prevail by being importunate, much more shall God's elect prevail. For, First. This widow was a stranger, nothing related to the judge; but God's praying people are his own elect, whom he knows, and loves, and delights in, and has always concerned himself for. Secondly. She was but one, but the praying people of God are many; that all come to him on the same errand, and agree to ask what they need, Mat. xviii. 19. As the saints of heaven surround the throne of glory with united praises, so saints on earth besiege the throne of grace with their united prayers. Thirdly. She came to a judge that bade her keep her distance: we come to a Father that bids us come boldly to him, and teaches us to cry, Abba, Father. Fourthly. She came to an unjust judge: we come to a righteous Father, Jno. xvii. 25; one that regards his own glory, and the comforts of his poor creatures, especially those in distress, as widows and fatherless. Fifthly. She came to this judge purely upon her own account; but God is himself engaged in the cause which we are soliciting; and we can say, "Arise, O Lord, plead thine own cause;" and "what wilt thou do to thy great name?" Sixthly. She had no friend to speak for her, to add force to her petition, and to use interest for her more than her own; but "we have an Advocate with the Father," his own Son, "who ever lives to make intercession for us," and has a powerful, prevailing interest in heaven. Seventhly. She had no promise of speeding, no, nor any encouragement given her to ask; but we have the golden sceptre held out to us, are bid to ask, and it is promised it shall be given us. Eighthly. She could have access to the judge only at some certain times; but we may cry to God "day and night," at all hours; and therefore may the rather hope to prevail by importunity. Ninthly. Her importunity was provoking to the judge, and she might fear lest it should set him more against her; but our importunity is pleasing to God, "the prayer of the upright is his delight," and therefore we may hope shall avail much, if it be an effectual, fervent prayer.

2. He intimates to them that, notwithstanding this, they will begin to be weary of waiting for him, ver. 8; "Nevertheless," though such assurances are given, that God will avenge his own elect, yet "when the Son of man comes, shall he find faith on the earth?" The Son of man will come to avenge his own elect—to plead the cause of persecuted Christians against the persecuting Jews; he will come in his providence to plead the cause of his injured people in every age; and at the great day he will come finally to determine the controversies of Zion; now when he comes, "will he find faith in the earth?" The question implies a strong negation; No, he shall not; he himself foresees it. 1st. This supposeth that it is on earth only that there is occasion for faith; for sinners in hell are feeling that which they would not believe, and saints in heaven are enjoying that which they did believe. 2nd. It supposeth that faith is the great thing that Jesus Christ looks for. He looks down upon the children of men, and doth not ask, Is there innocence? but, Is there faith? He inquired concerning the faith of those who applied themselves to him for cures. 3rd. It supposeth that if there were faith, though never so little, he would discover it, and find it out. The weakest believer, and most obscure, his eye is upon. 4th. It is foretold, that when Christ comes to plead his people's cause, he will find but little faith in comparison with what one might expect; that is,

First. In general, he will find but few good people; few that are really and truly good: many that have the form and fashion of godliness, but few that have faith, that are sincere and honest; nay, he will find little fidelity among men: the faithful fail, Ps. xii. 1, 2; even to the end of time there will still be occasion for the same complaint; the world will grow no better, no, not when it is drawing towards its period. Bad it is, and bad it will be, and worst of all, just before Christ's coming; the last times will be the most perilous.

Secondly. In particular, he will find few that have faith concerning his coming. When he comes to avenge his own elect, he looks if there be any faith to help and to uphold, and wonders that there is none, Isa. lix. 16; lxiii. 5. It intimates that Christ, both in his particular comings for the relief of his people, and in his general coming at the end of time, may and will delay his coming so long as that, 1st. Wicked people will begin to defy it, and to say, "Where is the promise of his coming?" 2 Pet. iii. 4; they will challenge him to come, Isa. v. 19; Am. v. 18; and his delay will harden them in their wickedness, Mat. xxiv. 48. 2nd. Even his own people will begin to despair of it, and to conclude he will never come, because he has passed their reckoning. God's time to appear for his people is when things are brought to the last extremity, and when Sion begins to say, "The Lord has forsaken me;" see Isa. xlix. 14; xl. 27. But this is our comfort, that when the time appointed comes, it will appear that the unbelief of man has not made the promise of God of none effect.

9 And he spake this parable unto certain which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others: 10 Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, and the other a publican. 11 The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself, God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. 12 I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess. 13 And the publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner. 14 I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other:

for every one that exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

The scope of this parable likewise is prefixed to it; and we are told ver. 9, who they were that it was levelled at, and for whom it was calculated. He designed it for the conviction of some who "trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others." They were such as had, 1. A great conceit of themselves, and of their own goodness: they thought themselves as holy as they needed to be, and holier than all their neighbours; and such as might serve for examples to them all. But that was not all: 2. They had a confidence in themselves before God; and not only had a high opinion of their own righteousness, but depended upon the merit of it, whenever they addressed God, as their plea: they "trusted in themselves, as being righteous;" they thought they had made God their debtor, and might demand any thing from him. And, 3. They "despised others," and looked upon them with contempt; as not worthy to be compared with them. Now Christ, by this parable, would shew such their folly, and that thereby they shut themselves out from acceptance with God. This is called a parable, though there be nothing of similitude in it; but it is rather a description of the different temper and language of those that proudly justify themselves, and those that humbly condemn themselves, and their different standing before God. It is matter of fact every day.

First. Here are both these addressing themselves to the duty of prayer, at the same place and time; ver. 10, "Two men went up into the temple" (for the temple stood upon a hill) "to pray." It was not the hour of public prayer, but they went thither to offer up their personal devotions; as was usual with good people at that time, when the temple was not only the place but the medium of worship; and God had promised, in answer to Solomon's request, that whatever prayer was made in a right manner in or towards that house, it should therefore the rather be accepted. Christ is our temple, and to him we must have an eye in all our approaches to God. The Pharisee and the publican both went to the temple to pray. Note, Among the worshippers of God in the visible church, there is a mixture of good and bad,—of some that are accepted of God, and some that are not; and so it has been ever since Cain and Abel brought their offering to the same altar. The Pharisee, as proud as he was, could not think himself above prayer; nor could the publican, as humble as he was, think himself shut out from the benefit of it; but we have reason to think these went with different views.

1. The Pharisee went to the temple to pray, because it was a public place, more public than the corners of the streets; and therefore he should have many eyes upon him, who would applaud his devotion; which perhaps was more than was expected. The character Christ gave of the Pharisees, that "all their works they did to be seen of men," gives us occasion for this suspicion. Note, Hypocrites keep up the external performances of religion only to save or gain credit. There are many we see every day at the temple, whom it is to be feared we shall not see in the great day at Christ's right hand.

2. The publican went to the temple, because it was appointed to be "a house of prayer for all people," Isa. lvi. 7. The Pharisee came to the temple upon a compliment, the publican upon business; the Pharisee to make his appearance, the publican to make his request. Now God sees with what disposition and design we come to wait upon him in holy ordinances, and will judge of us accordingly.

Secondly. Here is the Pharisee's address to God, (for a prayer I cannot call it,) he "stood and prayed thus with himself," ver. 11, 12; "standing by himself he prayed thus," some read it; he was wholly intent upon himself; had nothing in his eye but self; his own praise, and not God's glory; or, standing in some conspicuous place, where he distinguished himself, or setting himself in print with a great deal of state and formality, he prayed thus. Now that which he is here supposed to say is that which shews,

1. That he trusted to himself that he was righteous. A great many good things he saith of himself, which we will suppose to be true: that he was free from gross and scandalous sins; he was not an extortioner, not a usurer, not oppressive to debtors or tenants; but fair and kind to all that had dependence upon him: he was not unjust in any of his dealings; did no man any wrong: he could say as Samuel, "Whose ox or ass have I taken?" He was no adulterer, but had possessed his vessel in sanctification and honour. Yet this was not all; he "fasted twice in the week;" partly as an act of temperance, partly of devotion: the Pharisees and their disciples fasted twice a week, Monday and Thursday: thus he glorified God with his body. Yet that was not all: he gave tithes of all that he possessed, according to the law, and so glorified God with his worldly estate. Now all this was very well and commendable. Miserable is the condition of those who come short of the righteousness of this Pharisee; and yet he was not accepted; and why was he not? 1st. His giving God thanks for this, though in itself a good thing, yet seems to be a mere formality. He doth not say, "By the grace of God, I am what I am," as Paul did; but turns it off with a slight, "God I thank thee;" which is intended but for a plausible introduction to a proud, vainglorious ostentation of himself. 2nd. He makes his boast of this, and dwells with delight upon this subject; as if all his business to the temple was to tell God Almighty how very good he was; and he is ready to say, with those hypocrites that we read of, Isa. viii. 3, "Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not?" 3rd. He trusted to it as a righteousness; and not only mentioned it, but pleaded it; as if hereby he had merited at the hands of God, and made him his debtor. 4th. Here is not one word of prayer in all he saith. He "went up into the temple to pray," but forgot his errand; was so full of himself and his own goodness, that he thought he had need of nothing, no, not of the favour and grace of God; which it should seem he did not think worth asking.

2. That he "despised others." 1st. He thought meanly of all mankind but himself: "I thank thee that I am not as other men are." He speaks indefinitely, as if he were better than any. We may have reason to thank God that we are not as some men are, that are notoriously wicked and vile; but to speak at random thus, as if we only were good, and all beside us were reprobates, is to judge by wholesale. 2nd. He thought meanly in a particular manner of this publican, whom he had left behind, it is probable, in the court of the Gentiles, and whose company he had fallen into as he came to the temple. He knew he was a publican, and therefore very uncharitably concluded that he was an extortioner, unjust, and all that is naught. Suppose it had been so, and he had known it, what business had he to take notice of it? Could not he say his prayers, (and that was all the Pharisees did,) without reproaching his neighbours? Or was this a part of his, "God, I thank thee?" And was he as much pleased with the publican's badness as with his own goodness? There could not be a plainer evidence, not only of the want of humility and charity, but of reigning pride and malice, than this was.

Thirdly. Here is the publican's address to God, which was the reverse of the Pharisee's; as full of humility and humiliation as his was of pride and ostentation; and of repentance for sin, and desire towards God, as his was of confidence in himself, and his own righteousness and sufficiency.

1. He expressed his repentance and humility in what he did; and his gesture lxiii. 6—9; Lev. xix. 15). Such town tribunals existed in our Lord's days (Matt. v. 21, 22); and it is not improbable that the narrative in question was taken from life" (Oostersee on Luke, English translation).

xviii. 3. The words "avenge me of mine adversary" are equivalent to "do me justice in opposition to one who unjustly prosecutes me."

xviii. 6. The emphasis of the verse is upon the word "unjust." The unjust judge is contrasted with the righteous judge.

xviii. 7. This verse may be rendered, "And will not God effect the vindication of his elect who cry to him day and night, and toward whom he is long-suffering?" This, we think, gives the real meaning, which has been partly missed by the translators. The ordinary version seems inconsistent with the declaration of speedy vindication contained in the following verse.

xviii. 8. It must be noted that our Lord speaks to some who suppose the Son of Man is not come, hence the question proposed in when he addressed himself to his devotion, was expressive of great seriousness and humility, and the proper clothing of a broken, penitent, and obedient heart. 1st. He stood afar off. The Pharisee stood, but crowded up as nigh as he could to the upper end of the court. The publican, in a sense of his unworthiness to draw near to God, kept at a distance; and perhaps for fear of offending the Pharisee, whom he observed to look scornfully upon him, and of disturbing his devotions. Hereby he owned that God might justly behold him afar off, and send him into a state of eternal distance from him; and that it was a great favour that God was pleased to admit him thus nigh. 2nd. He "would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven," much less his hands, as was usual in prayer. He did lift up his heart to God in the heavens, in holy desires; but, through prevailing shame and humiliation, he did not lift up his eyes in holy confidence and courage. His iniquities are gone over his head, as a heavy burthen, so that he is not able to look up, Ps. xl. 12. The dejection of his looks is an indication of the dejection of his mind at the thought of sin. 3rd. He smote upon his breast, in a holy indignation at himself for sin: Thus would I smite this wicked heart of mine; the poisoned fountain, out of which flow all the streams of sin, if I could come at it. The sinner's heart first smites him in a penitent rebuke, 2 Sam. xxiv. 10; David's heart smote him; Sinner, what hast thou done?—and then he smites his heart with penitent remorse, "O wretched man that I am!" Ephraim is said to smite upon his thigh, Jer. xxxi. 19. Great mourners are represented tabering upon their breasts, Nah. ii. 7.

2. He expressed it in what he said. His prayer was short; fear and shame nindered him from saying much; sighs and groans swallowed up his words; but what he said was to the purpose, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" And blessed be God that we have this prayer upon record, as an answered prayer, and that we are sure he that prayed it went to his house justified; and so shall we, if we pray as he did, through Jesus Christ, "God be merciful to me a sinner;" the God of infinite mercy be merciful to me; for if he be not, I am for ever undone, for ever miserable: God be merciful to me, for I have been cruel to myself. 1st. He owns himself a sinner by nature, by practice, guilty before God; "Behold I am vile, what shall I answer thee?" The Pharisee denied himself to be a sinner; none of his neighbours can charge him, and he sees no reason to charge himself, with any thing amiss; he is clean, he is pure from sin; but the publican gives himself no other character but that of a sinner, a convicted criminal at God's bar. 2nd. He has no dependence but upon the mercy of God; that, and that only, he relies upon. The Pharisee had insisted upon the merit of his fastings and tithes; but the poor publican disclaims all thought of merit, and flies to mercy, as his city of refuge, and takes hold of the horn of that altar: Justice condemns me; nothing will save me but mercy, mercy. 3rd. He earnestly prays for the benefit of that mercy; "O God, be merciful, be propitious to me; forgive my sins, be reconciled to me; take me into thy favour; receive me graciously; love me freely." He comes as a beggar for an alms, when he is ready to perish for hunger. Probably he repeated this prayer with renewed affections, and perhaps said more to the same purpose; made a particular confession of his sins, and mentioned the particular mercies he wanted, and waited upon God for; but still this was the burthen of the song, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

Fourthly. Here is the publican's acceptance with God. We have seen how differently these two addressed themselves to God: it is now worth while to inquire how they sped. There were those who would cry up the Pharisee, and by whom he would go to his house applauded, and who would look with contempt upon this sniggling, whining publican. But our Lord Jesus, to whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secret is hid, who is perfectly acquainted with all proceedings in the court of heavenly affairs, assures us that this poor penitent, broken-hearted publican "went to his house justified rather than the other." The Pharisee thought if one of them two must be justified, and not the other, certainly it must be he, rather than the publican. No, saith Christ, "I tell you, I affirm it with the utmost assurance, and declare it to you, with the utmost concern, I tell you, it is the publican rather than the Pharisee. The proud Pharisee goes away rejected of God; his thanksgivings are so far from being accepted, that they are an abomination. He is not justified, his sins are not pardoned, nor is he delivered from condemnation. He is not accepted as righteous in God's sight, because he is so righteous in his own sight; but the publican, upon this humble address to heaven, obtains the remission of his sins; and he whom the Pharisee would not set with the dogs of his flock, God sets with the children of his family. And the reason given for this is, because God's glory is to resist the proud, and give grace to the humble. 1. Proud men that exalt themselves, are rivals with God, and therefore they shall certainly be abased. God, in his discourse with Job, appeals to this proof, that he is God, that he "looks upon every one that is proud, and brings him low," Job xl. 12. 2. Humble men that abase themselves are subjects to God, and they shall be exalted. God has preferment in store for those that will take it as a favour, not for those that demand it as a debt. He shall be exalted into the love of God, and communion with him; shall be exalted into a satisfaction in himself, and exalted at last as high as heaven. See how the punishment answers the sin, "He that exalteth himself shall be abased;" see how the recompence answers the duty, "He that humbles himself shall be exalted." See also the power of God's grace, in bringing good out of evil. The publican had been a great sinner, and out of the greatness of his sin was brought the greatness of his repentance; "out of the eater came forth meat;" and on the contrary, the power of Satan's malice, in bringing evil out of good. It was good that the Pharisee was no extortioner, or unjust; but the devil made him proud of this to his ruin.

15 And they brought unto him also infants, that he would touch them: but when his disciples saw it, they rebuked them. 16 But Jesus called them unto him, and said, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. 17 Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child shall in no wise enter therein.

This passage of story we had both in Matthew and Mark; it very fitly follows here after the story of the publican, as a confirmation of the truth which was to be illustrated by that parable, that those shall be accepted with God, and honoured, who humble themselves; and for them Christ has blessings in store, the choicest and best of blessings. Observe here,

I. That those who are themselves blessed in Christ, should desire to have their children also blessed in him, and should hereby testify the true honour they have for Christ, by their making use of him, and the true love they have for their children, by their concern about their souls. They brought to him infants very young, not able to go; sucking children, as some think. None too little, too young, to bring to Christ, who knows how to shew kindness to them that are not capable of doing service to him.

II. One gracious touch of Christ's will make our children happy. "They brought infants to him, that he might touch them," in token of the application of his grace and Spirit to them, for that always makes way for his blessing, which likewise they expected: see Isa. xlv. 3; "I will" first "pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and" then "my blessing upon thine offspring."

III. It is no strange thing for those that make their application to Jesus Christ for themselves, or for their children, to meet with discouragement, even from those that should countenance and encourage them. "When the disciples saw it," they thought, if this were admitted, it would bring an endless trouble upon their Master, and therefore "they rebuked them," and frowned upon them. The spouse complained of the watchmen, Cant. iii. 3-5, 7.

IV. Many whom the disciples rebuke, the Master invites. "Jesus called them unto him," when upon his disciples' check they were retiring. They did not appeal from the disciples to the Master, but the Master took cognizance of their despised cause.

V. It is the mind of Christ that little children should be brought to him, and presented as living sacrifices to his honour: "Suffer little children to come to me, and forbid them not;" let nothing be done to hinder them, for they shall be as welcome as any. The promise is to us, and to our seed; and therefore he that has the dispensing of promised blessings will bid them welcome to him with us.

VI. The children of those that belong to the kingdom of God do likewise belong to that kingdom, as the children of freemen are freemen. If the parents be members of the visible church, the children are so too; for if the root be holy, the branches are so.

VII. So welcome are children to Christ, that those grown people are most welcome to him that have in them most of the disposition of children, ver. 17: "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child," that is, receive the benefits of it with humility and thankfulness, not pretending to merit them, as the Pharisee did, but gladly owning himself indebted to free grace for them, as the publican did,—unless a man be brought to this self-denying frame, he "shall in no wise enter into that kingdom." They must receive the kingdom of God as children receive their estates, by descent and inheritance, not by purchase, and call it their Father's gift.

18 And a certain ruler asked him, saying, Good Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? 19 And Jesus said unto him, Why callest thou me good? none is good, save one, that is, God. 20 Thou knowest the commandments, Do not commit adultery, Do not kill, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Honour thy father and thy mother. 21 And he said, All these have I kept from my youth up. 22 Now when Jesus heard these things, he said unto him, Yet lackest thou one thing: sell all that thou hast, and distribute unto the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, follow me. 23 And when he heard this, he was very sorrowful: for he was very rich. 24 And when Jesus saw that he was very sorrowful, he said, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! 25 For it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. 26 And they that heard it said, Who then can be saved? 27 And he said, The things which are impossible with men are possible with God. 28 Then Peter said, Lo, we have left all, and followed thee. 29 And he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake, 30 Who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come life everlasting.

In these verses we have,

First. Christ's discourse with a ruler, that had a good mind to be directed by him in the way to heaven; in which we may observe,

1. It is a blessed sight to see persons of distinction in the world distinguish themselves from others of their rank by their concern about their souls and another life. Luke takes notice of it, that he was a ruler; few of the rulers had any esteem for Christ; but here was one that had, whether a church or state ruler doth not appear, but he was one in authority.

2. The great thing we are every one of us concerned to inquire after is, what we shall do to get to heaven; "what we shall do to inherit eternal life;" which implies such a belief of an eternal life, after this, as atheists and infidels have not; such a concern to make it sure, as a careless, unthinking world have not; and such a willingness to comply with any terms, that it may be made sure, as those have not that are resolvedly devoted to the world and the flesh.

3. Those that would inherit eternal life must apply themselves to Jesus this verse. The people of God are oppressed, and deliverance is nigh; but when the Christ appears, will he be received or rejected?

xviii. 11. We may translate either, as our version, "the Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself," or "the Pharisee stood by himself and prayed thus." The common rendering is generally preferred.

xviii. 12. Only one fast, and that an annual one, was prescribed by the Mosaic law, but others had come to be observed with the growth of tradition and ritual; and among them two weekly fasts, one on Monday and one on Thursday. In common with all ceremonialists, the Pharisees attached special importance and merit to the observation of what God had not commanded. It was so in respect to the tithes. The Divine law did not require a tithe of all a man gained, but only of certain things, as cattle and the produce of the soil. In this case the man should be understood to say that he gave tithes of all he acquired—i.e., gave a tenth part of his whole income.

Christ as their master, their teaching master, so it signifies here, διδάσκαλε, and their ruling master here, and so they shall for certain find him. There is no learning the way to heaven but in the school of Christ, by those that enter themselves into it, and stick to it.

4. Those that come to Christ as their master, must believe him to have not only a Divine mission, but a Divine goodness. Christ would have this ruler know, that if he understood himself aright in calling him good, he did in effect call him God; and indeed he was so, ver. 19: "Why callest thou me good?" thou knowest "there is none good but one, and that is God;" and dost thou then take me for God? If so, thou art in the right.

5. Our Master, Christ himself, has not altered the way to heaven from what it was before his coming; but only has made it more plain and easy and comfortable, and provided for our relief, in case we take any false step. "Thou knowest the commandments;" Christ came not to destroy the law and the prophets, but to establish them. Wouldst thou inherit eternal life, govern thyself by the commandments.

6. The duties of the second table must be conscientiously observed, in order to our happiness, and we must not think that any acts of devotion, how plausible soever, will atone for the neglect of them. Nor is it enough to keep ourselves free from the gross violations of these commandments; but we must know these commandments, as Christ has explained them in his sermon upon the mount, in their extent and spiritual nature, and so observe them.

7. Men think themselves innocent, because they are ignorant: so this ruler did; he said, "All these things have I kept from my youth," ver. 21. He knows no more of evil by himself than the Pharisee did, ver. 11. He boasts that he began early in a course of virtue, that he had continued in it to this day, and that he had not in any instance transgressed. Had he been acquainted with the extent and spiritual nature of the Divine law, and with the workings of his heart—had he been but Christ's disciple a while, and learned of him, he would have said the quite contrary; All these have I broken from my youth up, in thought, word, and deed.

8. The great things by which we are to try our spiritual state are, how we stand affected to Christ and to our brethren—to this world, and to the other: by these this man was tried. For, 1st. If he have a true affection to Christ, he will come and follow him, will attend to his doctrine, and submit to his discipline, whatever it cost him. None shall inherit eternal life who are not willing to take their lot with the Lord Jesus, to follow the Lamb wheresoever he goes. 2nd. If he have a true affection to his brethren, he will, as there is occasion, distribute to the poor, who are God's receivers of his dues out of our estates. 3rd. If he think meanly of this world, as he ought, he will not stick at selling what he has, if there be a necessity for it, for the relief of God's poor. 4th. If he think highly of the other world, as he ought, he will desire no more but to have treasure in heaven, and will reckon that a sufficient, abundant recompence for all that he has left or lost or laid out for God in this world.

9. There are many that have a great deal in them that is very commendable, and yet they perish for lack of some one thing; so this ruler here, he broke with Christ upon this: he liked all his terms very well but this, which would part between him and his estate: In this, I pray thee, have me excused; if this be the bargain, it is no bargain.

10. Many that are loath to leave Christ, yet do leave him. After a long struggle between their convictions and their corruptions, their corruptions carry the day at last; they are very sorry they cannot serve God and mammon both; but if one must be quitted, it shall be their God, not their worldly gain.

Secondly. Christ's discourse with his disciples upon this occasion; in which we may observe,

1. That riches are a great hindrance to many in the way to heaven. Christ took notice of the reluctance and regret with which the rich man broke off from him; he "saw that he was very sorrowful," and was sorry for him; but from thence he infers, "how hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God?" ver. 24. If this ruler had had but as little of the world as Peter, and James, and John had, in all probability he would have left it to follow Christ, as they did; but having a great estate, it had a great influence upon him, and he chose rather to take his leave of Christ than to lay himself under an obligation to dispose of his estate in charitable uses. Christ asserts the difficulty of the salvation of rich people very emphatically, ver. 25: "It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." It is a proverbial expression, that speaks the thing extremely difficult.

2. That such a general affection there is in the hearts of all people to this world, and the things of it, that since Christ has required it as necessary to salvation that we should sit loose to this world, it is really very hard for any to get to heaven. If we must sell all, or break with Christ, "who then can be saved?" ver. 25. They do not find fault with what Christ required, as hard and unreasonable. No, it is very fit that they who expect an eternal happiness in the other world, should be willing to forego all that is dear to them in this world, in expectation of it; but they know how closely the hearts of the most of men cleave to this world, and are ready to despair of their being ever brought to this.

3. That there are such difficulties in the way of our salvation as could never be got over but by pure omnipotence, by that grace of God which is almighty, and to which that is possible which exceeds all created power and wisdom. "The things which are impossible with men," and utterly impossible it is that men should work such a change upon their own spirits as to turn them from the world to God,—it is like dividing the sea and driving Jordan back,—these things "are possible with God." His grace can work upon the soul, so as to alter the bent and bias of it, and give it a contrary ply; and it is he that works in us both to will and to do.

4. That there is an aptness in us to speak too much of what we have left and lost, of what we have done and suffered, for Christ. This appears in Peter, ver. 28: "Lo, we have left all, and followed thee;" when it came in his way, he could not forbear magnifying his own and his brethren's affection to Christ in quitting all to follow him. But this we should be so far from boasting of, that we should rather acknowledge it not worth taking notice of, and be ashamed of ourselves that there has been any regret and difficulty in the doing of it, and any hankerings towards those things afterwards.

5. That whatever we have left or laid out for Christ, it shall without fail be abundantly made up to us, in this world, and that to come, notwithstanding our weaknesses and infirmities, ver. 29, 30: "There is no man that has left" the comfort of his estate or relations "for the kingdom of God's sake," rather than they should hinder either his services to that kingdom or his enjoyments of it, "who shall not receive manifold more in this present time," in the graces and comforts of God's Spirit, in the pleasures of communion with God, and of a good conscience—advantages which, to those who know how to value and improve them, will abundantly countervail all their losses. Yet that is not all; in the world to come, they shall receive life everlasting, which is the thing that the ruler seemed to have his eye and heart upon.

31 Then he took unto him the twelve, and said

xviii. 13. The publican, as a Jew, was not required to remain in the court of the Gentiles, but his humility led him to occupy a position remote from the most holy place.

xviii. 15. It may be that these infants were the children of some of our Lord's disciples, and that they were brought to receive his blessing when he was about to depart and pursue his journey to Jerusalem. This view accords with a custom which prevailed among the Jews.

unto them, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished. 32 For he shall be delivered unto the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, and spitefully entreated, and spitted on: 33 And they shall scourge him, and put him to death: and the third day he shall rise again. 34 And they understood none of these things: and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken.

Here is, First, The notice Christ gave to his disciples of his sufferings and death approaching, and of the glorious issue of them, which he himself had a perfect sight and foreknowledge of, and thought it necessary to give them warning of, that it might be the less surprise and terror to them. Two things here are, which we had not in the other evangelists: 1. That the sufferings of Christ are here spoken of as the fulfilling of the Scriptures, with which consideration Christ reconciled himself to them, and would reconcile them. "All things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man," especially the hardships he should undergo, "shall be accomplished." Note, The Spirit of Christ in the Old Testament prophets, "testified beforehand his sufferings, and the glory that should follow." 1 Pet. i. 11. This proves that the Scriptures are the Word of God, for they had their exact and full accomplishment; and that Jesus Christ was sent of God, for they had their accomplishment in him; this was he that should come; for whatever was foretold concerning the Messiah was verified in him; and he would submit to any thing for the fulfilling of Scripture, that not one jot or tittle of that should fall to the ground. This makes the offence of the cross to cease, and puts an honour upon it; "thus it was written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer;" thus it became him. 2. That the ignominy and disgrace done to Christ in his sufferings, is here most insisted upon. The other evangelists had said, he should be mocked; but here it is added, 'he shall be spitefully treated,' ὀνειδισθήσεται, he shall be loaded with contumely and contempt, shall have all possible reproach put upon him. This was that part of his sufferings by which, in a spiritual manner, he satisfied God's justice for the injury we had done him in his honour by sin. Here is one particular instance of disgrace done him, that he was spit upon, which had been particularly foretold, Isa. l. 6; but here, as always, when Christ spoke of his sufferings and death, he foretold the resurrection, as that which took off both the terror and reproach of his sufferings; "the third day he shall rise again."

Secondly. The confusion that the disciples were hereby put into. This was so contrary to the notions they had had of the Messiah and his kingdom, such a balk to their expectations from their Master, and such a breaking of all their measures, that "they understood none of these things," ver. 34. Their prejudices were so strong that they would not understand them literally, and they could not understand them otherwise, so that they did not understand them at all; it was a mystery, it was a riddle to them; it must be so; but they think it impossible to be reconciled with the glory and honour of the Messiah, and the designs of setting up his kingdom. This saying was 'hid from them,' κεκρυμμένον ἀπ' αὐτῶν, it was apocrypha to them, they could not receive it; for their parts they had read the Old Testament many a time, but they could never see any thing in it that should be accomplished in the disgrace and death of this Messiah. They were so intent upon the prophecies that spoke of his glory, that they overlooked those that spoke of his sufferings, which the scribes and doctors of the law should have directed them to take notice of, and should have brought into their creeds and catechisms, as well as the other; but they did not suit their scheme, and therefore were laid aside. Note, Therefore it is that people run into mistakes, because they read their Bibles by the halves, and are as partial in the prophets as they are in the law; they are only for the smooth things, Isa. xxx. 10; thus now we are too apt, in reading the prophecies that are yet to be fulfilled, to have our expectations raised of the glorious state of the church in the latter days; but we overlook its wilderness, sackcloth state, and are willing to fancy that is over, and nothing is reserved for us but the halycon days; and then when tribulation and persecution ariseth, we do not understand it, neither know we the things that are done; though we are told, as plainly as can be, that "through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God."

35 And it came to pass, that as he was come nigh unto Jericho, a certain blind man sat by the way side begging: 36 And hearing the multitude pass by, he asked what it meant. 37 And they told him, that Jesus of Nazareth passeth by. 38 And he cried, saying, Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on me. 39 And they which went before rebuked him, that he should hold his peace: but he cried so much the more, Thou son of David, have mercy on me. 40 And Jesus stood, and commanded him to be brought unto him; and when he was come near, he asked him, 41 Saying, What wilt thou that I shall do unto thee? And he said, Lord, that I may receive my sight. 42 And Jesus said unto him, Receive thy sight: thy faith hath saved thee. 43 And immediately he received his sight, and xviii. 18. Both Matthew and Mark give this relation, but neither of them states that the man who came was a "ruler." He may have been a synagogue ruler.

xviii. 29, 30. The Mormons justify polygamy from this passage, by saying that our Lord promises those who leave wife for his sake "more"—i.e., a plurality. But, 1, this could only apply to those who had actually forsaken wives; 2, "manifold more" wives and parents, &c., is an incoherent phrase; and, 3, the Greek for "manifold more" followed him, glorifying God : and all the people, when they saw it, gave praise unto God.

Christ came not only to bring light to a dark world, and so to set before us the objects we are to have in view, but also to give sight to blind souls, and by healing the organ to enable them to view those objects; as a token of this, he cured many of their bodily blindness. We have now an account of one to whom he gave sight near Jericho. Mark gives us an account of one, and names him, whom he cured "as he went out of Jericho," Mar. x. 46; Matthew speaks of two whom he cured "as they departed from Jericho," Mat. xx. 30; Luke saith it was, ἐν τῇ ἐξόδῳ αὐτῶν, "when he was near to Jericho," which might be when he was going out of it as well as when he was coming into it. Observe,

I. This poor "blind man sat by the way side begging," ver. 35. It seems he was not only blind, but poor, had nothing to subsist on, nor any relations to maintain him; the sinner emblem of the world of mankind which Christ came to heal and save; they are therefore wretched and miserable, for they are both poor and blind. Rev. iii. 17. He sat begging, for he was blind, and could not work for his living. Note, Those ought to be relieved by charity whom the providence of God has any way disabled to get their own bread; such objects of charity by the way side ought not to be overlooked by us. Christ here cast a favourable eye upon a common beggar; and though there are cheats among such, yet they must not therefore be all thought so.

II. Hearing the noise of a multitude passing by, "he asked what it meant," ver. 36. This we had not before. It teacheth us that it is good to be inquisitive, and those who are so, some time or other, find the benefit of it. Those that want their sight, should make so much the better use of their hearing; and when they cannot see with their own eyes should, by asking questions, make use of other people's eyes; so this blind man did, and by that means came to understand that Jesus of Nazareth passed by, ver. 37. It is good being in Christ's way; and when we have an opportunity of applying ourselves to him, not to let it slip.

III. His prayer has in it a great deal both of faith and fervency: "Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on me!" ver. 38. He owns Christ to be the son of David, the Messiah promised,—he believes him to be Jesus, a Saviour; he believes he is able to help and succour him, and earnestly begs his favour: "Have mercy on me;" "pardon my sin, pity my misery." Christ is a merciful king; those that apply themselves to him as the son of David shall find him so; and ask enough for themselves when they pray, "Have mercy on us;" for Christ's mercy includes all.

IV. Those that are in good earnest for Christ's favours and blessings, will not be put by from the pursuit of them, though they meet with opposition and rebuke. They that went along chiding him as troublesome to the Master,—noisy and impertinent,—and bade him hold his peace; but he went on with his petition, nay, the check given him was but as a dam to a full stream, which makes it swell so much the more; he cried the louder, "Son of David, have mercy on me." Those that would speed in prayer, must be importunate in prayer. This history, in the close of the chapter, speaks the same thing with the parable in the beginning of the chapter, that "men ought always to pray, and not to faint."

V. Christ encourageth poor beggars, whom men frown upon, and invites them to come to him, and is ready to entertain them, and bid them welcome: "He commanded them to be brought to him." Note, Christ has more tenderness and compassion for distressed supplicants than any of his followers have. Though Christ was upon his journey, yet he stopped, and "stood, and commanded him to be brought to him." Those that had checked him must now lend him their hands to lead him to Christ.

VI. Though Christ knows all our wants, he will know them from us; ver. 41. "What wilt thou that I shall do unto thee?" By spreading our case before God, and a particular remembrance of our wants and burthens, we teach ourselves to value the mercy we are in pursuit of; and it is necessary we should, else we are not fit to receive it. This man poured out his soul before Christ when he said, "Lord, thou hast said, I may receive my sight." Thus particular should we be in prayer upon particular occasions.

VII. The prayer of faith, guided by Christ's encouraging promises, and grounded on them, shall not be in vain; nay, it shall not only receive an answer of peace, but of honour, ver. 42. Christ said, "Receive thy sight; thy faith hath made thee whole." True faith will produce fervency in prayer, and both together will fetch in abundance of the fruits of Christ's favour; and they are then doubly comfortable when they come in that way, when we are saved by faith.

VIII. The grace of Christ ought to be thankfully acknowledged to the glory of God, ver. 43. I. The poor beggar himself, that had his sight restored, "followed Christ, glorifying God." Christ made it his business to glorify his Father; and those whom he healed then pleased him best when they praised God, as those shall please God best that praise Christ, and do him honour, for in confessing that he is Lord we give glory to God the Father. It is for the glory of God, if we follow Christ; as those will do whose eyes are opened. 2. The people that saw it could not forbear giving praise to God, who had given such power to the Son of man, and by him had conferred such favours on the sons of men. Note, We must give praise to God for his mercies to others as well as for mercies to ourselves.

CHAPTER XIX.

In this chapter we have, I. The conversion of Zacchæus the publican, at Jericho, ver. 1—10. II. The parable of the pounds which the king intrusted with his servants; and of his rebellious citizens, ver. 11—27. III. Christ's riding in triumph (such a triumph as it was) into Jerusalem; and his lamentation in prospect of the ruin of that city, ver. 28—44. IV. His teaching in the temple, and casting the buyers and sellers out of it, ver. 45—48.

AND Jesus entered and passed through Jericho. 2 And, behold, there was a man named Zacchæus, which was the chief among the publicans, and he was rich. 3 And he sought to see Jesus who he was; and could not for the press, because he was little of stature. 4 And he ran before, and climbed up into a sycamore tree to see him: for he was to pass that way. 5 And when Jesus came to the place, he looked up, and saw him, and said unto him, Zacchæus, make haste, and come down; for to day I must abide at thy house. 6 And he made haste, and came down, and received him joyfully. 7 And when they saw it, they all murmured, saying, That he was gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner. 8 And Zacchæus stood, and said unto the Lord; Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold. 9 And Jesus said unto him, This day is salvation come to this house, forsomuch as he also is a son of Abraham. 10 For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.

Many, no doubt, were converted to the faith of Christ, of whom no account is kept in the Gospels; but the conversion of some, whose case had something in it extraordinary, is recorded, as this of Zacchæus. Christ passed through Jericho, ver. 1; that city was built under a curse, yet Christ honoured it with his presence; for the Gospel takes away the curse. Though it ought not to have been built, yet it was not therefore a sin to live in it when it was built. Christ was now going from the other side Jordan to Bethany, near Jerusalem, to raise Lazarus to life; when he was going to do one good work he contrived to do many by the way. He did good both to the souls and to the bodies of people; we have here an instance of the former. Observe,

First. Who and what this Zacchæus was. His name speaks him a Jew; Zaccai was a common name among the Jews; they had a famous rabbin, much about this time, of that name. Observe,

1. His calling, and the post he was in; "he was the chief among the publicans," receiver-general; other publicans were officers under him; he was, as some think, farmer of the customs. We often read of publicans coming to Christ; but here was one that was chief of the publicans, was in authority, that inquired after him. God has his remnant among all sorts; Christ came to save even the chief of sinners, and therefore even the chief of publicans.

2. His circumstances in the world were very considerable; "he was rich." The inferior publicans were commonly men of broken fortunes, and low in the world, but he that was chief of the publicans had raised a good estate. Christ had lately shewed how hard it is for rich people to enter into the kingdom of God, yet presently produceth an instance of one rich man, that had been lost, and was found, and that not as the prodigal, by being reduced to want.

Secondly. How he came in Christ's way, and what was the occasion of his acquaintance with him.

1. He had a great curiosity to see Jesus, what kind of man he was, having heard great talk of him, ver. 3. It is natural to us to come in sight of those whose fame has filled our ears, as being apt to imagine there is something extraordinary in their countenances; at least he would be able to say hereafter he had seen such and such great men: "but the eye is not satisfied with seeing." We should now seek to see Jesus with an eye of faith; to see who he is, should address ourselves in holy ordinances with this in our eye, "We would see Jesus."

2. He could not get his curiosity gratified in this matter, because he was little, and the crowd was great. Christ did not study to shew himself, was not carried on men's shoulders, as the pope is, in procession, that all men might see him; neither he nor his kingdom came with observation; he did not ride in an open chariot, as princes do, but as one of us, he was lost in a crowd; for that was the day of his humiliation. Zacchæus was low of stature, and overtopped by all about him, so that he could not get a sight of Jesus; many that are little of stature have large souls, and are lively in spirit. Who would not rather be a Zacchæus than a Saul, though he was higher by head and shoulders than all about him? Let not those that are little of stature take thought of adding cubits to it.

3. Because he would not balk his fancy, he forgot his gravity, as chief of the publicans, and "ran before" like a boy, and climbed up into a sycamore tree to see him. Note, Those that sincerely desire a sight of Christ will use the proper means for gaining a sight of him, and will break through a deal of difficulty and opposition, and be willing to take pains to see him. Those that find themselves little, must take all the advantages they can get to raise themselves to a sight of Christ, and not be ashamed to own that they need them, and all little enough. Let not dwarfs despair, with good help, by aiming high to reach him.

Thirdly. The notice Christ took of him, and the call he gave him to a farther acquaintance, ver. 5, and the efficacy of that call, ver. 6.

1. Christ invited himself to Zacchæus' house, not doubting of his hearty welcome there; nay wherever Christ comes, as he brings his own entertainment along with him, so he brings his own welcome; he opens the heart and inclines it to receive him. Christ looked up into the tree, and saw Zacchæus; he came to look upon Christ, and resolved to take particular notice of him, but little thought of being taken notice of by Christ; that was an honour too great, and too far above his merit, for him to have any thought of. See how Christ prevented him with the blessings of his goodness, and outdid his expectations; and see how he encouraged very weak beginnings, and helped them forward. He that had a mind to know Christ, shall be known of him: that only counted to see him, shall be admitted to converse with him. Note, Those that are faithful in a little, shall be intrusted with more. And sometimes those that come to hear the word of Christ, as Zacchæus did, only for curiosity, beyond what they thought of, have their consciences awakened, and their hearts changed. Christ called him by name, "Zacchæus," for he knows his chosen by name; are they not in his book? He might ask, as Nathanael did, Jno. i. 45: "Whence knowest thou me?" But before he climbed the sycamore tree Christ saw him, and knew him. He bade him "make haste, and come down;" those is a neuter plural, signifying things, but not specifying their nature. To all which it may be added that our Lord is not wont to promise temporal wealth to his disciples, but spiritual gifts of greater value.

xviii. 31—33. To those who believe in the Divine sonship of Jesus, these verses will sufficiently prove that the prophecies refer extensively to him. Matthew and Mark both record this address, but they both omit the allusion to the prophets. (See Matt. xx. 17—19; Mark x. 32—34.)

xviii. 35. A reference to chap. xix. 1 renders it tolerably certain that the miracle ensuing was performed as Jesus approached Jericho from the direction of the Jordan, which had now been crossed at the usual ford. Matt. xx. 29, &c., places the miracle after leaving Jericho, and relates it of two blind men. Mark x. 46 also places the miracle after leaving Jericho, but he speaks, like Luke, of one blind man only. On these peculiarities much has been written with a view to harmonise them, on the one hand, or, on the other, to prove them that Christ calls must come down, must humble themselves, and not think to climb to heaven by any righteousness of their own; and they must make haste and come down, for delays are dangerous. Zacchæus must not hesitate, but hasten; he knows it is not a matter that needs consideration whether he should welcome such a guest to his house. He must come down, for Christ intends this day to bait at his house, and stay an hour or two with him: "behold, he stands at the door and knocks."

2. Zacchæus was overjoyed to have such an honour put upon his house, ver. 6; "he made haste, and came down, and received him joyfully." And his receiving him into his house was an indication and token of his receiving him into his heart. Note, When Christ calls to us, we must make haste to answer his calls; and when he comes to us, we must receive him joyfully: "Lift up your heads, O ye gates." We may well receive him joyfully who brings all good along with him; and when he takes possession of the soul, opens springs of joy there which shall flow to eternity. How often has Christ said to us, "Open to me," when we have, with the spouse, made excuses, Cant. v. 2, 3. Zacchæus' forwardness to receive Christ will shame us. We have not now Christ to entertain in our houses, but we have his disciples; and what is done to them he takes as done to himself.

Fourthly. The offence which the people took at this kind greeting between Christ and Zacchæus. Those narrow-souled, censorious Jews "murmured, saying, that he was gone to be a guest with a man that is a sinner;" καὶ διαμαρτυροῦντο αὐτῷ,—"with a sinful man." And were not they themselves sinful men? Was it not Christ's errand into the world to seek and save men that are sinners? But Zacchæus they think to be a sinner above all men that dwell in Jericho; such a sinner as was not fit to be conversed with.

Now this was very unjust, to blame Christ for going to his house; for, 1. Though he was a publican, and many of the publicans were ill men, it did not therefore follow that they were all so. We must take heed of condemning men in the lump, or by common fame, for at God's bar every man will be judged as he is. 2. Though he had been a sinner, it did not therefore follow that he was now as bad as he had been; though they knew his past life to be bad, Christ might know his present frame to be good. God allows room for repentance, and so must we. 3. Though he was now a sinner, they ought not to blame Christ for going to him, because he was in no danger of getting hurt by a sinner, but in great hopes of doing good to a sinner. Whether should the physician go, but to the sick? Yet see how that which is well done may be ill construed.

Fifthly. The proofs which Zacchæus gave publicly, that though he had been a sinner, he was now a penitent, and a true convert, ver. 8. He doth not expect to be justified by his works, as the Pharisee, who boasted of what he had done; but by his good works he will, through the grace of God, evidence the sincerity of his faith and repentance; and here he declares what his determination was. He makes this declaration standing, that he might be seen and heard by those who murmured at Christ for coming to his house; with the mouth confession is made of repentance as well as faith. He stood, which notes his saying "I" deliberately, and with solemnity, in the nature of a vow to God. He addressed himself to Christ in it, not to the people—they were not to be his judges,—but to the Lord; and he stands as it were at his bar. What we do that is good, we must do as unto him; we must appeal to him, and approve ourselves to him in our integrity, in all our good purposes and resolutions. He makes it appear that there is a change in his heart, and that is repentance, for there is a change in his way.

His resolutions are of second table duties; for Christ upon all occasions laid great stress on them; and they are such as are suited to his condition and character, for in them will best appear the truth of our repentance.

1. Zacchæus had a good estate, and whereas he had been in it hitherto laying up treasure for himself, and doing hurt to himself, now he resolves that for the future he will be all towards God, and do good to others with it: "Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor;" not, I will give it, by my will when I die, but I do give it now. Probably he had heard of the command or trial Christ gave to another rich man, to sell what he had and give to the poor, Mat. xix. 21, and how he broke with Christ upon it. "But so will not I," saith Zacchæus; "I agree to it at the first word; though hitherto I have been uncharitable to the poor, now I will relieve them, and give so much the more for having neglected the duty so long, even the half of my goods, which is a very large proportion, to be set apart for works of piety and charity. The Jews used to say that a fifth part of a man's income yearly was very fair to be given to pious uses; and about that share the law directed; but Zacchæus would go farther, and give the one moiety to the poor; which would oblige him to retrench all his extravagant expenses, as his retrenching those would enable him to relieve many with his superfluities. If we were but more temperate and self-denying, we should be more charitable; and were we content with less ourselves, we should have the more to give to them that need. This he mentions here as a fruit of his repentance. Note, It well becomes converts to God to be charitable to the poor."

2. Zacchæus was conscious to himself that he had not gotten all he had honestly and fairly, but some by indirect and unlawful means; and of what he had gotten by such means he promiseth to make restitution: "If I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation," or, "if I have wronged any man in the way of my business as a publican, exacting more than was appointed, I do promise to restore him fourfold," the restitution that a thief was to make, Ex. xxii. 1. 1st. He seems plainly to own that he had done wrong; his office as a publican gave him opportunity to do wrong, of imposing upon the merchants to curry favour with the government. True penitents will own themselves not only in general guilty before God, but will particularly reflect upon that which has been their own iniquity, and which, by reason of their business and employment in the world, has most easily beset them. 2nd. That he had done wrong by false accusation. This was the temptation of the publicans, which John Baptist had warned them of particularly, Lu. iii. 14. They had the ear of the government, and every thing would be stretched in favour of the revenue; which gave them an opportunity of gratifying their revenge, if they bore a man an ill-will. 3rd. He promiseth to restore fourfold, as far as he could recollect, or find by his books, that he had wronged any man. He doth not say, If I be sued, and compelled to it, I will make restitution; some are honest when they cannot help it; but he will do it voluntarily; it shall be my own act and deed. Note, Those who are convinced of having done wrong, cannot evidence the sincerity of their repentance but by making restitution. Observe, he doth not think his giving half his estate to the poor will atone for the wrong he has done; God hates robbery by burnt-offerings; and we must first do justly, and then love mercy. It is no charity, but hypocrisy, to give that which is none of our own; and we are not to reckon that our own which we have not come honestly by; nor that our own which is not so, when all our debts are paid, and restitution made for wrong done.

Sixthly. Christ's approbation and acceptance of Zacchæus' conversion, by which also he cleared himself from any imputation in going to be a guest with him, ver. 9, 10.

1. Zacchæus is declared to be now a happy man; now he is turned from sin to God, now he has bid Christ welcome to his house, and has become an honest, charitable, good man: "This day is salvation come to this house." Now he is converted, he is in effect saved; saved from his sins, from the guilt of them, from the power of them; all the benefits of salvation are his; Christ is come to his house, and where Christ comes he brings salvation along with him; he is and will be the Author of eternal salvation to all that own him, as Zacchæus did. Yet this is not all; salvation this day comes to his house, 1st. When Zacchæus becomes a convert, he will be, more than he had been, a blessing to his house. He will bring the means of grace and salvation to his house; for he is a son of Abraham indeed now; and therefore, like Abraham, will teach his household to keep the way of the Lord. "He that is greedy of gain troubleth his own house," and brings a curse upon it, Hab. ii. 9; but he that is charitable to the poor doth a kindness to his own house, and brings a blessing upon it, and salvation to it, temporal at least, Ps. cxii. 3. 2nd. When Zacchæus is brought to Christ himself, his family also became related to Christ, and his children are admitted members of his church, and so "salvation comes to his house, for that he is a son of Abraham," and therefore interested in God's covenant with Abraham, that blessing of Abraham which comes upon the publicans, upon the Gentiles through faith, that God will be a God to them and to their children; and therefore, when he believes, salvation comes to his house, as to the jailor's, to whom it was said, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thine house," Acts xvi. 31. Zacchæus is by birth a son of Abraham, but being a publican he was deemed a heathen; they are put upon a level, Mat. xviii. 17, and as such the Jews were shy of conversing with him, and expected Christ should be so; but he shews that, being a true penitent, he is become rectus in curia,—"upright in court;" as good a son of Abraham as if he had never been a publican, which therefore ought not to be mentioned against him.

2. What Christ had done to make him in particular a happy man, was consonant to the great design and intention of his coming into the world, ver. 10; with the same argument he had before justified his conversing with publicans, Mat. ix. 13; there he pleaded that he came to call sinners to repentance; now, that he came "to seek and save that which was lost;" τὸ ἀπολωλός,—"the lost thing." Observe, 1st. The deplorable case of the sons of men; they were lost; but here the whole race of mankind is spoken of as one body. Note, The whole world of mankind by the fall is become a lost world. Lost, as a city is lost when it has revolted to the rebels; as a traveller is lost when he has missed his way in a wilderness; lost, as a sick man is lost when his disease is incurable; or, as a prisoner is lost when sentence is passed upon him. 2nd. The gracious design of the Son of God; he came to seek and save, to seek in order to saving. He came from heaven to earth (a long journey!) to seek that which was lost, that is, which had wandered and gone astray, and to bring it back, Mat. xviii. 11, 12; and to save that which was lost, that is, which was perishing; and in a manner destroyed and cut off. Christ undertook the cause when it was given up for lost; undertook to bring those to themselves that were lost to God and all goodness. Observe, Christ came into this lost world to seek and save it. His design was to save, when there was not salvation in any other; and in prosecution of that design he sought, took all probable means, to effect that salvation. He seeks those that were not worth seeking to; he seeks to those that sought him not, and asked not for him, as to Zacchæus here.

11 And as they heard these things, he added and spake a parable, because he was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear. 12 He said therefore, A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return. 13 And he called his ten servants, and delivered them ten pounds, and said unto them, Occupy till I come. 14 But his citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us. 15 And it came to pass, that when he was returned, having received the kingdom, then he commanded these servants to be called unto him, to whom he had given the money, that he might know how much every man had gained by trading. 16 Then came the first, saying, Lord, thy pound hath gained ten pounds. 17 And he said unto him, Well, thou good servant: because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities. 18 And the second came, saying, Lord, thy pound hath gained five pounds. 19 And he said likewise to him, Be thou also over five cities. 20 And another came, saying, Lord, behold, here is thy pound, which I have kept laid up in a napkin: 21 For I feared thee, because thou art an austere man: thou takest up that thou layedst not down, and reapest that thou didst not sow. 22 And he saith unto him, Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant. Thou knewest that I was an austere man, taking up that I laid not down, and reaping that I contradictory. In this place we can only say that modern critics are as divided in opinion as the older ones. There is apparently a growing disposition to own that the difficulty remains unsolved, and one or two critics quote Chrysostom's saying, "This very thing is the greatest evidence of their truth: for if they had exactly agreed in all things, none of our enemies would have believed that they did not write what they wrote after coming together by some human arrangement." (See Note on chap. xix. 5, 6.)

xix. 2. Zacchæus was a chief publican—i.e., he was at the head of the department in that division, and the ordinary publicans or tax-collectors were accountable to him, as he was to the Roman authorities. Zacchæus was not "the chief among the publicans," as our version says, in imitation of the Latin Vulgate. There would be many similar officers, one for each district. As superintendent of the Jericho collection, Zacchæus probably had unusual opportunities of enriching himself, because the district was fertile, and its produc-

did not sow: 23 Wherefore then gavest not thou my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury? 24 And he said unto them that stood by, Take from him the pound, and give it to him that hath ten pounds. 25 (And they said unto him, Lord, he hath ten pounds.) 26 For I say unto you, That unto every one which hath shall be given; and from him that hath not, even that he hath shall be taken away from him. 27 But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me.

Our Lord Jesus is now upon his way to Jerusalem to his last passover, when he was to suffer and die. Now here we are told:

I. How the expectations of his friends were raised upon this occasion; "they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear," ver. 11. The Pharisees expected it about this time, ch. xvii. 20; and it seems so did Christ's own disciples; but they both had a mistaken notion of it. The Pharisees thought it must be introduced by some other temporal prince or potentate; the disciples thought their Master should introduce it, but with temporal pomp and power, which with the power he had to work miracles, they knew he could clothe himself with in a short time, whenever he pleased. Jerusalem they concluded must be the seat of his kingdom; and therefore, now he is going directly thither, they doubt not but in a little time to see him upon the throne there. Note, Even good men are subject to mistakes concerning the kingdom of Christ, and to form wrong notions of it, and are ready to think that should immediately appear, which is reserved for hereafter.

II. How their expectations were checked, and the mistakes rectified upon which they were founded; and this he doth in three things:

First. They expected that he should appear in his glory now presently; but he tells them he must not be publicly installed in his kingdom of a great while yet; he is like "a certain nobleman," ἀνθρώπος τις εὐγενής,—"a certain man of high birth," so Dr. Hammond, for he is the Lord from heaven, and is entitled by birth to the kingdom; but he goes "into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom." Christ must go to heaven to sit down at the right hand of the Father there, and to receive from him honour and glory, before the Spirit was poured out, by which his kingdom was to be set up on earth, and before a church was to be set up for him in the Gentile world; he must receive the kingdom, "and then return." Christ returned when the Spirit was poured out—when Jerusalem was destroyed; by which time that generation, both of friends and enemies, which he had personally conversed with, was wholly worn off by death, and gone to give up their account: but his chief return here meant, is that at the great day, which we are yet in expectation of. That which they thought should immediately appear, Christ tells them will not appear, till this same Jesus, which is taken into heaven, shall in like manner come again: see Acts i. 11.

Secondly. They expected that his apostles and immediate attendants should be advanced to dignity and honour; that they should all be made princes and peers, privy councillors and judges, and have all the pomp and preferments of the court, and of the town; but Christ here tells them, that instead of that he designed them to be men of business; they must expect no other preferment in this world, but that of the trading end of the town. He would set them up with a stock under their hands, that they might employ it and themselves in serving him, and the interest of his kingdom among men. That is the true honour of a Christian and a minister; which, if we be, as we ought to be, truly ambitious of, we shall be able to look upon all temporal honours with a holy contempt. The apostles had dreamed of sitting on his right hand and on his left, in his kingdom, enjoying ease after their present toil, and honour after the present contempt put upon them, and were pleasing themselves with this dream; but Christ tells them that which, if they understood it aright, would fill them with care and concern, and serious thoughts, instead of those aspiring ones they filled their heads with.

1. They have a great work to do now; their Master leaves them to receive his kingdom, and at parting he gives each of them a pound, which the margin of our common Bibles tells us amounts in our money to three pounds and half a crown; this signifies the same thing with the talents in the parable that is parallel to this, Mat. xxv.; all the gifts with which Christ's apostles were endued, and the advantages and capacities they had of serving the interests of Christ in the world, and others, both ministers and Christians, like them, in a lower degree; but perhaps it is in the parable thus represented to make them the more humble. Their honour in this world is only that of traders, and that not of topping merchants, that have vast stocks to begin upon, but that of poor traders, that must take a great deal of care and pains to make any thing of what they have.

He gave these pounds to his servants, not to buy rich liveries, much less robes, and a splendid equipage for themselves to appear in, as they expected, but with this charge, "Occupy till I come," or, as it might much better be translated, "Trade till I come," παραμάτευσαθε,—"be busy," so the word properly signifies: you are sent forth to preach the Gospel, to set up a church for Christ in the world, to bring the nations to the obedience of faith, and to build them up in it: "ye shall receive power" to do this, for ye shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, Acts i. 8. When Christ breathed on the eleven disciples, saying, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," then he delivered them ten pounds; 'Now,' saith he, 'mind your business, and make a business of it; set about it in good earnest, and stick to it; lay out yourselves to do all the good you can to the souls of men, and to gather them in to Christ.' Note, 1st. All Christians have business to do for Christ in this world, and ministers especially: the one was not baptized, nor the other ordained, to be idle. 2nd. Those that are called to business for Christ, he furnisheth with gifts necessary for their business; and on the other hand, those to whom he gives power, from them he expects service. He delivers the pounds with this charge, Go work, go trade. "The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal," 1 Cor. xii. 7; and "as every one has received the gift, so let him minister the same," 1 Pet. iv. 10. 3rd. We must continue to mind our business till our Master comes, whatever difficulties or oppositions we may meet with in it; those only that endure to the end shall be saved.

2. They have a great account to make shortly. These servants are called to him, to shew what use they made of the gifts they were dignified with, what service they had done to Christ, and what good to the souls of men, "that he might know what every man had gained by trading." Note, 1st. They that trade diligently and faithfully in the service of Christ shall be gainers; we cannot say so of the business of the world; many a labouring tradesman has been a loser; but those that trade for Christ shall be gainers: though Israel be not gathered, yet they will be glorious. 2nd. The conversion of souls is the winning of them; every true convert is clear gain to Jesus Christ. Ministers are but factors for him, and to him they must give account what fish they have enclosed in the Gospel net, what guests they have prevailed with to come to the wedding supper, that is, what they have gained by trading. Now in the account given up, observe,

First. The good account which was given by some of the servants, and the master's approbation of them. Two such are instanced, ver. 16–19.

1st. They had both made considerable improvements, but not both alike, one had gained ten pounds by his trading, and another five. Those that are diligent and faithful in serving Christ, are commonly blessed in being made blessings to the places where they live. They shall see the travail of their soul, and not labour in vain. And yet all that are alike faithful are not alike successful. And perhaps though they were both faithful, it is intimated that one of them took more pains, and applied himself more closely to his business than the other, and sped accordingly. Blessed Paul sure was this servant that gained ten pounds, double to what any of the rest did, for he "laboured more abundantly than they all," and fully preached the Gospel of Christ.

2nd. They both acknowledged their obligations to their master for intrusting them with these abilities and opportunities to do him service: Lord, it is not my industry, but thy pound, that has gained ten pounds. Note, God must have all the glory of all our gains; not unto us, but unto him must be the praises, Ps. cxv. 1. Paul, who gained the ten pounds, acknowledges, "I laboured, yet not I," "by the grace of God, I am what I am," and do what I do, "and his grace was not in vain," 1 Cor. xv. 10; and will not speak of what he had done, but of what God had done by him, Rom. xv. 18.

3rd. They were both commended for their fidelity and industry; "Well done, thou good servant," ver. 17; and to the other he said likewise, ver. 19. Note, They who do that which is good, shall have praise of the same. Do well, and Christ will say to thee, Well done; and if he saith, Well done, the matter is not great who saith otherwise: see Gen. iv. 7.

4th. They were preferred in proportion to the improvement they had made. "Because thou hast been faithful in a very little," and didst not say, As good still as go to trade with one pound; what can one do with so small a stock? but didst humbly and honestly apply thyself to the improvement of that,—"Have thou authority over ten cities." Note, Those are in a fair way to rise who are content to begin low: "He that has used the office of a deacon well, purchaseth to himself a good degree," 1 Tim. iii. 13. Two things are hereby promised the apostles: First, That when they have taken pains to plant many churches, they shall have the satisfaction and honour of presiding in them, and governing among them; they shall have great respect paid them, and have a great interest in the love and esteem of good Christians: "He that keepeth the fig tree shall eat the fruit thereof," and "he that laboureth in the Word and doctrine shall be counted worthy of double honour." Secondly. That when they have served their generation according to the will of Christ, though they pass through this world despised and trampled upon, and perhaps pass out of it under disgrace and persecution, as the apostles did, yet in the other world they shall reign as kings, with Christ; shall sit with him on his throne; shall have power over the nations, Rev. ii. 26. The happiness of heaven will be a much greater advancement to a good minister or Christian than it would be to a poor tradesman, that with much ado had cleared ten pounds, to be made governor of ten cities. He that had gained but five pounds, had dominion over five cities. This intimates that there are degrees of glory in heaven; every vessel will be alike full, but not alike large. And the degrees of glory there will be according to the degrees of usefulness here.

Secondly. The bad account that was given by one of them, and the sentence passed upon him for his slothfulness and unfaithfulness, ver. 20, &c.

1st. He owned that he had not traded with the pound with which he had been intrusted, ver. 20: "Lord, behold, here is thy pound." It is true I have not made it more, but withal I have not made it less; "I have kept it" safe, "laid up in a napkin." This represents the carelessness of those who have gifts, but never lay out themselves to do good with them; it is all one to them whether the interests of Christ's kingdom sink or swim, go backward or forward; for their parts they will take no care about it, no pains, be at no expense, run no hazard; those are the servants that lay up their pound in a napkin; who think it is enough to say, they have done no hurt in the world, but did no good.

2nd. He justified himself in his omission, with a plea that made the matter worse, and not better, ver. 21: "I feared thee, because thou art an austere man," rigid and severe, ἀνθρώπος αυστηρός εἰ; austere is the Greek word itself; a sharp man; "thou takest up that thou laidst not down." He thought his master put a hardship upon his servants, when he required and expected the improvement of their pounds, that it was reaping where he did not sow; whereas really it was reaping where he had sown, and, as the husbandman expects, in proportion to what he had sown. He had no reason to fear his master's austerity, nor blame his expectations; but this was a mere sham; a frivolous, groundless excuse for his idleness, which there was no manner of colour for. Note, The pleas of slothful professors, when they come to be examined, will be found more to their shame than in their justification.

3rd. His excuse is turned upon him, ver. 22 "Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant." He will be condemned by his crime, but self-condemned by his plea. If thou didst look upon it as hard that I should expect the profits of thy trading, which would have been the greater profit, yet if thou hadst had any regard to my interest, thou mightest have put it into the bank, into some of the funds, that I might have had not only mine own, but "mine own with usury;" which, though a less advantage, would have been some. If he durst not trade for fear of losing the principal, and so being made accountable to his lord for it, though it was lost, which he pretends, yet that would be no excuse for his not setting it out to interest, where it would be sure. Note, Whatever may be the pretences of slothful professors in excuse of their slothfulness, the true reason of it is a reigning indifference to the interests of Christ and his kingdom, and their coldness therein. They care not whether religion gets ground or loses ground, so they can but live at ease.

4th. His pound is taken from him, ver. 24. It is fit those should lose their gifts, that will not use their gifts; and those who have dealt falsely, should be no longer trusted. Those that will not serve their master with what he bestows upon them, why should they be suffered to serve themselves with it? "Take from him the pound."

5th. It is given to him that had got the ten pounds. And when this was objected against by the standers-by, because he had so much already, "Lord, he has ten pounds," ver. 25, it is answered, ver. 26, "Unto every one that hath shall be given." It is the rule of justice, First. That those should be most encouraged that have been most industrious, and that those who have laid tions included valuable commodities—e.g., the balm or balsam of Gilead, then only grown in that locality.

xix. 4. We have already pointed out the difference between the sycamore, or fig-mulberry, and the sycamine, or simple mulberry-tree (see Note on chap. xvii. 6). From references contained in Jewish writers, we learn that the sycamore flourished near Jericho, though not now found there.

xix. 5, 6. From these verses we may infer that our Lord re-entered xix. 8. "If I have taken anything," &c., is an expression which implies, not doubt, but a confession that extortion had been practised by him. The word rendered "taken by false accusation" originally described the conduct of those informers who reported persons that exported figs from Athens contrary to the law. Hence it came to be used contemptuously of false accusation, fraud, and extortion.

out themselves most to do good, should have their opportunities of doing good enlarged, and be put into a higher and more extensive sphere of usefulness: to him that hath gotten shall more be given, that he may be in a capacity to get more. Secondly. That those who have their gifts as if they had them not, that have them to no purpose, that do no good with them, should be deprived of them. Those that endeavour to increase the grace they have, God will increase it; those that neglect it, and suffer it to decline, can expect no other but that God should do so too. This needful warning Christ gives to his disciples, lest while they were gazing for honours on earth they should neglect their business, and so come short of their happiness in heaven.

Thirdly. Another thing they expected was, that when the kingdom of God should appear, the body of the Jewish nation should immediately fall in with it and submit to it, and all their aversions to Christ and his Gospel should immediately vanish; but Christ tells them, that after his departure the generality of them would persist in their obstinacy and rebellion, and it would be their ruin. This is shewed here,

1. In the message which his citizens sent after him, ver. 14. They not only opposed him while he was in obscurity, but when he was gone in glory to be invested in his kingdom, then they continued their enmity to him, protested against his dominion, and said, "We will not have this man to reign over us." 1st. This was fulfilled in the prevailing infidelity of the Jews after the ascension of Christ, and the setting up of the gospel kingdom; they would not submit their necks to his yoke, nor touch the top of his golden sceptre. They said, "Let us break his bands in sunder," Ps. ii. 1-3; Acts iv. 26. 2nd. It speaks the language of all unbelievers; they could be content that Christ should save them, but they will not have him to reign over them; whereas Christ is a Saviour to those only to whom he is a prince, and who are willing to obey him.

2. In the sentence passed upon them at his return, ver. 27: "Those mine enemies, bring hither." When his faithful subjects are preferred and rewarded, then he will take vengeance on his enemies; and particularly of the Jewish nation, the doom of which is here read. When Christ had set up his gospel kingdom, and thereby put reputation upon the gospel ministry, then he comes to reckon with the Jews; then it is remembered against them that they had particularly disclaimed and protested against his kingly office, when they say, "We have no king but Cæsar," nor would own him for their king; they appealed to Cæsar, and to Cæsar they shall go; Cæsar shall be their ruin. Then the kingdom of God appeared, when vengeance was taken on those irreconcilable enemies to Christ and his government; they were brought forth and slain before him. Never was so much slaughter made in any war as in the wars of the Jews. That nation lived to see Christianity victorious in the Gentile world, in spite of their enmity and opposition to it, and then it was taken away as dross. The wrath of Christ came upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thes. ii. 25, 26; and their destruction redounded very much to the honour of Christ, and the peace of the church. But this is applicable to all others who persist in their infidelity, and will undoubtedly perish in it. Note, 1st. Utter ruin will certainly be the portion of all Christ's enemies; in the day of vengeance they shall all be brought forth and slain before him: "Bring them hither," to be made a spectacle to saints and angels: see Jos. x. 22, 24. "Bring them hither," that they may see the glory and happiness of Christ and his followers, whom they hated and persecuted. "Bring them hither," to have their frivolous pleas overruled, and to receive sentence according to their merits. Bring them "and slay them before me," as Agag before Samuel. The Saviour whom they have slighted, will stand by and see them slain, and not interpose on their behalf. 2nd. Those that will not have Christ to reign over them, shall be reputed and dealt with as his enemies. We are ready to think none are Christ's enemies but persecutors of Christianity, or scoffers at least; but you see those will be accounted so that dislike the terms of salvation, will not submit to Christ's yoke, but will be their own masters. Note, Whoever will not be ruled by the grace of Christ, will inevitably be ruined by the wrath of Christ.

28 And when he had thus spoken, he went before, ascending up to Jerusalem. 29 And it came to pass, when he was come nigh to Bethphage and Bethany, at the mount called the mount of Olives, he sent two of his disciples, 30 Saying, Go ye into the village over against you; in the which at your entering ye shall find a colt tied, whereon yet never man sat: loose him, and bring him hither. 31 And if any man ask you, Why do ye loose him? thus shall ye say unto him, Because the Lord hath need of him. 32 And they that were sent went their way, and found even as he had said unto them. 33 And as they were loosing the colt, the owners thereof said unto them, Why loose ye the colt? 34 And they said, The Lord hath need of him. 35 And they brought him to Jesus: and they cast their garments upon the colt, and they set Jesus thereon. 36 And as he went, they spread their clothes in the way. 37 And when he was come nigh, even now at the descent of the mount of Olives, the whole multitude of the disciples began to rejoice and praise God with a loud voice for all the mighty works that they had seen; 38 Saying, Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord: peace in heaven, and glory in the highest. 39 And some of the Pharisees from among the multitude said unto him, Master, rebuke thy disciples. 40 And he answered and said unto them, I tell you that, if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out.

We have here the same account of Christ's riding in some sort of triumph (such as it was) into Jerusalem, which we had before in Matthew and Mark; let us therefore here only observe,

I. That Jesus Christ was forward and willing to suffer and die for us. He went forward "bound in the spirit to Jerusalem," knowing very well the things that should befall him there; and yet "he went before, ascending up to Jerusalem," ver. 28. He was the foremost of the company, as if he longed to be upon the spot,—longed to engage,—to take the field,—and to enter upon action. Was he so forward to suffer and die for us, and shall we draw back from any service we are capable of doing for him?

II. It was no ways inconsistent, either with Christ's humility, or with his present state of humiliation, to make a public entry into Jerusalem a little before he died. Thus he made himself to be the more taken notice of, that the ignominy of his death might appear the greater.

III. Christ is entitled to a dominion over all the creatures, and may use them when and as he pleaseth. No man has a property in his estate against Christ, but that his title is prior and superior. Christ sent to fetch an ass and her colt from their owner's and master's crib, when he had occasion for their service; and might do so, for all the beasts of the forests are his, and the tame beasts too.

IV. Christ has all men's hearts, both under his eye and in his hand. He could influence those to whom the ass and the colt belonged to consent to their taking them away, as soon as they were told the Lord had occasion for them.

V. Those that go on Christ's errands are sure to speed, ver. 32; "they that were sent found" what he told them they should find, and the owners willing to part with them. It is a comfort to Christ's messengers that what they are sent for, if indeed the Lord has occasion for it, they shall bring it.

VI. The disciples of Christ, no fetch that for him from others which he has occasion for, and which they have not, should not think that enough; but whatever they have themselves, wherewith he may be served and honoured, they should be ready to serve him with it. Many can be willing to attend Christ at other people's expense, that care not at being at any charge upon him themselves; but those disciples not only fetched the ass colt for him, but "cast their own garments upon the colt," and were willing those should be used for his trappings.

VII. Christ's triumphs are the matter of his disciples' praises. When Christ came nigh to Jerusalem, God put it of a sudden into the hearts of "the whole multitude of the disciples," not to the twelve only, but abundance more that were disciples at large—"to rejoice and praise God," ver. 37; and their spreading "their clothes in the way," ver. 36, was a common expression of joy, as at the feast of tabernacles. Observe, 1. What was the matter or occasion of their joy and praise; they praised God "for all the mighty works they had seen," all the miracles Christ had wrought, especially the raising of Lazarus, which is particularly mentioned, Jno. xii. 17, 18; that brought others to mind, for fresh miracles and mercies should revive the remembrance of the former. 2. How they expressed their joy and praise, ver. 38: "Blessed be the King that comes in the name of the Lord." Christ is the king; he comes in the name of the Lord, clothed with a Divine authority, commissioned from Heaven to give law, and treat of peace; blessed be he. Let us praise him, let God prosper him, He is blessed for ever, and we will speak well of him. "Peace in heaven," that is, let the God of heaven send peace and success to his undertaking, and then there will be "glory in the highest." It will redound to the glory of the most high God; and the angels, the glorious inhabitants of the upper world, will give him the glory of it. Compare this song of the saints on earth with that of the angels, ch. ii. 14; they both agree to give glory to God in the highest; there the praises of both centre; the angels say, "On earth peace," rejoicing in the benefit which men on earth have by Christ; the saints say, "Peace in heaven," rejoicing in the benefit which the angels have by Christ. Such is the communion we have with the holy angels, that as they rejoice in the peace on earth, so we rejoice in the peace in heaven, the peace God makes in his high places, Job xxv. 2; and both in Christ, "who hath reconciled all things to himself, whether things on earth or things in heaven."

VIII. Christ's triumphs, and his disciples' joyful praises of them, are the vexation of proud Pharisees, and are enemies to him and his kingdom. There were some Pharisees among the multitude that were so far from joining with them, that they were enraged at them; and Christ being a famous example of humility, they thought he would not admit such acclamations as these; and therefore expected that he should rebuke his disciples, ver. 39; but it is the honour of Christ that as he despiseth the contempt of the proud, so he accepts the praises of the humble.

IX. Whether men praise Christ or no, he will and shall and must be praised, ver. 40: "If these should hold their peace," and not speak the praises of the Messiah's kingdom, "the stones would immediately cry out," rather than that Christ should not be praised; which was in effect literally fulfilled, when upon men's reviling Christ upon the cross, instead of praising him, and his own disciples sinking into a profound silence, "the earth did quake, and the rocks rent." Pharisees would silence the praises of Christ; but they cannot gain their point; for as God can "out of stones raise up children unto Abraham," so he can out of the mouths of those children perfect praise.

41 And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it, 42 Saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes. 43 For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, 44 And shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not

xix. 12. T. H. Horne is of opinion that this parable "alludes to a case which no long time before had actually occurred in Judea. Those who, by hereditary succession or by interest, had pretensions to the Jewish throne, travelled to Rome in order to have it confirmed to them." This happened in the instance of Herod the Great, who went to Rome to receive the kingdom from Antony, and then to Rhodes to obtain confirmation from Cæsar. Archelaus, the son and successor of Herod, did much the same. Similar examples could be adduced, showing that our Lord drew his illustration from recognised customs.

xix. 13. The word for "pound" is mina, or mina, and denotes the sixtieth part of a talent, or perhaps about three guineas English money.

xix. 20. To this day an Oriental will wrap up and lay by anything valuable in a napkin, and Jewish writers show that money was so kept.

leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation. 45 And he went into the temple, and began to cast out them that sold therein, and them that bought; 46 Saying unto them, It is written, My house is the house of prayer: but ye have made it a den of thieves. 47 And he taught daily in the temple. But the chief priests and the scribes and the chief of the people sought to destroy him, 48 And could not find what they might do: for all the people were very attentive to hear him.

ROMAN MEDALS.—"JUDAEA CAPTA."

The great Ambassador from heaven is here making his public entry into Jerusalem, not to be respected there, but to be rejected; he knew what a nest of vipers he was throwing himself into; and yet see here two instances of his love to that place, and his concern for it.

First. The tears he shed for the approaching ruin of the city, ver. 41; "when he was come near, he beheld the city and wept over it." Probably it was when he was coming down the descent of the hill from the mount of Olives, where he had a full view of the city, the large extent of it, and the many stately structures in it, and his eye affected his heart, and his heart his eye again. See here, 1. What a tender spirit Christ was of; we never read that he laughed, but we often find him in tears. In this very place his father David wept, and those that were with him, though he and they were men of war. There are cases in which it is no disparagement to the stoutest of men to melt into tears. 2. That Jesus Christ wept in the midst of his triumphs, wept when all about him were rejoicing, to shew how little he was elevated with the applause and acclamation of the people. Thus he would teach us to rejoice with trembling, and as though we rejoice not. If Providence do not stain the beauty of our triumphs, we may ourselves see cause to sully it with our sorrows. 3. That he wept over Jerusalem. Note, There are cities to be wept over, and none to be more lamented than Jerusalem—that had been the holy city, and the joy of the whole earth—if it be degenerated. But why did Christ weep at the sight of Jerusalem? was it because yonder is the city in which I must be betrayed and bound, scourged and spit upon, condemned and crucified? No, he himself gives us the reason of his tears.

1st. Jerusalem has not improved the day of her opportunities. He wept, and said, "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day,"—if thou wouldst but yet know, while the Gospel is preached to thee, and salvation offered thee by it,—if thou wouldst at length bethink thyself, and understand "the things that belong to thy peace," the making of thy peace with God, and the securing of thine own spiritual and eternal welfare; but thou dost not know the day of thy visitation, ver. 44. The manner of speaking is abrupt; "If thou hadst known." "O that thou hadst," so some take it; like that, "O that my people had hearkened unto me," Ps. lxxxi. 13; Isa. xlviii. 18. Or, "If thou hadst known," well; like that of the fig tree, ch. xiii. 9; how happy had it been for thee. Or, "If thou hadst known," thou wouldst have wept for thyself, and I should have no occasion to weep for thee, but should have rejoiced rather; but what he saith lays all the blame of Jerusalem's impending ruin upon herself. Note, First. There are things that belong to our peace, which we are all concerned to know and understand; the way how peace is made, the offers made of peace, the terms on which we may have the benefit of peace. The things that belong to our peace are those things that relate to our present and future welfare; these we must know with application. Secondly. There is a time of visitation, when those things which belong to our peace may be known by us, and known to good purpose. When we enjoy the means of grace in great plenty, as powerfully preached to us, when the Spirit strives with us, and our own consciences are startled and awakened, then is the time of visitation, which we are concerned to improve. Thirdly. Those that have long neglected the time of their visitation, if at length, if at last, in this thy day, their eyes be opened, and they bethink themselves, all will be well yet. Those shall not be refused that come into the vineyard at the eleventh hour. Fourthly. It is the amazing folly of multitudes that enjoy the means of grace, and it will be of fatal consequence to them, that they do not improve the day of their opportunities. The things of their peace are revealed to them, but are not minded or regarded by them; they hide their eyes from them, as if they were not worth taking notice of. They are not aware of the accepted time, and the day of salvation, and so let it slip, and perish through mere carelessness. None so blind as those that

xix. 21. The word "austere" in this verse and in verse 22 signifies "harsh," in much the same sense as we use the term of a man's character.

xix. 27. This is a passage which the sceptics of our time quote as if it was a precept spoken by Jesus. It requires no acuteness to perceive that the language forms part of the parable, and is put into the mouth of the prince who is speaking to his servants. The actual allusion is to verse 14. and therefore the "enemies" are those who will not see, nor have any the things of their peace more certainly hid from their eyes than those that turn their back upon them. Fifthly. The sin and folly of those that persist in a contempt of gospel grace is a great grief to the Lord Jesus, and should be so to us. He looks with weeping eyes upon lost souls, that continue impenitent, and run headlong upon their own ruin; he had rather they would turn and live, than go and die, for he is not willing any should perish.

2nd. Jerusalem cannot escape the day of her desolation. The things of her peace are now in a manner hid from her eyes; they will be shortly: not but that after this the Gospel was preached to them by the apostles, all the house of Israel were called to know assuredly that Christ was their peace, Acts ii. 36 and multitudes were convinced and converted. But as to the body of the nation, and the leading part of it, it was sealed up under unbelief; God had given them the spirit of slumber, Rom. ii. 8. They were so prejudiced and enraged against the Gospel, and those few that did embrace it then, that nothing less than a miracle of Divine grace (like that which converted Paul) would work upon them; and it could not be expected such a miracle should be wrought, and so they were justly given up to judicial blindness and hardness. The peaceful things are not hid from the eyes of particular persons; but it is too late to think now of the nation of the Jews, as such, becoming a Christian nation, by embracing Christ. And therefore they are marked for ruin, which Christ here foresees and foretels, as the certain consequence of their rejecting Christ. Note, Neglecting the great salvation often brings temporal judgments upon a people; it did so upon Jerusalem in less than forty years after this, when all that Christ here foretold was exactly fulfilled. First. The Romans besieged the city, cast a trench about it, compassed it round, and kept the inhabitants in on every side. Josephus relates that Titus ran up a wall in a very short time, which surrounded the city, and cut off all hopes of escaping. Secondly. They laid it even with the ground. Titus commanded his soldiers to dig up the city, and the whole compass of it was levelled, except three towers: see Josephus' History of the Wars of the Jews, lib. v. cap. 27; lib. vii. cap. 1. Not only the city, but the citizens, were laid even with the ground, "thy children within thee," by the cruel slaughters that were made of them; and there was scarce one stone left upon another. This was for their crucifying Christ, this was because they knew not the day of their visitation. Let other cities and nations take warning.

Secondly. The zeal he shewed for the present purifying of the temple. Though it must be destroyed ere long, it doth not therefore follow that no care must be taken of it in the mean time.

1. Christ cleared it of those who profaned it. He went straight to the temple, and "began to cast out the buyers and sellers," ver. 45; hereby (though he was represented as an enemy to the temple, and that was the crime laid to his charge before the high priest,) he made it to appear that he had a truer love for the temple than they had, who had such a veneration for its Corban, its treasury, as a sacred thing; for its purity was more its glory than its wealth was. Christ gave a reason for his dislodging the temple merchants, ver. 46. The temple is a house of prayer, set apart for communion with God. The buyers and sellers made it a den of thieves, by the fraudulent bargains they made there; which was by no means to be suffered, for it would be a distraction to those who came there to pray.

2. He put it to the best use that ever it was put to, for he "taught daily in the temple," ver. 47. Note, It is not enough that the corruptions of a church be purged out, but the preaching of the Gospel must be encouraged. Now when Christ preached in the temple, observe here, 1st. How spiteful the church rulers were against him; how industrious to seek an opportunity, or pretence rather, to do him a mischief, ver. 47: "The chief priests and scribes and the chief of the people," that is, the great Sanhedrim, that should have attended him, and summoned the people too to attend him, they "sought to destroy him," and put him to death. 2nd. How respectful the common people were to him: they "were very attentive to hear him;" he spent most of his time in the country, and did not then preach in the temple; but when he did, the people paid him great respect, attended on his preaching with diligence, and let no opportunity slip of hearing him; attended to it with care, and would not lose a word. Some read it, "all the people as they heard him took his part;" and so it comes in very properly, as a reason why his enemies "could not find what they might do" against him; they saw the people ready to fly in their faces if they offered him any violence. Till his hour was come, his interest in the common people protected him; but when his hour was come, the chief priests' influence upon the common people delivered him up.

CHAPTER XX.

In this chapter we have, I. Christ's answer to the chief priests' question concerning his authority, ver. 1—8. II. The parable of the vineyard let out to the unjust and rebellious husbandmen, ver. 9—19. III. Christ's answer to the question proposed to him, concerning the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar, ver. 20—26. IV. His vindication of that great fundamental doctrine of the Jewish and Christian institutes, the resurrection of the dead, and the future state, from the foolish cavils of the Sadducees, ver. 27—38. V. His puzzling the scribes with a question concerning the Messiah's being the son of David, ver. 39—44. VI. The caution he gave his disciples to take heed of the scribes, ver. 45—47. All which passages we had before in Matthew and Mark, and therefore need not enlarge upon them here, unless on those particulars which we had not there.

AND it came to pass, that on one of those days, as he taught the people in the temple, and preached the gospel, the chief priests and the scribes came upon him with the elders, 2 And spake unto him, saying, Tell us, by what authority doest thou these things? or who is he that gave thee this authority? 3 And he answered and said unto them, I will also ask you one thing; and answer me: 4 The baptism of John, have declared their hatred of his government. If it is said that it must point to the punishment of those who reject the Saviour, we have no reason to deny the fact. Yet it may be well to remind the hostile critic that the Gospel nowhere authorises men to punish men for unbelief in this world, nor at all. According to some expositors, the reference is to the overthrow of the Jewish nation, as such, for the rejection of the Messiah.

xix. 28, 29. The topographical indications here are perfectly was it from heaven, or of men? 5 And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; he will say, Why then believed ye him not? 6 But and if we say, Of men; all the people will stone us: for they be persuaded that John was a prophet. 7 And they answered, that they could not tell whence it was. 8 And Jesus said unto them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things.

In this passage of story nothing is added here to what we had in the other evangelists, but only in the first verse, where we are told,

First. That he was now "teaching the people in the temple, and preaching the Gospel." Note, Christ was a preacher of his own Gospel. He not only purchased the salvation for us, but published it to us, which is a great confirmation of the truth of the Gospel, and gives abundant encouragement to us to receive it; for it was a sign the heart of Christ was much upon it to have it received. This likewise puts an honour upon the preachers of the Gospel, and upon their office and work, how much soever it is despised by a vain world. It puts an honour upon the popular preachers of the Gospel. Christ condescended to the capacities of the people in preaching the Gospel, and taught them. And observe, when he was preaching the Gospel to the people, he had this interruption given him. Note, Satan and his agents do all they can to hinder the preaching the Gospel to the people; for nothing weakens the interest of Satan's kingdom more.

Secondly. That his enemies are here said to "come upon him," ἐπισηναι: that word is used only here, and it intimates, 1. That they thought to surprise him with this question; they "came upon him" suddenly, hoping to catch him unprovided with an answer, as if this were not a thing he had himself thought of. 2. That they thought to frighten him with this question. They "came upon him" in a body, with violence. But how could he be terrified with the wrath of men, when it was in his own power to restrain it, and make it turn to his praise? From this story itself we may learn,

1st. That it is not to be thought strange, if even that which is evident to a demonstration be disputed and called into question as a doubtful thing, by those that shall shut their eyes against the light. Christ's miracles plainly shewed by what authority he did these things, and sealed his commission, and yet this is that which is here arraigned.

2nd. Those that question Christ's authority, if they be but catechised themselves, in the plainest and most evident principles of religion, will have their folly made manifest unto all men. Christ answered these priests and scribes with a question concerning the baptism of John; a plain question, which the meanest of the common people could answer; "was it from heaven, or of men?" They all knew it was from heaven; there was nothing in it that had an earthly relish or tendency, but it was all heavenly and divine. And this question gruelled them, and run them aground, and served to shame them before the people.

3rd. Those that are governed by reputation and secular interest, it is not strange if they imprison the plainest truths, and smother and stifle the strongest convictions, as these priests and scribes did, who, to save their credit, would not own that John's baptism was from heaven, and had no other reason why they did not say it was of men, but because they feared the people. What good can be expected from men of such a spirit?

4th. Those that bury the knowledge they have, are justly denied farther knowledge. They who knew the baptism of John to be from heaven, and would not believe in him, nor own their knowledge, it was just with Christ to refuse to give them an account of his authority, ver. 7, 8.

9 Then began he to speak to the people this parable; A certain man planted a vineyard, and let it forth to husbandmen, and went into a far country for a long time. 10 And at the season he sent a servant to the husbandmen, that they should give him of the fruit of the vineyard: but the husband-men beat him, and sent him away empty. 11 And again he sent another servant: and they beat him also, and entreated him shamefully, and sent him away empty. 12 And again he sent a third: and they wounded him also, and cast him out. 13 Then said the lord of the vineyard, What shall I do? I will send my beloved son: it may be they will reverence him when they see him. 14 But when the husbandmen saw him, they reasoned among themselves, saying, This is the heir: come, let us kill him, that the inheritance may be our's. 15 So they cast him out of the vineyard, and killed him. What therefore shall the lord of the vineyard do unto them? 16 He shall come and destroy these husbandmen, and shall give the vineyard to others. And when they heard it, they said, God forbid. 17 And he beheld them, and said, What is this then that is written, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner? 18 Whosoever shall fall upon that stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder. 19 And the chief priests and the scribes the same hour sought to lay hands on him; and they feared the people: for they perceived that he had spoken this parable against them.

Christ spoke this parable against those who were resolved not to own his authority, though the evidence of it was never so full and convincing; and it comes in very seasonably, to shew, that by questioning his authority, they forfeited their own. Their disowning the Lord of their vineyard, was a defeasance of their lease of the vineyard, and a giving up all their title.

First. The parable has nothing added here to what we had before in Matthew and Mark. The scope of it is to shew that the Jewish nation, by persecuting the prophets, and at length Christ himself, had provoked God to take away from them all their church privileges, and to abandon them to ruin. It teacheth us,

1. That those who enjoy the privileges of the visible church are as tenants and farmers, that have a vineyard, to look after, and rents to pay for it. God, by setting up revealed religion and instituted orders in the world, hath planted a vineyard, which he lets out to those people among whom his tabernacle is, ver. 9; and they have vineyard work to do, needful and constant work, but pleasant and profitable. Whereas man was, for sin, condemned to till the ground, they that have a place in the church are restored to that which was Adam's work in innocency, to dress the garden, and to keep it; for the church is a paradise, and Christ the tree of life in it. They have also vineyard fruits to present to the Lord of the vineyard. There are rents to be paid, and services to be done, which, though bearing no proportion to the value of the premises, yet must be done, and must be paid.

2. That the work of God's ministers is to call upon those that enjoy the privileges of the church to bring forth fruit accordingly. They are God's rent gatherers, to put the husbandmen in mind of their arrears; or rather, to put them in mind that they have a landlord, who expects to hear from them, and to receive some acknowledgment of their dependence on him, and obligations to him, ver. 10. The Old Testament prophets were sent on this errand to the Jewish church, to demand from them the duty and obedience they owed to God.

3. It has often been the lot of God's faithful servants to be wretchedly abused by his own tenants; they have been beaten and treated shamefully by those that resolved to send them empty away. They that are resolved not to do their duty to God, cannot bear to be called upon to do it. Some of the best men in the world have had the hardest usage from it, for their best services.

4. God sent his Son into the world to carry on the same work that the prophets were employed in, to gather the fruits of the vineyard for God; and one would have thought he should have been revered and received. The prophets spoke as servants, "Thus saith the Lord;" but Christ, as a Son, among his own, "Verily I say unto you." Putting such an honour as this upon them, to send him, one would have thought should have won upon them.

5. Those that reject Christ's ministers would reject Christ himself, if he should come to them; for it has been tried, and found that the persecutors and murderers of his servants the prophets, were the persecutors and murderers of him himself. They said, "This is the heir: come, let us kill him." When they slew the servants, there were other servants sent; but if we can but be the death of the Son, there is never another Son to be sent, and then we shall be no longer molested with these demands; we may have a quiet possession of the vineyard for ourselves. The scribes and Pharisees promised themselves that, if they could but get Christ out of the way, they should for ever ride masters in the Jewish church; and therefore they took that bold step, they "cast him out of the vineyard and killed him."

6. The putting of Christ to death filled up the measure of the Jewish iniquity, and brought upon them ruin without remedy. No other could be expected but that God should "destroy those wicked husbandmen." They began in not paying their rent, but then proceeded to beat and kill the servants, and at length their young master himself. Note, Those that live in the neglect of their duty to God, know not what degrees of sin and destruction they are running themselves into.

xix. 42. Some treat "if thou hadst known," &c., as an elliptical sentence, but there is no doubt it is a Hebraism, equivalent to "oh, that thou hadst known!" or "would that thou hadst known!" The idea is that the city had not known what would conduce to its peace or welfare—another Hebraism. (See Heb. iv. 3, 5.)

xix. 43, 44. The singular accuracy of detail in this prophetic passage has driven sceptics to the supposition that it must have been written after the fall of Jerusalem. The date of the book is a exact. From Jericho the traveller literally ascends to Jerusalem, which is much more elevated. The site of Bethphage is uncertain, but the proximity of it and Bethany to the Mount of Olives is unquestioned.

xix. 41. It is observed by Epiphanius, that certain rash and sensitive people, who thought it unworthy of Christ he should weep, struck out from their copies the words "and wept over it." No copies without the words are now in existence.

Secondly. To the application of the parable is added here, which we had not before, their deprecation of the doom included in it, ver. 16; "when they heard it, they said, God forbid;" μή γένοιτο, 'Let not this be done,' so it should be read; though they could not but own that for such a sin such a punishment was just, and what might be expected, yet they could not bear to hear of it. Note, It is an instance of the folly and stupidity of sinners that they proceed and persevere in their sinful ways, though at the same time they have a foresight and dread of the destruction that is at the end of those ways. And see what a cheat they put upon themselves, to think to avoid it by a cold "God forbid," when they do nothing towards the preventing of it; but will this make the threatening of none effect? No, they shall know whose word shall stand, God's or theirs.

Now observe what Christ said in answer to this childish deprecation of their ruin. 1. "He beheld them." That is taken notice of only by this evangelist, ver. 17. He looked upon them with pity and compassion; grieved to see them cheat themselves thus in their own ruin. "He beheld them," to see if they would blush at their own folly, or if he could discern in their countenances any show of relenting. 2. He referred them to the Scripture, "What is this then that is written?" How can you escape the judgment of God, when you cannot prevent the exaltation of him whom you despise and reject? The word of God hath said it, that "the stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner." The Lord Jesus will be exalted to the Father's right hand; he has all judgment and all power committed to him; he is the corner stone and top stone of the church; and if so, his enemies can expect no other but to be destroyed; for even those that slight him, that stumble at him, and are offended in him, they "shall be broken," it will be their ruin; but those that not only reject him, but hate and persecute him, as the Jews did, he will fall upon them, and crush them to pieces, "will grind them to powder." The condemnation of spiteful persecutors will be much sorer than that of careless unbelievers.

Lastly. We are told how the chief priests and scribes were exasperated by this parable, ver. 19; "they perceived that he spoke this parable against them," and so he did; a guilty conscience needs no accuser; but they, instead of yielding to the convictions of conscience, fell into a rage at him who awakened that sleeping lion in their bosoms, and "sought to lay hands on him." Their corruptions rebelled against their convictions, and got the victory; and it was not because they had any fear of God or of his wrath before their eyes, but only because "they feared the people," that they did not now fly in his face, and take him by the throat. They were just ready to make his words good, "This is the heir; come, let us kill him." Note, When the hearts of the sons of men are fully set in them to do evil, the fairest warnings, both of the sin they are about to commit, and of the consequences of it, make no impression upon them. Christ tells them, that instead of kissing the Son of God, they would kill him; upon which they should have said, "What, is thy servant a dog?" But they do in effect say this, 'And so we will; have at him now.' And though they deprecate the punishment of the sin, in the next breath they are projecting the commission of it.

20 And they watched him, and sent forth spies, which should feign themselves just men, that they might take hold of his words, that so they might deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor. 21 And they asked him, saying, Master, we know that thou sayest and teachest rightly, neither acceptest thou the person of any, but teachest the way of God truly: 22 Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto Cæsar, or no? 23 But he perceived their craftiness, and said unto them, Why tempt ye me? 24 Shew me a penny. Whose image and superscription hath it? They answered and said, Cæsar's. 25 And he said unto them, Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which be Cæsar's, and unto God the things which be God's. 26 And they could not take hold of his words before the people: and they marvelled at his answer, and held their peace.

We have here Christ's evading a snare which his enemies laid for him, by proposing a question to him about tribute. We had this passage before, both in Matthew and Mark. Here is,

First. The mischief designed him; and that is more fully related here than before. The plot was to "deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor," ver. 20. They could not themselves put him to death by course of law, nor otherwise than by a popular tumult, which they could not depend upon; and since they cannot be his judges, they will willingly condescend to be his prosecutors and accusers, and will themselves inform against him. They hoped to gain their point, if they could but incense the governor against him. Note, It has been the common artifice of persecuting church rulers to make the secular powers the tools of their malice, and oblige the kings of the earth to do their drudgery, who, if they had not been instigated, would have let their neighbours live quietly by them, as Pilate did Christ, till the chief priests and the scribes presented Christ to him. But thus Christ's word must be fulfilled by their cursed policies, that he should be "delivered into the hands of the Gentiles."

Secondly. The persons they employed. Matthew and Mark told us they were disciples of the Pharisees, with some Herodians; here it is added, that they were "spies, which should feign themselves just men." Note, It is no new thing for ill men to feign themselves just men, and to cover the most wicked projects with most specious and plausible pretences. The devil can transform himself into an angel of light, and a Pharisee appear in the garb and speak the language of a disciple of Christ. A spy must go in disguise. These spies must take on them to have a value for Christ's judgment, and to depend upon "as an oracle, and therefore must desire his advice in a case of conscience."

literary question, and no believer in the Son of God can object to the received opinion, because of a very distinct prophecy like this. Until the Messiahship of Jesus is disproved, there is no room for such an objection. The exactness of the details may be proved from Josephus and others.

xix. 45. In some of the best copies this verse ends with the word "sold," or "therein," and some modern critics leave out the remainder.

Note, Ministers are concerned to stand upon their guard against some that feign themselves to be just men, and to be wise as serpents when they are in the midst of a generation of vipers and scorpions.

Thirdly. The question they proposed, with which they hoped to ensnare him. 1. Their preface is very courtly, "Master, we know that thou sayest and teachest rightly," ver. 21. Thus they thought to flatter him into an incautious freedom and openness with them, and so to gain their point. They that are proud, and love to be commended, will be brought to do any thing for those that will but flatter them, and speak them fair; but they were much mistaken who thought thus to impose upon the humble Jesus. He was not pleased with the testimony of such hypocrites, nor thought himself honoured by it. It is true that he accepts not the person of any, but it is as true, that he knows the hearts of all, and knew theirs, and the seven abominations that were there, though they spake fair. It was certain that he taught the way of God truly; but he knew that they were unworthy to be taught by him, who came to take hold of his words, not to be taken hold of by them. 2. Their case is very nice: "Is it lawful for us" (that is added here in Luke) "to give tribute to Cæsar?" for us Jews; us, the freeborn seed of Abraham; us, that pay the Lord's tribute; may we give tribute to Cæsar? Their pride and covetousness made them loath to pay taxes, and then they would have it a question whether it was lawful or no. Now, if Christ should say it was lawful, the people would take it ill, who expected that he who set up to be the Messiah should in the first place free them from the Roman yoke, and stand by them in denying tribute to Cæsar; but if he should say it was not lawful, as they expected he would, (for if he had not been of that mind, they thought he could not have been so much the darling of the people as he was,) then they should have something to accuse him of to the governor, which was what they wanted.

Fourthly. His evading of the snare which they laid for him: "He perceived their craftiness," ver. 23. Note, Those that are most crafty in their designs against Christ and his Gospel, cannot, with all their art, conceal them from his cognizance. He can see through the most political disguises, and so break through the most dangerous snare; for "surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird." He did not give them a direct answer, but reproved them for offering to impose upon him, "Why tempt ye me?" and called for a piece of money, current money with the merchants: "Shew me a penny;" and asked them whose money it was; whose stamp it bore; who coined it? They own it is Cæsar's money. Why then, saith Christ, you should first have asked whether it was lawful to pay and receive Cæsar's money among yourselves, and to admit that to be the instrument of your commerce; but you, having granted that by a common consent, you are concluded by your own act, and no doubt you ought to give tribute to him who furnished you with this convenience for your trade, protects you in it, and lends you the sanction of his authority for the value of your money; you must therefore "render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." In civil things you ought to submit to the civil powers; and so, if Cæsar protects you in your civil rights, by laws and the administration of justice, you ought to pay him tribute; but in sacred things, God only is your King; you are not bound to be of Cæsar's religion; you must "render to God the things that are God's," must worship and adore him only, and not any golden image that Cæsar sets up; and we must worship and adore him in such a way as he has appointed, and not according to the inventions of Cæsar. It is God only that has authority to say, "My son, give me thy heart."

Fifthly. The confusion they were hereby put into, ver. 26. 1. The snare is broke; "they could not take hold of his words before the people." They could not fasten upon any thing wherewith to incense either the governor or the people against him. 2. Christ is honoured; even the wrath of man is made to praise him. "They marvelled at his answer," it was so discreet and unexceptionable, and such an evidence of that wisdom and sincerity which make the face to shine. 3. Their mouths are stopped; they "held their peace;" they had nothing to object; and durst ask him nothing else, lest he should shame and expose them.

27 Then came to him certain of the Sadducees, which deny that there is any resurrection; and they asked him, 28 Saying, Master, Moses wrote unto us, If any man's brother die, having a wife, and he die without children, that his brother should take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother. 29 There were therefore seven brethren: and the first took a wife, and died without children. 30 And the second took her to wife, and he died childless. 31 And the third took her; and in like manner the seven also: and they left no children, and died. 32 Last of all the woman died also. 33 Therefore in the resurrection whose wife of them is she? for seven had her to wife. 34 And Jesus answering said unto them, The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage: 35 But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage: 36 Neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. 37 Now that the dead are raised, even Moses shewed at the bush, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God

xix. 47. "Daily" here means "every day"—i.e., on each of the few days which concluded his regular ministry, and closed with his betrayal.

xx. 1. "One of those days," or, as we may read, "one of the days," is an allusion to the days indicated in chap. xix. 47. (See the previous Note.)

xx. 2. Even Strauss is forced to say, "These discussions are truly genuine passages, being carried on so entirely in the spirit and tone of Jacob. 38 For he is not a God of the dead, but of the living: for all live unto him.

This discourse with the Sadducees we had before, just as it is here, only that the description Christ gives of the future state is somewhat more full and large here. Observe here,

First. That in every age there have been men of corrupt minds, that have endeavoured to subvert the fundamental principles of revealed religion. As there are deists now, who call themselves free-thinkers, but are really false-thinkers, so there were Sadducees in our Saviour's time, that bantered the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come, though they were plainly revealed in the Old Testament, and were articles of the Jewish faith. The Sadducees "deny that there is any resurrection," any 'future state'; so ἀνάστασις may signify; not only no return of the body to life, but no continuance of the soul in life; no world of spirits, no state of recompence and retribution for what was done in the body. Take away this, and all religion falls to the ground.

Secondly. It is common for those that design to undermine any truth of God to perplex it, and load it with difficulties; so those Sadducees here did; when they would weaken people's faith in the doctrine of the resurrection, they put a question upon the supposition of it, which they thought could not be answered either way to satisfaction. The case, perhaps, was matter of fact, however it might be so, of a woman that had seven husbands: now in the resurrection whose wife shall she be? Whereas it was not at all material whose she was, for when death puts an end to that relation, it is not to be resumed again.

Thirdly. There is a great deal of difference between the state of the children of men on earth and that of the children of God in heaven; a vast unlikeness between "this world" and "that world;" and we wrong ourselves, and wrong the truth of Christ, when we form our notions of that world of spirits by our present enjoyments in this world of sense.

1. The children of men in this world "marry, and are given in marriage," οἱ τοῦ αἵματος τούτου, 'the children of this age,' this generation, both good and bad, marry themselves, and give their children in marriage. Much of our business in this world is to raise and build up families, and to provide for them; much of our pleasure in this world is in our relations, our wives and children; nature inclines to it. Marriage is instituted for the comfort of human life here in this state, where we carry bodies about with us. It is likewise a remedy against fornication, that natural desires might not become brutal, but be under direction and control. "The children of this world" are dying and going off the stage, and therefore they marry, and give their children in marriage, that they may furnish the world of mankind with needful recruits, that as one generation passeth away, another may come; and that they may have some of their offspring to leave the fruit of their labours to, especially that the chosen of God in future ages may be introduced, for it is a godly seed that is sought by marriage, Mal. ii. 15; a seed to serve the Lord, that shall be a generation to him.

2. The world to come is quite another thing; it is called "that world," by way of emphasis and eminency. Note, There are more worlds than one: a present miserable world, and a future invisible world; and it is the concern of every one of us to compare worlds, "this world" and "that world," and give the preference in our thoughts and cares to that which deserves it. Now observe,

1st. Who shall be the inhabitants of that world: they that shall be accounted worthy to obtain it, that is, that are interested in Christ's merit, who purchased it for us, and have a holy meanness for it wrought in them by the Spirit, whose business it is to prepare us for it. They have not a legal worthiness, upon the account of any thing in them, or done by them, but an evangelical worthiness, upon the account of the inestimable price which Christ paid for "the redemption of the purchased possession." It is a worthiness imputed, by which we are glorified, as well as righteousness imputed, by which we are justified; κατακληθήντες, they are 'made agreeable to that world.' The disagreeableness that there is in the corrupt nature, is taken away, and the dispositions of the soul are, by the grace of God, conformed to that state; they are by grace made and "counted worthy to obtain that world." It intimates some difficulty in reaching after it, and danger of coming short: we must so run as that we may obtain. They shall obtain "the resurrection from the dead," that is, the blessed resurrection; for that of condemnation, as Christ calls it, 1 Jno. v. 29, is rather a resurrection to death,—a second death, an eternal death,—than from death.

2nd. What shall be the happy state of the inhabitants of that world, we cannot conceive or express it, 1 Cor. ii. 9. See what Christ here saith of it:

First. They "neither marry, nor are given in marriage." Those that are entered into the joy of their Lord are entirely taken up with that, and need not the joy of the bridegroom in his bride. The love in that world of love is all seraphic, and such as eclipseth and loseth the purest and most pleasing loves we entertain ourselves with in this world of sense; where the body itself shall be a spiritual body, the delights of sense are all vanished; and where there is a perfection of holiness there is no occasion for marriage as a preservative from sin; into that new Jerusalem there enters nothing that defiles.

Secondly. They cannot "die any more;" and this comes in as a reason why they do not marry. In this dying world there must be marriage, in order to the filling up of the vacancies made by death; but where there are no burials, there needs no weddings. This crowns the comfort of that world, that there is no more death there, which sullies all the beauty and damps all the comfort of this world. Here death reigns, but thence it is for ever excluded.

Thirdly. "They are equal unto the angels." In the other evangelists it was said they are "as the angels," ὡς ἄγγελοι, but here they are said to be "equal to the angels," ἰσάγγελοι, 'angels' peers; they have a glory and bliss no way inferior to that of the holy angels. They shall see the same sight, be employed in the same work, and share in the same joys with the holy angels. Saints, when they come to heaven, shall be naturalized; and though by nature strangers, yet, having obtained this freedom with a great sum, which Christ paid for them, they have in all respects equal privileges with them that were freeborn, the angels that are the natives and aborigines of that country. They shall be companions with the angels, and converse with those blessed spirits that love them dearly, and to an innumerable company of whom they are now come in faith, hope, and love.

Fourthly. They "are the children of God," and so they are as the angels, who are called the sons of God. In the inheritance of sons, the adoption of sons will be completed. Hence believers are said to wait for the adoption, even the redemption of the body, Rom. viii. 23; for till the body is redeemed from the grave, the adoption is not completed. "Now are we the sons of God," 1 Jno. iii. 2. We have the nature and disposition of sons, but that will not be perfected till we come to heaven.

Fifthly. They are "the children of the resurrection," that is, they are made capable of the employments and enjoyments of the future state; they are born to that world, belong to that family, and their education for it here, and shall there have their inheritance in it. They "are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Note, God owns those only for his children that are the children of the resurrection, that are born from above, are allied to the world of spirits, and prepared for that world, who are the children of that family.

Fourthly. It is an undoubted truth that there is another life after this, and there were eminent discoveries made of this truth in the early ages of the church, ver. 37, 38. "Moses shewed" this, as it was shewn to Moses, "at the bush," and he hath shewn it to us, "when he calleth the Lord," as the Lord calleth himself, "the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were then dead as to our world; they were departed out of it many years before, and their bodies were turned into dust in the cave of Macpelah: how then could God say, not 'I was,' but, "I am the God of Abraham?" It is absurd that the living God and fountain of life should continue related to them as their God, if there were no more of them in being but what lay in that cave, undistinguished from common dust: we must therefore conclude that they were then in being in another world, "for God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." Luke here adds, "for all live unto him;" that is, all that, like them, are true believers; though they are dead, yet they do live; their souls, which return to God that gave them, Ecccl. xii. 7, live to him as the Father of spirits; and their bodies shall live again, at the end of time, by the power of God, for he calleth things that are not as though they were, because he is the God that quickens the dead, Rom. iv. 17. But there is more in it yet; when God called himself the God of these patriarchs, he meant that he was their felicity and portion, a God all-sufficient to them, Gen. xvii. 1; their exceeding great reward, Gen. xv. 1. Now it is plain, by their story, that he never did that for them in this world which would answer the true intent and full extent of that great undertaking, and therefore there must be another life after this, in which he will do that for them that will amount to a discharge in full of that promise, that he would be to them a God; which he is well able to do, for all live to him, and he has wherewithal to make every soul happy that lives to him; enough for all, enough for each.

39 Then certain of the scribes answering said, Master, thou hast well said. 40 And after that they durst not ask him any question at all. 41 And he said unto them, How say they that Christ is David's son? 42 And David himself saith in the book of Psalms, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, 43 Till I make thine enemies thy footstool. 44 David therefore calleth him Lord, how is he then his son? 45 Then in the audience of all the people he said unto his disciples, 46 Beware of the scribes, which desire to walk in long robes, and love greetings in the markets, and the highest seats in the synagogues, and the chief rooms at feasts; 47 Which devour widows' houses, and for a shew make long prayers: the same shall receive greater damnation.

The scribes were students in the law, and expositors of it to the people, men in reputation for wisdom and honour; the generality of them were enemies to Christ and his Gospel. Now here we have some of them attending him, and four things we have in these verses concerning them, which we had before.

First. We have them here commending the reply which Christ made to the Sadducees concerning the resurrection; ver. 39, "Certain of the scribes said, Master, thou hast well said." Christ had the testimony of his adversaries that he said well, and therefore the scribes were his enemies, because he would not conform to the traditions of the elders; but yet, when he vindicated the fundamental practices of religion, and appeared in defence of them, even the scribes commended his performance, and owned he said well. Many that call themselves Christians come short even of that spirit.

Secondly. We have them here struck with an awe of Christ, and of his wisdom and authority; ver. 40, "they durst not ask him any question at all," because they saw that he was too hard for all that contended with him. His own disciples, though weak, yet being willing to receive his doctrine, durst ask him any question; but the Sadducees, who contradicted and cavilled at his doctrine, durst ask him none.

Thirdly. We have them here puzzled and run aground with a question concerning the Messiah, ver. 41. It was plain by many scriptures that Christ was to be the son of David; even the blind man knew that, ch. xiii. 39; and yet it was plain that David called the Messiah his Lord, ver. 42, 43, his owner, and ruler, and benefactor; "the Lord said to my Lord," God said it to the Messiah, Psa. cx. 1. Now if he be his son, why doth he call him his Lord? if he be his Lord, why doth he call him his son? This he left them to consider of, but they could not reconcile this seeming contradiction; thanks be to God we can; that Christ, as God, was David's Lord; but Christ, as man, was David's son: he was both the root and the offspring of David, Rev. xxi. 16. By his human nature he was the offspring of David, a branch of his family; by his Divine nature he was the root of David, from whom he had his being and life, and all the supplies of grace.

Fourthly. We have them here described in their black characters, and a public caution given to the disciples to take heed of them, ver. 45-47. This we had just as it is here, Mar. xii. 38, and more largely, Mat. xxiii. Christ bade his disciples beware of the scribes; that is, 1. Take heed of being drawn into sin by them, of learning their way, and going into their measures; beware of such a spirit as they are governed by. Be not you such in the Christian church as they are in the Jewish church. 2. Take heed of being brought into trouble by them; in the same sense that he had said, Mat. x. 17, "Beware of men, for they will deliver you up to the councils;" beware of the scribes, for they do so. Beware of them, for,

1. They are proud and haughty; they desire to walk about the streets in long robes, as those that are above business, (for men of business went with of the rabbinical dialectics of the time." The questioning of the chief priests and the rest seems to have had a semi-official character.

xx. 9. Strange as the incidents of this parable may appear to such as are only familiar with what takes place under regular European governments, an acquaintance with ancient and Oriental conditions of society will show that it corresponds with facts which might have happened. The arrangements made agree with those which were usual, and the refusal to fulfil engagements may have been common also. It is apparent that the parable as a whole had a distinct application to the Jews.

xx. 19. While applicable to the Jews as a whole, we perceive that the parable bore most directly upon the priests and scribes.

xx. 20. Though foiled, the enemies of Jesus were not defeated, and they devised means whereby they might give a political turn to their action. The governor here meant is Pilate, who, as a Roman, would readily take cognisance of any seditious speech. Hence the their loins girt up,) and as those that take state and take place; cedant arma togæ—let arms yield to the gown.' They loved in their hearts to have people make their honours to them in the markets, that many might see what respect was paid them; and were very proud of the precedence that was given them in all places of concourse; "they loved the highest seats in the synagogues, and the chief rooms at feasts;" and when they were placed in them, looked upon themselves with great conceit, and upon all about them with great contempt. "I sit as a queen."

2. They are covetous and oppressive, and make their religion a cloak and cover for it. They "devour widows' houses;" get their estates into their hands, and then, by some trick or other, make them their own; or, they live upon them, and eat up what they have. And widows are an easy prey to them, because they are apt to be deluded by their specious pretences; "for a show, they make long prayers," perhaps long prayers with the widows when they are in sorrow, as if they had not only a piteous but a pious concern for them, and thus endeavour to ingratiate themselves with them, and get their money and effects into their hands. Such devout men surely may be trusted with untold gold; but they will give such an account of it as they think fit.

Christ reads them their doom in a few words: "These shall receive a more abundant judgment," a double damnation; both for their abuse of the poor widows, whose houses they devoured, and for their abuse of religion, and particularly of prayer, which they had made use of as a pretence for the more plausible and effectual carrying on of their worldly and wicked projects; for dissembled piety is double iniquity.

an this chapter we have, I. The notice Christ took, and the approbation he gave, of a poor widow that cast two mites into the treasury, ver. 1—4. II. A prediction of future events, in answer to his disciples' inquiries concerning them, ver. 5—7. 1. Of what should happen between that and the destruction of Jerusalem; false Christs arising, bloody wars and persecutions of Christ's followers, ver. 8—19. 2. Of that destruction itself, ver. 20—24. 3. Of the second coming of Jesus Christ to judge the world, under the type and figure of that, ver. 25—33. III. A practical application of this, by way of caution and counsel, ver. 34—36; and an account of Christ's preaching, and the people's attendance on it, ver. 37, 38.

ND he looked up, and saw the rich men casting their gifts into the treasury. 2 And he saw also a certain poor widow casting in thither two mites. 3 And he said, Of a truth I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than they all:

4 For all these have of their abundance cast in unto the offerings of God: but she of her penury hath cast in all the living that she had.

MITES, OR HALF FARTHING.

This short passage of story we had before in Mark. It is thus recorded twice, to teach us,

I. That charity to the poor is a main matter in religion; our Lord Jesus took all occasions to commend it and recommend it. He had just mentioned the barbarity of the scribes, that devoured poor widows, ch. xx.; and perhaps this is designed as an aggravation of it, that the poor widows were the best benefactors to the public funds, which the scribes had the disposal of.

II. That Jesus Christ has his eye upon us, to observe what we give to the poor, and what we contribute to works of piety and charity. Christ, though intent upon his preaching, looked up to see what gifts were cast into the treasury, ver. 1. He observes whether we give largely and liberally, in proportion to what we have, or whether we are sneaking and paltry in it; nay, his eye goes farther, he observes whether we give charitably, and with a willing mind, or grudgingly, and with reluctance. This should make us afraid of coming short of our duty in this matter; men may be deceived with excuses which Christ knows to be frivolous; and this should encourage us to be abundant in it, without desiring that men should know it; it is enough that Christ doth; he seeth in secret, and will reward openly.

III. That Christ observes and accepts the charity of the poor in a particular manner. Those that have nothing to give, may yet do a great deal in charity by ministering to the poor, and helping them, and begging for them, that cannot help themselves, or beg for themselves; but here was one that was herself poor, and yet gave what little she had to the treasury. It was but two mites, which make a farthing; but Christ magnified it as a piece of charity exceeding all the rest, "she has cast in more than they all." Christ doth not blame her for indiscretion, in giving what she wanted herself, nor for vanity in giving among "the rich to the treasury; but commended her liberality, and her willingness to part with what little she had for the glory of God; which proceeded from a belief of, and a dependence upon, God's providence, to take care of her; Jehovah-jireh—the Lord will provide."

IV. That whatever may be called the offerings of God, we ought to have a respect for; and to our power, yea, and beyond our power, to contribute cheerfully to: These have "cast in unto the offerings of God." What is given to the support of the ministry of the Gospel, to the spreading and propagating of religion, the education of youth, the release of prisoners, the relief of widows and strangers, and the maintenance of poor families, is given to the offerings of God, and it shall be so accepted and recompensed.

5 And as some spake of the temple, how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts, he said, 6 As for these things which ye behold, the days will come, in the which there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down. 7 And they asked him, saying, Master, but when shall these things be? and what sign will there be when these things shall come to pass? 8 And he said, Take heed that ye be not deceived: for many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; and the time draweth near: go ye not therefore after them. 9 But when ye shall hear of wars and commotions, be not terrified: for these things must first come to pass; but the end is not by and by. 10 Then said he unto them, Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: 11 And great earthquakes shall be in divers places, and famines, and pestilences; and fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven. 12 But before all these, they shall lay their hands on you, and persecute you, delivering you up to the synagogues, and into prisons, being brought before kings and rulers for my name's sake. 13 And it shall turn to you for a testimony. 14 Settle it therefore in your hearts, not to meditate before what ye shall answer: 15 For I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor resist. 16 And ye shall be betrayed both by parents, and brethren, and kinsfolks, and friends; and some of you shall they cause to be put to death. 17 And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake. 18 But there shall not an hair of your head perish. 19 In your patience possess ye your souls.

See here, I. With what admiration some spake of the external pomp and magnificence of the temple; and they were some of Christ's own disciples too; and they took notice of it to him, "how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts," ver. 5. The outside was built up with goodly stones, and within it was beautified and enriched with the presents that were offered up for that purpose, and were hung up in it. They thought their Master should be as much affected with those things as they were, and should as much regret the destruction of them as they did. When we speak of the temple, it should be of the presence of God in it, and of the ordinances of God administered in it, and the communion which his people there have with him. It is a poor thing, when we speak of the church, to let our discourse dwell upon its pomps and revenues, and the dignities and powers of its officers and rulers; for "the king's daughter is all glorious within."

II. With what contempt Christ spoke of them, and with what assurance of their being all made desolate very shortly, ver. 6: "As for those things which ye behold," those dear things which you are so much in love with, "behold the days will come," and some now living may live to see them, "in the which there shall not be left one stone upon another." This building, which seems so beautiful that one would think none could for pity pull it down, and which seems so strong that one would think none should be able to pull it down, yet shall be utterly ruined; and this shall be done as soon as ever the spiritual temple of the gospel church (the substance of that shadow) begins to flourish in the world. Did we by faith foresee the blasting and withering of all external glory, we should not set our hearts upon it, as those do that cannot see, or will not look, so far before them.

III. With what curiosity those about him inquire concerning the time when this great desolation should be; ver. 7, "Master, when shall these things be?" It is natural to us to covet to know future things, and the time of them, which it is not for us to know, when we are more concerned to ask what is our duty in the prospect of these things, and how we may prepare for them: this it is for us to know. They inquire "what sign there shall be when these things shall come to pass." They ask not for a present sign to confirm the prediction itself, and to induce them to believe it; Christ's word was enough for that; but what the future signs will be of the approaching accomplishment or the prediction, by which they may be put in mind of it. These signs of the times Christ had taught them to observe.

Saviour was narrowly watched, and informers were employed to endeavour to catch him in some of his words.

xx. 24. Here, as in other cases where the term occurs, "penny" is a Roman denarius, worth a quarter of a shekel, or about sevenpence-halfpenny.

xx. 27. After the repulse of priests, scribes, elders, and spies, the Sadducees come and resume the attack upon a question of doctrine. The word "resurrection" in this verse seems to include the Sadducee opinion respecting both the revivifying of the body and the state of the soul after death. There was a popular belief that the resurrection of the dead would occur at the coming of the Messiah.

xx. 33. The phrase "in the resurrection" may be limited so as to mean "at the resurrection," but we prefer to understand it of the condition introduced by the resurrection. The Sadducees did not believe in this condition, but they knew that our Lord taught it, and put this question to perplex him. They assumed the alleged future

IV. With what clearness and fulness Christ answers their inquiries, as far as was necessary to direct them in their duty; for all knowledge is desirable as far as it is in order to practice.

First. They must expect to hear of false Christs, and false prophets, appearing, and false prophecies given out; ver. 8, "many shall come in my name." He doth not mean in the name of Jesus, though there were some deceivers who pretended commissions from him, as Acts xix. 13; but usurping the title and character of the Messiah. Many pretended to be the deliverers of the Jewish church and nation from the Romans, and to fix the time when the deliverance should be wrought; by which multitudes were drawn into a snare, to their ruin. They shall say, ὅτι ἐγώ εἰμι,—"that I am he," or, "I am;" as if they would assume that incommunicable name of God by which he made himself known when he came to deliver Israel out of Egypt, "I am;" and to encourage people to follow them, they added, "the time draws near when the kingdom shall be restored to Israel; and if they will follow me they shall share in it."

Now as to this he gives them a needful caution: 1. "Take heed that ye be not deceived." Do not you imagine that I shall myself come again in external glory to take possession of the throne of kingdoms; no, you must not expect any such thing, for my kingdom is not of this world. When they asked solicitously and eagerly, "Master, when shall these things be?" the first word Christ said was, "Take heed that ye be not deceived." Note, Those that are most inquisitive in the things of God, (though it is very good to be so,) yet are in most danger of being imposed upon, and have most need to be upon their guard. 2. "Go ye not after them." You know the Messiah is come, and you are not to look for any other; and therefore do not so much as hearken after them, nor have any thing to do with them. If we are sure that Jesus is the Christ, and his doctrine is the Gospel of God, we must be deaf to all intimations of another Christ, and another gospel.

Secondly. They must expect to hear of great commotions in the nations, and many terrible judgments inflicted upon the Jews and their neighbours. 1. There shall be bloody wars; ver. 10, "Nation shall rise against nation;" one part of the Jewish nation against another; or rather, the whole against the Romans. Encouraged by the false Christs, they shall wickedly endeavour to throw off the Roman yoke, by taking up arms against the Roman powers. When they had rejected the liberty with which Christ would have made them free, they were left to themselves, to grasp at their civil liberty in ways that were sinful, and therefore could not be successful. 2. There shall be earthquakes, great earthquakes, in divers places, which shall not only frighten people, but destroy towns and houses, and bury many in the ruins of them. 3. There shall be famines and pestilences; the common effects of war, which destroy the fruits of the earth; and by exposing men to ill weather, and reducing them to ill diet, occasions infectious diseases. God has various ways of punishing a provoking people. The four sorts of judgments which the Old Testament prophets so often speak of, are threatened by the New Testament prophets too; for though spiritual judgments are more commonly inflicted in gospel times, yet God makes use of temporal judgments also. 4. There shall be fearful sights, and great signs from heaven; uncommon appearances in the clouds, comets and blazing stars, which frighten the ordinary sort of beholders, and have always been looked upon as ominous, and portending something bad.

Now as to these, the caution he gives them is, "Be not terrified;" others will be frightened at them, be not you frightened, ver. 9. As to the fearful sights, let not them be fearful to you, who look above the visible heavens to the throne of God's government in the highest heavens; "Be not dismayed at the signs of heaven, for the heathen are dismayed at them," Jer. x. 2. And as to the famines and pestilences, you fall into the hands of God, who has promised to those who are his, that "in the days of famine they shall be satisfied," and that he will keep them from the noisome pestilence. Trust therefore in him, and be not afraid; nay, when you hear of wars, when without are fightings, and within are fears, yet then be not you terrified. You know the worst that any of these judgments can do you, and therefore be not afraid of them. For, 1st. It is your interest to make the best of that which is, for all your fears cannot alter it; "these things must first come to pass," there is no remedy. It will be your wisdom to make yourselves easy, by accommodating yourselves to them. 2nd. There is worse behind. Flatter not yourselves with a fancy that you will soon see an end of these troubles; no, not so soon as you think of; "the end is not by and by," not suddenly. Be not terrified; for if you begin so quickly to be discouraged, how will you bear up under what is yet before you?

Thirdly. They must expect to be themselves for signs and wonders in Israel; their being persecuted would be a prognostic of the destruction of the city and temple, which he had now foretold; nay, this should be the first sign of their ruin coming; "before all these they shall lay their hands on you;" the judgment shall begin at the house of God; you must smart first, for warning to them; that, if they have any consideration, they may consider, "if this be done to the green tree, what shall be done to the dry?" see 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18. But that is not all; this must be considered not only as the suffering of the persecuted, but as the sin of the persecutors; before God's judgments are brought upon them, they shall fill up the measure of their iniquity, by laying their hands on you. Note, The ruin of a people is always introduced by their sin; and nothing introduces a surer and sorer ruin than the sin of persecution. This is a sign that God's wrath is coming upon a people to the uttermost, when their wrath against the servants of God comes to the uttermost. Now as to this,

1. Christ tells them what hard things they should suffer for his name's sake; much to the same purpose with what he had told them when he first called them to follow him, Mat. x.; they should know the wages of it, that they might sit down and count the cost. St. Paul, who was the greatest labourer and sufferer of them all, not being now among them, was told by himself what "great things he should suffer for Christ's name's sake," Acts ix. 16; so necessary is it that all that will live godly in Christ Jesus should count upon persecution. The Christians having themselves been originally Jews, and still retaining an equal veneration with them for the Old Testament, and all the essentials of their religion, and differing only in ceremony, might expect fair quarter with them; but Christ bids them not expect it; no, they shall be the most forward to persecute you. 1st. They shall use their own church power against you; "they shall deliver you up to the synagogues, to be scourged there, and stigmatized with their anathemas. 2nd. They shall incense the magistrates against you; they shall "deliver you into prisons," that you may be "brought before kings and rulers for my name's sake," and be punished by them. 3rd. Your own relations will betray you, ver. 16, "your parents, brethren, and kinsfolks, and friends;" so that you will not know whom to put confidence in, nor where to be safe. 4th. Your religion will be made a capital crime, and you will be called to resist unto blood; "some of you shall they cause to be put to death;" so far must you be from expecting honour and wealth, that you must expect nothing but death in its most frightful shapes, death in all its dreadful pomp. Nay, 5th. "You shall be hated of all men for my name's sake." This is worse than death itself; and was fulfilled when the apostles were not "only appointed to death," but made a "spectacle to the world," and counted as the "filth of the world," and the "off-scouring of all things," which every body loathes, 1 Cor. iv. 9, 13. They were hated of all men, that is, of all ill men, who could not bear the light of the Gospel, because it discovered their evil deeds; and therefore hate those who brought in that light, flew in their faces, and would have pulled them to pieces. The wicked world, that hated to be reformed, hated Christ the great reformer, and all that were his, for his sake. The rulers of the Jewish church, knowing very well that if the Gospel obtained among the Jews, their usurped, abused power was at an end, raised all their forces against it, put it into an ill name, filled people's minds with prejudices against it, and so made the preachers and professors of it odious to the mob.

2. He encourageth them to bear up under their trials, and to go on in their work, notwithstanding the opposition they would meet with.

1st. God will bring glory to himself and them out of their sufferings; ver. 13, "it shall turn to you for a testimony." Your being set up thus for a mark, and publicly persecuted, will make you and your doctrine and miracles the more taken notice of and inquired into; your "being brought before kings and rulers" will give you an opportunity of preaching the Gospel to them, who otherwise would never have come within hearing of it; your suffering such severe things, and being so hated by the worst of men, of the most vicious lives, will be a testimony that you are good, else you would not have such ill men your enemies; your courage, and cheerfulness, and constancy under your sufferings will be a testimony for you that you believe what you preach, and that you are supported by a Divine power, and the Spirit of God and glory rests upon you.

2nd. God will stand by you, and own you, and assist you in your trials; you are his advocates, and you shall be well furnished with instructions, ver. 14, 15. Instead of setting your hearts on work to contrive an answer to informations, indictments, articles, accusations, and interrogatories, that will be exhibited against you in the ecclesiastical and civil courts, on the contrary, "settle it in your hearts," impress it upon them, take pains with them to persuade them "not to meditate before what ye shall answer;" that is, do not depend upon your own wit and ingenuity, your own prudence and policy; and do not distrust or despair of the immediate and extraordinary aids of the Divine grace. Think not to bring yourselves off in the cause of Christ, as you would in a cause of your own, by your own parts and application, with the common assistances of Divine providence; but promise yourselves—for I promise you—the special assistance of Divine grace; "I will give you a mouth and wisdom." This proves Christ to be God; for it is God's prerogative to give wisdom; and he it is that made man's mouth. Note, First, "A mouth and wisdom," together, completely fit a man both for services and sufferings; wisdom to know what to say, and a mouth wherewith to say it as it should be said. It is a great happiness to have both matter and words wherewith to honour God and do good; to have in the mind a storehouse well furnished with things new and old, and a door of utterance by which to bring them forth. Secondly, Those that plead Christ's cause may depend upon him to give them a mouth and wisdom, "which way soever they are called to plead it; especially when they are brought before magistrates for his name's sake. It is not said, he will send an angel from heaven to answer for them, though he could do that; but he will give them "a mouth and wisdom" to enable them to answer for themselves; which puts a greater honour upon them, which requires them to use the gifts and graces Christ furnisheth them with, and redounds the more to the glory of God, who stills the enemy and the avenger out of the mouths of babes and sucklings. Thirdly, When Christ gives to his witnesses "a mouth and wisdom," they are enabled to say that, both for him and themselves, "which all their adversaries are not able to gainsay or resist;" so that they are silenced and put to confusion. This was remarkably fulfilled presently after by the pouring out of the Spirit, by whom Christ gave his disciples this mouth and wisdom, when the apostles were brought before the priests and rulers, and answered them so as to make them ashamed, Acts iv. 5, 6.

3rd. You shall suffer no real damage by all the hardships they shall put upon you; ver. 18, "there shall not a hair of your head perish." Shall some of them lose their heads, and yet not lose a hair? It is a proverbial expression, speaking the greatest indemnity and security imaginable; it is frequently used, both in the Old Testament and New Testament, in that sense. Some think it refers to the preservation of the lives of all the Christians that were among the Jews when they were cut off by the Romans; historians tell us there was not one Christian perished in that desolation. Others reconcile it with the deaths of multitudes in the cause of Christ, and take it figuratively in the same sense that Christ saith, "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." Not a hair of your head shall perish; but, First, I shall take cognizance of it. To this end he had said, Mat. x. 30, "the hairs of your head are all numbered," and an account is kept of them; so that none of them shall perish but he will miss it. Secondly, It shall be upon a valuable consideration. We do not reckon that lost or perishing which is laid out for good purposes, and will turn to a good account. If we drop the body itself for Christ's name sake, it doth not perish, but is well bestowed. Thirdly, It shall be abundantly recompensed. When you come to balance profit and loss, you will find there is nothing perished; but, on the contrary, you have great gain in present comforts, especially in the joys of a life eternal; so that, though we may be losers for Christ, we shall not, we cannot be losers by him in the end.

4th. It is therefore your duty and interest, in the midst of your own sufferings and those of the nation, to maintain a holy sincerity and serenity of mind, which will keep you always easy; ver. 19, "In your patience possess ye your souls;" get and keep possession of your souls. Some read it as a promise; You may, or shall, possess your souls; it comes all to one. Note, First, It is our duty and interest at all times, especially in perilous, trying times, to secure the possession of our own souls; not only that they be not destroyed and lost for ever, but that they be not distempered now, nor our possession of them disturbed and interrupted. "Possess your souls;" that is, Be your own men, keep up the authority and dominion of reason, and keep under the tumults of passion, that neither grief nor fear may tyrannize over you, or turn you out of the possession and enjoyment of yourselves. In difficult times, when we can keep possession of nothing else, then let us make that sure which may be made sure, and keep possession of our souls. Secondly, It is by patience, Christian patience, that we keep possession of our own souls. In suffering times, set patience upon the guard, for the preserving of your souls; by it keep your souls composed and in a good frame, and keep out all those impressions which would ruffle you, and put you out of temper.

20 And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. 21 Then let them which are in Judæa flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them that are world to be a continuation of this in so wide a sense as to include the permanence of the marriage bond.

xx. 34. There are some points in this reply which are not found in the other gospels. Where men die, marriage is a necessity; but where they die no more, wedlock is superfluous. In the better world earthly relations, as husband and wife, parent and child, are merged into the higher relationship of children of God. Beyond this nothing is told, but it removes the difficulty raised by the Sadducees.

xx. 47. The word for "show" signifies display or pretence. The term rendered "damnation" denotes a sentence of condemnation.

xxi. 1. According to the Talmudists, the treasury was in the court of the women, and consisted of thirteen chests with openings for gifts.

xxi. 2. The mite was the smallest Jewish coin, and equal in value to about the fifth part of an English halfpenny.

xxi. 5. "Goodly stones" are handsome, fine, or magnificent stones.

in the countries enter thereinto. 22 For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled. 23 But woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck, in those days! for there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people. 24 And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. 25 And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; 26 Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. 27 And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. 28 And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh.

Having given them an idea of the times for about thirty-eight years next ensuing, he here comes to shew them what all those things would issue in at last; namely, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the utter dispersion of the Jewish nation; which would be a little day of judgment, a type and figure of Christ's second coming, which was not so fully spoken of here as in the parallel place, Mat. xxiv., yet glanced at; for the destruction of Jerusalem would be as it were the destruction of the world, to those whose hearts were bound up in it.

I. He tells them that they should see Jerusalem besieged, "compassed with armies," ver. 20, the Roman armies; and when they saw that, they might conclude that its desolation was nigh, for in that the siege would infallibly end, though it might be a long siege. Note, As in mercy, so in judgment; when God begins, he will make an end.

II. He warns them upon the signal given to shift for their own safety; ver. 21, "Then let them which are in Judæa quit the country, and flee to the mountains; let them which are in the midst of it" that is, of Jerusalem, "depart out," before the city be closely shut up, and (as we say now) before the trenches be opened; and let not them that are in the countries and villages about enter into the city, thinking to be safe there. Do you abandon a city and country which you see God has abandoned and given up to ruin. "Come out of her, my people."

III. He foretells the terrible havoc that should be made of the Jewish nation; ver. 22, "Those be the days of vengeance," so often spoken of by the Old Testament prophets, which would complete the ruin of that provoking people; all their predictions must now be fulfilled; and the blood of all the Old Testament martyrs must now be required; "all things that are written must be fulfilled" at length. After days of patience long abused there will come "days of vengeance;" for reprieves are not pardons. The greatness of that destruction is set forth. 1. By the inflicting cause of it; it is "wrath upon this people," the wrath of God, that will kindle this devouring, consuming fire. 2. By the particular terror it would be to women with child, and poor mothers that are nurses; "woe to them," not only because they are most subject to frights, and least able to shift for their own safety, but because it will be a very great torment to them to think of having borne and nursed children for the murderers. 3. By the general confusion that should be all the nation over; there "shall be great distress in the land," for men will not know what course to take, nor how to help themselves.

IV. He describes the issue of the struggles between the Jews and the Romans, and what they will come to at last. In short, 1. Multitudes of them "shall fall by the edge of the sword." It is computed, in those wars of the Jews, there fell by the sword above eleven hundred thousand; and the siege of Jerusalem was in effect a military execution. 2. The rest "shall be led away captive;" not into one nation, as when they were conquered by the Chaldeans, which gave them an opportunity of keeping together, but "into all nations," which made it impossible for them to correspond with each other, much less to incorporate. 3. Jerusalem itself was "trodden down of the Gentiles;" the Romans, when they had made themselves masters of it, laid it quite waste, as a "rebellious and bad city, hurtful to kings and provinces," and therefore hateful to them.

V. He describes the great frights that people should generally be in; many frightful sights shall be in the sun, moon, and stars, prodigies in the heavens, and here in this lower world, "the sea and the waves roaring," with terrible storms and tempests, such as had not been known, and above the ordinary working of natural causes; the effect of which shall be a universal confusion and consternation "upon the earth, distress of nations with perplexity," ver. 25. Dr. Hammond understands "by the nations," the several governments or tetrarchies of the Jewish nation—Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee; these shall be brought to the last extremity. "Men's hearts shall fail them for fear," ver. 26; ἀπολυγίσσαντο ἡνθρώπων, "men being quite examined,"—dispirited, unsouled, dying away for fear. Thus they "are killed all the day long," (by whom Christ's apostles were so, Rom. viii. 36); that is, they are all the day long in fear of being killed, sinking under that which lies upon them, and yet still trembling for fear of worse, and "looking after those things which are coming upon the earth." When "judgment begins at the house of God," it will not end there; it shall be as if all the world were falling in pieces, and where can any be secure then? "The powers of heaven shall be shaken," and then the pillars of the earth cannot but tremble. Thus shall the present Jewish policy, religion, laws, and government be all entirely dissolved by a series of unparalleled calamities, attended with the utmost confusion; so Dr. Clark. But our Saviour makes use of these figurative expressions because at the end of time they shall be literally accomplished, when the "heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll," and all their powers not only shaken, but broken, and "the earth and all the works that are therein shall be burned up," 2 Pet. iii. 10, 12. As that day was all terror and destruction to the unbelieving Jews, so the great day will be to all unbelievers.

VI. He makes this to be a kind of appearing of the Son of man; ver. 27, "Then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." The destruction of Jerusalem was in a particular manner an act of Christ's judgment, the judgment committed to the Son of man; his religion could never be thoroughly established but by the destruction of the temple, and the abolishing of the Levitical priesthood and economy, after which even the converted Jews, and many of the Gentiles too, were still hankering, till they were destroyed; so that it might justly be looked upon as a coming of the Son of man in power and great glory; yet not visibly, but in the clouds, for in executing such judgments as these, "clouds and darkness are round about him." Now this was, 1. An evidence of the first coming of the Messiah, so some understand it. Then the unbelieving Jews shall be convinced, when it is too late, that Jesus was the Messiah. They that would not see him coming in the power of his grace to save them, shall be made to see him coming in the power of his wrath to destroy them—that would not have him to reign over them, shall have him to triumph over them. 2. It was an earnest of his second coming; then, in the terrors of that day, "they shall see the Son of man coming in a cloud," and all the terrors of the last day: they shall see a specimen of it, a faint resemblance of it; if this be so terrible, what will that be?

VII. He encourageth all the faithful disciples in reference to the terrors of that day; ver. 28, "When these things begin to come to pass," when Jerusalem is besieged, and every thing is concurring to the destruction of the Jews, then do you look up, when others are looking down; look heavenwards in faith, hope, and prayer, and "lift up your heads" with cheerfulness and confidence, "for your redemption draweth nigh." 1. When Christ came to destroy the Jews, he came to redeem the Christians that were persecuted and oppressed by them; "then had the churches rest." 2. When he comes to judge the world at the last day, he will redeem all that are his from all their grievances. And the foresight of that day is as pleasant to all good Christians as it is terrible to the wicked and ungodly. Their death itself is so; when they see that day approaching, they can "lift up their heads with joy," knowing that "their redemption draws nigh—their remove to their Redeemer."

VIII. Here is one word of prediction that looks farther than the destruction of the Jewish nation, which is not easily understood; we have it, ver. 24, that "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." 1. Some understand it of what is past, so Dr. Hammond. The Gentiles that have conquered Jerusalem shall keep possession of it, and it shall be purely Gentile, till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled—till a great part of the Gentile world is become Christian; and then, after Jerusalem is rebuilt by Adrian the emperor, with an exclusion of all the Jews from it, many of the Jews shall turn Christians—shall join with the Gentile Christians to set up a church in Jerusalem, which shall flourish there for a long time. 2. Others understand it of what is yet to come, so Dr. Whitby. Jerusalem shall be possessed by the Gentiles, of one sort or other, for the most part, till the time comes when the nations that yet remain infidels shall embrace the Christian faith; when the kingdoms of this world shall become Christ's kingdoms, and then all the Jews shall be converted; Jerusalem shall be inhabited by them, and neither they nor their city any longer trodden down by the Gentiles.

29 And he spake to them a parable; Behold the fig tree, and all the trees; 30 When they now shoot forth, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand. 31 So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. 32 Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away, till all be fulfilled. 33 Heaven and earth shall pass away: but my words shall not pass away. 34 And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. 35 For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. 36 Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man. 37 And in the day time he was teaching in the temple; and at night he went out, and abode in the mount that is called the mount of Olives. 38 And all the people came early in the morning to him in the temple, for to hear him.

Here, in the close of this discourse,

I. Christ appoints his disciples to observe the signs of the times, which they might judge by, if they had an eye to the foregoing directions, with as much certainty and assurance as they could judge of the approach of summer by the budding forth of the trees, ver. 29–31. As in the kingdom of nature there is a chain of causes, so in the kingdom of providence there is a consequence of one event upon another. When we see a nation filling up the measure of their iniquity, we may conclude their ruin is nigh; when we see the ruin of persecuting powers hastening on, we may from thence infer that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand, that when the opposition given to it is removed, it shall gain ground. As we may lawfully prognosticate the change of the seasons,

It is well known that many of them were exceedingly large. The "gifts," or offerings, were probably the ornaments given as presents. The splendour of the building is attested by Tacitus, and also by Josephus, who gives valuable details in Book xv. chap. 11 of his "Jewish Antiquities." See also "Wars of the Jews," vi. 4.

xxi. 8. As pointed out by some of the expositors, the words "the time draweth near" are spoken by the "many" who come in the name of Christ. It is said that no impostors pretending to be the Messiah appeared before the fall of Jerusalem. Barchochaba, who is reckoned as the first of more than sixty seducers, did not appear till some time after (Osterzee). There were, however, numerous deceivers who pretended to be inspired prophets, or otherwise divinely commissioned. The names of some of these are very well known.

xxi. 10, 11. The critic last named says, "The tumults, earthquakes, famines, and other calamities here mentioned, were by no means so unimportant before the destruction of Jerusalem as some when second causes have begun to work, so we may, in the disposal of events, expect something uncommon, when God is already raised up "out of his holy habitation," Zec. ii. 13; then "stand still and see his salvation."

II. He chargeth them to look upon those things neither as doubtful nor distant, for then they would not make a due impression on them; but as sure, and very near. The destruction of the Jewish nation, 1. Was near; ver. 32, "This generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled;" there were some now alive that should see it, some that now heard the prediction of it. 2. It was sure; the sentence was irreversible, it was a consumption determined, the decree was gone forth; ver. 33, "Heaven and earth shall pass away," sooner than any word of mine; nay, they certainly shall pass away, "but my words shall not;" whether they take hold or no, they will take effect, and not one of them fall to the ground, 1 Sam. iii. 19.

III. He cautions them against security and sensuality, by which they would disfit themselves for the trying times that were coming on, and make them to be a great surprise and terror to them; ver. 34, 35, "Take heed to yourselves." This is the word of command given to all Christ's disciples, "Take heed to yourselves," that you be not overpowered by temptations, nor betrayed by your own corruptions. Note, We cannot be safe, if we be secure. It concerns us at all times, but especially at some times, to be very cautious.

See here, 1. What our danger is, that the day of death and judgment should come upon us unawares, when we do not expect it, and are not prepared for it, —lest when we are called to meet our Lord, that be found the farthest thing in our thoughts which ought always to be laid nearest our hearts, lest it come upon us as a snare; for so it will come upon the most of men who dwell upon the earth, and mind earthly things only, and have no converse with Heaven, to them it will be as a snare; see Ecc. ix. 12. It will be a terror and a destruction to them; it will put them into an inexpressible fright, and hold them fast for a doom yet more frightful. 2. What our duty is in consideration of this danger; we must take heed lest our hearts be overcharged, lest they be burthened and overloaded, and so disfigured and disabled to do what must be done in preparation for death and judgment. Two things we must watch against, lest our hearts be overcharged with them. 1st. The indulging of the appetites of the body, and allowing ourselves in the gratifications of sense to an excess; "Take heed lest you be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness," the immoderate use of meat and drink, which burthen the heart, not only with the guilt thereby contracted, but by the ill influence which such disorders of the body have upon the mind; they make men dull and lifeless to their duty, dead and listless in their duty; they stupefy the conscience, and make the mind unaffected with those things that are most affecting. 2nd. The inordinate pursuit of the good things of this world; the heart is overcharged with "the cares of this life." The former is the snare of those that are given to their pleasures; this is the snare of the men of business that will be rich. We have need to guard on both hands; not only lest at the time when death comes, but lest at any time, our hearts should be thus overcharged: our caution against sin, and our care of our own souls, must be constant.

IV. He counsels them to prepare and get ready for this great day, ver. 36: where see, 1. What should be our aim: that we "may be accounted worthy to escape all those things;" that when the judgments of God are abroad, we may be preserved from the malignity of them, that either we may not be involved in the common calamity, or it may not be that to us that it is to others; that in the day of death we may escape the sting of it, which is the wrath of God and the damnation of hell. Yet we must aim, not only to escape that, but "to stand before the Son of man;" not only to stand acquitted before him as our Judge, Ps. i. 5, to have boldness in the day of Christ, that is supposed in our escaping all those things,—but to stand before him, to attend on him as our Master, to stand continually before his throne, and serve him day and night in his temple, Rev. vii. 15; always to behold his face, as the angels, Mat. xviii. 10. The saints are here said to be accounted worthy, as before, ch. x. 35. God, by the good work of his grace in them, makes them meet for this happiness; and by the good will of his grace towards them, accounts them worthy of it. But, as Grotius here saith, a great part of our worthiness lies in an acknowledgment of our own unworthiness. 2. What should be our actings in these aims: "Watch therefore, and pray always." Watching and praying must go together, Neh. iv. 9. Those that would escape the wrath to come, and make sure the joys to come, must watch and pray, and must do it always, must make it the constant business of their lives; 1st. To keep a guard upon themselves; watch against sin, watch to every duty, and to the improvement of every opportunity of doing good. Be awake, and keep awake, in expectation of your Lord's coming, that you may be in a right frame to receive him, and bid him welcome. 2nd. To keep up their communion with God, "pray always;" be always in habitual disposition to that duty; keep up stated times for it, abound in it; pray upon all occasions. Those shall be accounted worthy to live a life of praise in the other world, that live a life of prayer in this world.

In the two last verses we have an account how Christ disposed of himself during those three or four days betwixt his riding in triumph into Jerusalem and the night in which he was betrayed. 1. He was all day teaching in the temple; Christ preached on week days as well as sabbath days. He was an indefatigable preacher; he preached in the face of opposition, and in the midst of those that he knew sought occasion against him. 2. At night he went out to lodge at a friend's house, in the mount of Olives, about a mile out of town. It is likely he had some friends in the city that would gladly have lodged him, but he was willing to retire in the evening out of the noise of the town, that he might have more time for secret devotion, now his hour was at hand. 3. Early in the morning he was in the temple again, where he had a morning lecture for those that were willing to attend it, and the people were forward to hear one that they saw forward to preach, ver. 38. They all came early in the morning flocking to the temple, like doves to their windows, for to hear him, though the chief priests and scribes did all they could to prejudice them against him. Sometimes the taste and relish which serious, honest, plain people have of good preaching is more to be valued and judged by, than the opinion of the witty and learned, and those in authority.

CHAPTER XXII.

All the evangelists, whatever they omit, give us a particular account of the death and resurrection of Christ, because he died for our sins, and rose for our justification; and this evangelist as fully as any, and with many circumstances and passages added, which we had not before. In this chapter we have, I. The plot to take Jesus, and Judas' coming into it, ver. 1–6. II. Christ's eating the passover with his disciples, ver. 7–18. III. The instituting of the Lord's supper, ver. 19, 20. IV. Christ's discourse with his disciples, after supper, upon several heads, ver. 21–38. V. His agony in the garden, ver. 39–46. VI. The apprehending of him by the assistance of Judas, ver. 47–53. VII. Peter's denying him, ver. 54–62. VIII. The indignities done to Christ by those that had him in custody, and his trial and condemnation in the ecclesiastical court, ver. 63–71.

(for instance De Wette) have maintained. If we consider the massacres at Caesarea of Syrians and Jews, in which 20,000 of the latter perished, while in Syria almost every city was divided into two parties, who opposed each other as mortal enemies; the quick succession, within a few years, of the five emperors Nero, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasian, and the more or less extensive disturbances connected with their accessions; the famine in the reign of Claudius (Acts xi. 28); the earthquakes in Campania and Asia Minor, whereby

NOW the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the Passover. 2 And the chief priests and scribes sought how they might kill him; for they feared the people. 3 Then entered Satan into Judas surnamed Iscariot, being of the number of the twelve. 4 And he went his way, and communed with the chief priests and captains, how he might betray him unto them. 5 And they were glad, and covenanted to give him money. 6 And he promised, and sought opportunity to betray him unto them in the absence of the multitude.

The year of the redeemed is now come, which had been from eternity fixed in the Divine counsels, and long looked for by them that waited for the consolation of Israel; after the revolutions of many ages, it is at length come, Isa. lxiii. 4; and it is observable, it is in the very first month of that year, that the redemption is wrought out, so much in haste was the Redeemer to perform his undertaking, so was he straitened till it was accomplished. It was in the same month, and at the same time of the month, (in the beginning of months, Ex. xii. 2) that God by Moses brought Israel out of Egypt, that the antitype might answer the type. Christ is here delivered up, when "the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh," ver. 1. About as long before that feast as they began to make preparation for it, here was preparation making for our Passover's being offered for us.

First. Here we have his sworn enemies contriving it, ver. 2: the chief priests, men of sanctity, and the scribes, men of learning, seeking how they might kill him, either by force or fraud: could they have had their will, it had been soon done; but "they feared the people," and the more for what they now saw of their diligent attendance upon his preaching.

Secondly. A treacherous disciple joining in with them, and coming to their assistance, Judas surnamed Iscariot. He is here said to be "of the number of the twelve," that dignified, distinguished number. One would wonder that Christ, who knew all men, should take a traitor into that number; and that one of that number, who could not but know Christ, should be so base as to betray him; but Christ had wise and holy ends in taking Judas to be a disciple, and how he who knew Christ so well, yet came to betray him, we are here told, ver. 3. Satan entered into Judas; it was the devil's work, who thought hereby to ruin Christ's undertaking, to have broke his head; but it proved only the bruising of his heel. Whoever betrays Christ, or his truths, or ways, it is Satan that puts them upon it. Judas knew how desirous the chief priests were to get Christ into their hands, and that they could not do it safely without the assistance of some that knew his retirements, as he did. He therefore went himself, and made the motion to them, ver. 4. Note, It is hard to say whether more mischief is done to Christ's kingdom by the power and policy of its open enemies, or by the treachery and self-seeking of its pretended friends. Nay, without that, its enemies could not gain their point as they do. When you see Judas communing with the chief priests, be sure some mischief is in hatching; it is for no good that they are laying their heads together.

The issue of the treaty between them is, 1. That Judas must betray Christ to them—must bring them to a place where they might seize him without danger of tumult; and this they would be glad of. 2. They must give him a sum of money for doing it; and that he would be glad of, ver. 5. They "covenanted to give him money." When the bargain was made, Judas "sought opportunity to betray him;" probably he silly inquired of Peter and John, who were more intimate with their Master than he was, where he would be at such a time, and whether he would retire after the passover; and they were not sharp enough to suspect him. Somehow or other, in a little time, he gained the advantage he sought; and fixed the time and place where it might be done, "in the absence of the multitude," and without tumult.

7 Then came the day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed. 8 And he sent Peter and John, saying, Go and prepare us the passover, that we may eat. 9 And they said unto him, Where wilt thou that we prepare? 10 And he said unto them, Behold, when ye are entered into the city, there shall a man meet you, bearing a pitcher of water; follow him into the house where he entereth in. 11 And ye shall say unto the goodman of the house, The Master saith unto thee, Where is the guestchamber, where I shall eat the passover with my disciples? 12 And he shall shew you a large upper room furnished: there make ready. 13 And they went, and found as he had said unto them: and they made ready the passover. 14 And whole cities were destroyed; in Nero's reign, the strange and terrible signs in Judea spoken of by Tacitus and Josephus, we shall find in the history of those times an adequate solution of our Lord's enigmatical expressions." It would be easy to add to this summary, which, nevertheless, well illustrates our Lord's words.

xxi. 21. Alford takes the word rendered "countries" in the sense of "fields," but it may mean the country places round about Jerusalem.

when the hour was come, he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him. 15 And he said unto them, With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer: 16 For I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God. 17 And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves: 18 For I say unto you, I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come. 19 And he took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them, saying, This is my body which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me. 20 Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you.

What a hopeful prospect had we of Christ's doing a great deal of good by his preaching in the temple during the feast of unleavened bread, which continued seven days, when the people were every morning, and early in the morning, so attentive to hear him; but here is a stop put to it; he must enter upon work of another kind; but in that he shall do more good than in the other, for neither Christ's nor his church's suffering days are their idle, empty days. Now here we have,

First. The preparation that was made for Christ's eating the passover with his disciples, upon the very "day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed," according to the law, ver. 7. Christ was made under the law, and observed the ordinances of it, and particularly that of the passover, to teach us in like manner to observe his gospel institutions, particularly that of the Lord's supper, and not to neglect them. It is probable he went to the temple to preach in the morning, when he sent Peter and John another way, into the city, to prepare the passover. Those who have attendants about them, to do their secular business for them in a great measure, must not think that that allows them to be idle, but it engageth them to employ themselves more in spiritual business, or service to the public. He directed those whom he employed whither they should go, ver. 9, 10; they must follow a man bearing a pitcher of water, and he must be their guide to the house. Christ could have described the house to them; probably it was a house they knew, and he might have said no more but, go to such a one's house, or to a house in such a street, with such a sign, &c.; but he directed them thus, to teach them to depend upon the conduct of Providence, and to follow that step by step. They went, not knowing whither they went, but whom they followed. Being come to the house, they must desire the master of the house to shew them a room, ver. 11, and he will readily do it, ver. 12. Whether it was a friend's house, or a public house, doth not appear; but the disciples found their guide, and the house, and the room, just as he had said to them, ver. 13; for they need not fear a disappointment who go upon Christ's word; and, according to the orders given them, they got every thing ready for the passover, ver. 13.

Secondly. The solemnizing of the passover according to the law. "When the hour was come," that they should go to supper, "he sat down," it is likely, at the head end of the table, "and the twelve apostles with him," Judas not excepted; for it is possible that they whose hearts are filled with Satan and all manner of wickedness, may yet continue a plausible profession of religion, and be found in the performance of its external services; and while it is in the heart, and doth not break out into any thing scandalous, such cannot be denied the external privileges of their external profession. Though Judas has already been guilty of an overt act of treason, yet, it not being publicly known, Christ admits him to sit down with the rest at the passover. Now observe,

1. How Christ bids this passover welcome, to teach us in like manner to welcome his passover, the Lord's supper, and to come to it with an appetite, ver. 15: "With desire I have desired," "I have most earnestly desired," "to eat this passover with you, before I suffer." He knew it was to be the prologue to his sufferings, and therefore he desired it, because it was in order to his Father's glory, and man's redemption; he delighted to do even this part of the will of God concerning him as Mediator. Shall we be backward to any service for him who was so forward in the work of our salvation? See the love he had to his disciples; he desired to eat it with them, that he and they might have a little time together, themselves, and none but they, for private conversation, which they could not have in Jerusalem but upon this occasion. He was now about to leave them, but was very desirous to eat this passover with them before he suffered, as if the comfort of that would carry him the more cheerfully through his sufferings, and make them the easier to him. Note. Our gospel passover, eaten by faith, with Jesus Christ, will be an excellent preparation for sufferings, and trials, and death itself.

2. How Christ in it takes his leave of all passovers, thereby signifying his abrogating of all the ordinances of the ceremonial law, of which that of the passover was one of the earliest, and one of the most eminent; ver. 16, "I will not any more eat thereof," nor shall it be any more celebrated by my disciples," "until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God." 1st. It was fulfilled, when Christ our passover was sacrificed for us, 1 Cor. v. 7; and therefore that type and shadow was laid aside, because now in the kingdom of God the substance was come, which superseded them. 2nd. It was fulfilled in the Lord's supper, an ordinance of the gospel kingdom, in which the passover had its accomplishment, and which the disciples, after the pouring out of the Spirit, did frequently celebrate; as we find Acts ii. 42, 46. They ate of it, and Christ might be said to eat with them, because of the spiritual communion they had with him in that ordinance; he is said to sup with them, and they with him, 1 Cor. xiii. 20. But, 3rd. The complete accomplishment of that commemoration of liberty will be in the kingdom of glory, when all God's spiritual Israel shall be released from the bondage of death and sin, and be put in possession of the land of promise.

What he had said of his eating of the paschal lamb, he repeats concerning his drinking of the passover wine—the cup of blessing or of thanksgiving, in which all the company pledged the master of the feast, at the close of the passover supper. This cup he took, according to the custom, and gave thanks for the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, and the preservation of their firstborn, and then said, "Take this, and divide it among yourselves," ver. 17. This is not said afterwards of the sacramental cup; probably that being of much more weight and value, being the new testament in his blood, he might give that into every one's hand, to teach them to make a particular application of it to their own souls; but as for the paschal cup, which is to be abolished, it is enough to say, "Take it, and divide it among yourselves," "do what you will with it, for we shall have no more occasion for it;" ver. 18, "I will not drink of the fruit of the vine" any more, "I will not have it any more drunk of," "until the kingdom of God shall come," till the Spirit be poured out, and then you shall in the Lord's supper commemorate a much more glorious redemption, of which both the deliverance out of Egypt, and the passover commemoration of it, were types and figures. The kingdom of God is now so near being set up, that you will not need to eat or drink any more till it comes. Christ dying next day opened it. As Christ with a great deal of pleasure took leave of all the legal feasts (which fell of course with the passover) for the evangelical ones, both spiritual and sacramental, so may good Christians, when they are called to remove from the church militant to that which is triumphant, cheerfully exchange even their spiritual repasts, much more their sacramental ones, for the eternal feast.

Thirdly. The institution of the Lord's supper, ver. 19, 20. The passover and the deliverance out of Egypt were typical and prophetic signs of a Christ to come, that should by dying deliver us from sin and death, and the tyranny of Satan; but they shall no more say, "the Lord liveth that brought us up out of the land of Egypt;" a much greater deliverance shall eclipse the lustre of that, and therefore the Lord's supper is instituted to be a commemorative sign or memorial of a Christ already come, that has by dying delivered us and it is his death that is in a special manner set before us in that ordinance.

1. The breaking of Christ's body, as a sacrifice for us, is here commemorated by the breaking of bread; and the sacrifices under the law were called the bread of our God, Lev. xxi. 6, 8, 17, "This is my body, which is given for you." And there is a feast upon that sacrifice instituted, in which we are to apply it to ourselves, and to take the benefit and comfort of it; this bread, that was given for us, is given to us, to be food to our souls; for nothing can be more nourishing and satisfying to our souls than the doctrine of Christ's making atonement for sin, and the assurance of our interest in that atonement; this bread, that was broken and given for us, to satisfy for the guilt of our sins, is broken and given to us, to satisfy the desire of our souls. And this we do in remembrance of what he did for us when he died for us, and for a memorial of what we do in making ourselves partakers of him, and joining ourselves to him in an everlasting covenant; like the stone Joshua set up for a witness, Jos. xxiv. 27.

2. The shedding of Christ's blood, by which the atonement was made, (for the blood made atonement for the soul, Lev. xvii. 11.) as represented by the wine in the cup; and that cup of wine is a sign and token of the new testament, or new covenant made with us. It commemorates the purchase of the covenant by the blood of Christ, and confirms the promises of the covenant, which are all yea and amen in him. This will be reviving and refreshing to our souls, as wine that makes glad the heart. In all our commemorations of the shedding of Christ's blood, we must have an eye to it as shed for us; we needed it; we take hold of it; we hope to have benefit by it; "who loved me, and gave himself for me." And in all our regards to the new testament, we must have an eye to the blood of Christ, which gave life and being to it, and seals to us all the promises of it. Had it not been for the blood of Christ, we had never had the new testament; and had it not been for the new testament, we had never known the meaning of Christ's blood shed.

21 But, behold, the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table. 22 And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed! 23 And they began to enquire among themselves, which of them it was that should do this thing. 24 And there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest. 25 And he said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. 26 But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve. 27 For whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth? is not he that sitteth at meat? but I am among you as he that serveth. 28 Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations. 29 And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; 30 That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. 31 And the Lord said, Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat: 32 But I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not: and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren. 33 And he said unto him, Lord, I am ready to go with thee, both into prison, xxi. 24. The same Greek word is here translated "nations" and "Gentiles," with no difference of meaning. The oppression of the Jews would continue as long as successive Gentile nations ruled over their country. Some think "the times of the Gentiles" are the periods before appointed for the accomplishment of the judgment threatened. Other explanations have been suggested.

xxi. 34, 35. These verses are peculiar to Luke, and embody important warnings against a careless and worldly spirit. Some copies read, "come upon you unawares as a snare. For it shall come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth."

xxi. 37, 38. This passage is peculiar to Luke, and shows the manner in which the Lord was occupied during these last days. The Cambridge MS. transposes the final words, and reads, "to hear him in the Temple." Four MSS. insert after verse 38 the passage respecting the adulteress, now found in John vii. 53—viii. 11. If, however, that celebrated record is genuine, it belongs to John and not Luke.

and to death. 34 And he said, I tell thee, Peter, the cock shall not crow this day, before that thou shalt thrice deny that thou knowest me. 35 And he said unto them, When I sent you without purse, and scrip, and shoes, lacked ye any thing? And they said, Nothing. 36 Then said he unto them, But now, he that hath a purse, let him take it, and likewise his scrip: and he that hath no sword, let him sell his garment, and buy one. 37 For I say unto you, that this that is written must yet be accomplished in me, And he was reckoned among the transgressors: for the things concerning me have an end. 38 And they said, Lord, behold, here are two swords. And he said unto them, It is enough.

We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples after supper, much of which is new here; and in St. John's Gospel we shall find more that is new still. We should take example from him to entertain and edify our family and friends with such discourse at table as is good and to the use of edifying, which may minister grace to the hearers; but especially after we have been at the Lord's table, by Christian conference to keep one another in a suitable frame. The matters Christ here discoursed of were of weight, and to the present purpose.

First. He discoursed with them concerning him that should betray him, who was now present.

1. He signifies to them that the traitor was now among them, and one of them, ver. 21. By the placing of this after the institution of the Lord's supper, which in Matthew and Mark is placed before it, it seems plain that Judas did receive the Lord's supper, did eat of that bread, and drink of that cup; for after the solemnity was over, Christ said, "Behold the hand of him that betrayeth me, is with me on the table." There have been those that have eaten bread with Christ, and yet have betrayed him.

2. He foretells that the treason would take effect; ver. 22. "truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined," goeth to the place where he will be betrayed, for he is delivered up by the counsel and foreknowledge of God, else Judas could not have delivered him up. Christ was not driven to his sufferings, but cheerfully went to them; he said, "Lo, I come!"

3. He threatens the traitor; "woe to that man by whom he is betrayed." Note, Neither the patience of the saints under their sufferings, nor the counsel of God concerning their sufferings, will be any excuse for those that have any hand in their sufferings, or that persecute them. Though God has determined that Christ shall be betrayed, and he himself has cheerfully submitted to it, yet Judas's sin or punishment is not at all the less.

4. He frightens the rest of the disciples into a suspicion of themselves, by saying it was one of them, and not naming which; ver. 23, "they began to inquire among themselves," to interrogate themselves, to put the question to themselves, "who it was that should do this thing," that could be so base to so good a Master. The inquiry was not, Is it you? or, Is it such a one? but, Is it I?

Secondly. Concerning the strife that was among them, for precedency or supremacy.

1. See what the dispute was, "which of them should be accounted the greatest." Such and so many contests as we find among the disciples for dignity and dominion, before the Spirit was poured upon them, was a sad presage of the like strifes for and affectations of supremacy in the churches, after the Spirit should be provoked to depart from them. How inconsistent is this with that in the verse before! There they were inquiring which would be the traitor, and here, which should be the prince. Could such an instance of humility, and such an instance of pride and vanity, be found in the same men, so near together? This is like sweet waters and bitter, proceeding at the same place out of the same fountain; what a self-contradiction is the deceitful heart of man!

2. See what Christ said to this dispute. He was not sharp upon them, as might have been expected, he having so often reproved them for this very thing, but mildly shewed them the sin and folly of it.

1st. This was to make themselves like the kings of the Gentiles, that affect worldly pomp, and worldly power, ver. 25; they exercise lordship over their subjects, and are ever and anon striving to exercise lordship too over the princes that are about them, though as good as themselves, if they think them not so strong as themselves. Note, The exercising of lordship better becomes the kings of the Gentiles than the ministers of Christ. But observe, "they that exercise authority," and take upon themselves to bear sway, and give law, they are called benefactors, Ευεργετας; they call themselves so, and so their flatterers call them, and those that set themselves to serve their interests. It is pretended, that they have been benefactors, and upon that account they should be admitted to have rule; nay, that in exercising authority they are benefactors; however they really serve themselves, they would be thought to serve their country. One of the Ptolemies was surnamed Euergetes,—"the benefactor." Now our Saviour, by taking notice of this, intimates, First. That to do good is much more honourable than to look great; for these princes, that were the terror of the mighty, yet would not be called so, but rather the benefactors of the needy; so that, by their own confession, a benefactor to his country is much more valued than a ruler of his country. Secondly. That to do good is the surest way to be great, else they that aimed to be rulers would not have been so solicitous to be called benefactors. This therefore he would have his disciples to believe, that their greatest honour would be to do all the good they could in the world. They would indeed be benefactors to the world, by bringing the Gospel to it. Let them value themselves upon that title, which they would indeed be entitled to; and then they need not strive which should be the greatest, for they would be all greater—greater blessings to mankind—than the kings of the earth, that exercise lordship over them. If they have that which is confessedly the greater honour, of being benefactors, let them despise the lesser, of being rulers.

2nd. It was to make themselves unlike the disciples of Christ, and unlike Christ himself; ver. 26, 27, "ye shall not be so." It was never intended that you should rule any otherwise than by the power of truth and grace, but that you should serve. When church rulers affect external pomp and power, and bear up themselves by secular interests and influences, they debase their office; and it is an instance of degeneracy, like that of Israel, when they would have a king like the nations that were round about them, whereas the Lord was their king.

See here, First. What is the rule Christ gave to his disciples. He that is greater among you, that is senior, to whom precedency is due upon the account of his age, let him be as the younger, both in point of lowliness of place,—let him condescend to sit with the younger, and be free and familiar with them,—and in point of labour and work. We used to say, Juniores ad labores, seniores ad honores,—"Let the young work, and the aged receive their honours;" but let the elder take pains as well as the younger; their age and honour, instead of warranting them to take their ease, binds them to double work. And he that is chief, ὁ ἡγούμενος, the president of the college or assembly, let him be as he that doth serve, ὡς ὁ διακονῶν, as the deacon, let him stoop to the meanest and most toilsome services for the public good, if there be occasion.

Secondly. What was the example which he himself gave to this rule, "Whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth?"—he that attendeth, or he that is attended on? Now Christ was among his disciples just like one that waited at table; he was so far from taking state, or taking his ease, by commanding their attendance upon him, that he was ready to do any office of kindness and service for them; witness his washing their feet. Shall they take upon them the form of princes, who call themselves followers of him that "took upon him the form of a servant?"

3rd. They ought not to strive for worldly honour and grandeur, because he had better honours in reserve for them, of another nature; a kingdom, a feast, a throne for each of them, wherein they should be all share and share alike, and should have no occasion to strive for precedency, ver. 28—30. Where observe,

First. The commendation Christ gives of the disciples for their faithfulness to him; and this was honour enough for them; they needed not to strive for any greater. It is spoken with an air of encomium and applause, "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations;" you are they which have stood by me and stuck to me when others deserted me, and turned their backs upon me. Christ had his temptations; he was despised and rejected of men, reproached and reviled, and endured the contradiction of sinners. But his disciples continued with him, and were afflicted in all his afflictions. It was but little help that they could give him, or service that they could do him; but, however, he took it kindly that they continued with him, and he here owns their kindness, though it was by the assistance of his own grace that they did continue. Christ's disciples had been very defective in their duty; they find their guilt of many mistakes and weaknesses; they were very dull, and very forgetful, and often blundered, yet their Master has passed all by and forgotten it; doth not upbraid them with their infirmities, but gives them this memorable testimonial, "Ye are they which have continued with me." Thus doth he praise at parting, to shew how willing he is to make the best of those whose hearts he knows to be upright with him.

Secondly. The recompence he designed them for their fidelity. And "I appoint," ἀποτίθημαι, "I bequeath," "unto you a kingdom;" or thus, "I appoint to you, as my Father has appointed a kingdom to me, that you may eat and drink at my table." Understand it,

1st. Of what should be done for them in this world. God gave his Son a kingdom among men; the gospel church, which he is the living, quickening, ruling head of; this kingdom he appointed to his apostles and their successors in the ministry of the Gospel, that they should enjoy the comforts and privileges of the Gospel, and help to communicate them to others, by gospel ordinances; and should sit on thrones, as officers of the church, not only declaratively, but exhortatively, "judging the tribes of Israel" that persist in their infidelity, and denouncing the wrath of God against them, and ruling the gospel Israel, the spiritual Israel, by the instituted discipline of the church, administered with gentleness and love. This is the honour reserved for you, Or,

2nd. Of what should be done for them in the other world, which I take to be chiefly meant. Let them go on in their services in this world, their preferences shall be in the other world; God will give them the kingdom, in which they shall be sure to have, First. The richest dainties; for they shall eat and drink at Christ's table in his kingdom, of which he had spoken, ver. 16, 18; they shall partake of those joys and pleasures which were the recompence of his services and sufferings. They shall have a full satisfaction of soul in the vision and fruition of God; and herein they shall have the best society, as at a feast, in the perfection of love. Secondly. The highest dignities. You shall not only be provided for at the royal table, as Mephibosheth at David's, but you shall be preferred to the royal throne—shall sit down with me on my throne, Rev. iii. 21. In the great day you shall sit on thrones, as assessors with Christ, to approve of and applaud his judgment of the twelve tribes of Israel. If the saints shall judge the world, 1 Cor. vi. 2, much more the church.

Thirdly. Concerning Peter's denying of him. And in this part of the discourse we may observe,

1. The general notice Christ gives to Peter of the devil's design upon him and the rest of the apostles; ver. 31, "the Lord said, Simon, Simon," observe, what I say, "Satan hath desired to have you," to have you all in his hands, "that he may sift you as wheat." Peter, that used to be the mouth of the rest in speaking to Christ, is here made the ear of the rest; and what is designed for warning to them all, "all you shall be offended because of me," is directed to Peter, because he was principally concerned, being in a particular manner struck at by the tempter. "Satan has desired to have you." Probably Satan had accused the disciples to God as mercenary in following Christ, and aiming at nothing else therein but enriching and advancing themselves in this world, as he accused Job; "No," saith God, "they are honest men, and men of integrity." "Give me leave to try them," saith Satan, "and Peter particularly." He desired to have them, that he might sift them, that he might shew them to be chaff, and not wheat. The troubles that were now coming upon them were sifting, would try what there was in them; but that was not all; Satan desired to sift them by his temptations, and endeavoured by those troubles to draw them into sin; to put them into a loss and hurry, as corn when it is sifted, to bring the chaff uppermost, or rather, to shake out the wheat, and leave nothing but the chaff. Observe, Satan could not sift them unless God gave him leave; he desired to have them, as he begged of God a permission to try and tempt Job. Εἰς τῆς αὐτοῦ. He hath challenged you, has undertaken to prove you a company of hypocrites, and Peter especially, the forwardest of you. Som suggest that Satan demanded leave to sift them, as their punishment for striving who should be greatest, in which contest Peter perhaps was very warm: "Leave them to me to sift them for it."

2. The particular encouragement he gave to Peter in reference to this trial: "I have prayed for thee," because, though he desired to have them all, was permitted to make his strongest onset upon thee only; thou wilt be most violently assailed, "but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not," that

xxii. 4. The persons here called "captains" are said to have been the officers of the guards whose duty was to watch the Temple. They seem to be the same as are called "captains of the Temple" in ver. 52. The guards were Jewish priests and Levites.

xxii. 7. "The day of unleavened bread" here indicates the first day of the festival called "the feast of unleavened bread" in ver. 1. The removal of all leaven was of course effected on the preceding day. On this day the Jews began to eat unleavened bread, and on this day the law required them to sacrifice the Passover. This was therefore the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, and the fifth day of the week, or Thursday. The same time is indicated by Mark xiv. 12 and Matt. xvi. 17; compare also John xiii. 1.

xxii. 10. It has been acutely suggested that the fetching and t may not totally and finally fail. Note, 1st. If faith be kept up in an hour of temptation, though we may fail, yet we shall not be utterly cast down. Faith will quench Satan's fiery darts. 2nd. Though there may be many failings in the faith of true believers, yet there shall not be a total and final failure of their faith. It is their seed, their root remaining in them. 3rd. It is owing to the mediation and intercession of Jesus Christ, that the faith of his disciples, though sometimes sadly shaken, yet is not sunk. If they were left to themselves they would fail, but they "are kept by the power of God," and the prayer of Christ. The intercession of Christ is not only general, for all that believe, but for particular believers; "I have prayed for thee," which is an encouragement for us to pray for ourselves, and an engagement upon us to pray for others too.

3. The charge he gives to Peter to help others, as he should himself be helped of God; "when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren;" when thou art recovered by the grace of God, and brought to repentance, do what thou canst to recover others; when thou hast found thy faith kept from failing, labour also to confirm the faith of others, and to establish them. When thou hast found mercy with God thyself, encourage others to hope that they shall find mercy. Note, 1st. Those that are fallen into sin, must be converted from it; that have turned aside, must return; that have left their first love, must do their first works. 2nd. Those that through grace are converted from sin, must do what they can to strengthen their brethren that stand, and to prevent their falling: see Ps. li. 11-13; 1 Tim. i. 13.

4. Peter's declared resolution to cleave to Christ, whatever it cost him; ver. 33, "Lord, I am ready to go with thee, both into prison and to death." This was a great word, and yet I believe no more than he thought at this time, and thought he should make good too. Judas never protested thus against denying Christ, though often warned of it; for his heart was as fully set in him to the evil as Peter's was against it. Note, All the true disciples of Christ sincerely desire and design to follow him whithersoever he goes, and whithersoever he leads them, though into a prison, though out of the world.

5. Christ's express prediction of his denying him thrice; ver. 34, "I tell thee, Peter," thou dost not know thine own heart, but must be left to thyself a little, that thou mayest know it, and mayest never trust to it again, and then "the cock shall not crow this day, before thou even deny that thou knowest me." Note, Christ knows us better than we know ourselves, and knows the evil that is in us, and will be done by us, which we ourselves do not suspect. It is well for us that Christ knows where we are weak better than we do, and therefore where to come in with grace sufficient; that he knows how far a temptation will prevail, and therefore when to say, Hitherto shall it come, and no farther.

Fourthly. Concerning the condition of all the disciples.

1. He appeals to them concerning what had been, ver. 35. He had owned that they had been faithful servants to him, ver. 28; now he expects, at parting, that they should acknowledge that he had been a kind and careful Master to them ever since they left all to follow him: "When I sent you without purse, lacked you any thing?" 1st. He owns that he had sent them out in a very poor and bare condition, barefoot, and no money in their purses, because they were not to go far, nor be out long, and he would thus teach them to depend upon the providence of God, and under that, upon the kindness of their friends. If God thus send us out into the world, remember, better than we have thus begun low. 2nd. Yet he will have them own that, notwithstanding this, they had lacked nothing; they then lived as plentifully and comfortably as ever, and they readily acknowledged it; "nothing, Lord," I have all and abound. Note, First. It is good for us often to review the providences of God that have been concerning us all our days, and to observe how we have got through the straits and difficulties we have met with. Secondly. Christ is a good master, and his service a good service; for though his servants may sometimes be brought low, yet he will help them; and though he try them, yet will not he leave them. Jehovah-jireh. Thirdly. We must reckon ourselves well done by, and must not complain, but be thankful, if we have had the necessary supports of life, though we have had neither dainties nor superfluities, though we have been led from hand to mouth, and lived upon the kindness of our friends. The disciples lived upon contributions, and yet did not complain that their maintenance was precarious, but owned, to their Master's honour, that it was sufficient, they had wanted nothing.

2. He gives them notice of a very great change of their circumstances now approaching. For, 1st. He that was their Master was now entering upon his suffering, which he had often foretold; ver. 37, now "that which is written must be fulfilled in me," that among the rest, "he was numbered among the transgressors;" he must suffer and die as a malefactor, and in company with some of the vilest of malefactors. This is that which is yet to be accomplished, after all the rest, and then "the things concerning me," the things written concerning me, will "have an end;" then I shall say, "It is finished." Note, It may be the comfort of suffering Christians, as it was of a suffering Christ, that their sufferings were foretold and determined in the counsels of Heaven, and will shortly determine in the joys of heaven. They were written concerning them, and they will have an end, and will end well, everlastingly well.

2nd. They must therefore expect troubles, and must not think now to have such an easy, fair life as you have had; no, the scene will alter. They must now in some degree suffer with their Master; and when he is gone, they must expect to suffer like him. The servant is not better than his Lord. First. They must not now expect that their friends would be so kind and generous to them as they had been, and therefore "he that has a purse let him take it," for he may have occasion for it, and for all the good husbandry he can use. Secondly. They must now expect that their enemies would be more fierce upon them than they had been, and they would need magazines as well as stores. "He that has no sword," wherewith to defend himself against robbers and assassins, (2 Cor. xi. 26.) will find a great want of it, and will be ready to wish, some time or other, that he had sold his garment and bought one. This is intended only to shew that the times would be very perilous, so that no man would think himself safe if he had not a sword by his side. But the sword of the Spirit is the sword which the disciples of Christ must furnish themselves with; Christ having suffered for us, we must arm ourselves with the same mind, 1 Pet. iv. 1; arm ourselves with an expectation of trouble, that it may not be a surprise to us, and with a holy resignation to the will of God in it, that there may be no contradiction in us to it; and then we are better prepared than if we had sold a coat to buy a sword. The disciples hereupon inquire what strength they had, and find they had among them two swords, ver. 38, of which one was Peter's. The Galileans generally travelled with swords. Christ wore none himself, but he was not against his disciples' wearing them. But how little he would have them depend upon that, he intimates, when he saith, "It is enough," which some think is spoken ironically. Two swords among twelve men! you are bravely armed indeed, when our enemies are now coming out against us in great multitudes, and every one a sword. Yet two swords are enough to those who need none, having God himself to be the shield of their help, and the sword of their excellency, Deu. xxxii. 29.

39 And he came out, and went, as he was wont, to the mount of Olives; and his disciples also followed him. 40 And when he was at the place, he said unto them, Pray that ye enter not into temptation. 41 And he was withdrawn from them about a stone's cast, and kneeled down, and prayed, 42 Saying, Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me: nevertheless not my will, but thine, be done. 43 And there appeared an angel unto him from heaven, strengthening him. 44 And being in an agony he prayed more earnestly: and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground. 45 And when he rose up from prayer, and was come to his disciples, he found them sleeping for sorrow, 46 And said unto them, Why sleep ye? rise and pray, lest ye enter into temptation.

We have here the awful story of Christ's agony in the garden, just before he was betrayed, which was largely related by the other evangelists. In it Christ accommodated himself to that part of his undertaking which he was now entering upon, the making of his soul an offering for sin: he afflicted his own soul with grief for the sin he was to satisfy for, and an apprehension of the wrath of God, to which man had by sin made himself obnoxious, which he was pleased, as a sacrifice, to admit the impressions of, — the consuming of a sacrifice with fire from heaven being the surest token of its acceptance; in it Christ entered the lists with the powers of darkness, gave them all the advantages they could desire, and yet conquered them. That which we have here in this story, which we had before, is,

1. That when Christ went out, though it was in the night, and a long walk, yet his disciples followed him, eleven of them, for Judas had given them the slip. Having continued with him hitherto in his temptations, they would not leave him now.

2. That he went to the place where he was wont to be private, which intimates that Christ accustomed himself to retirement, was often alone, to teach us to be so, for freedom of converse with God and our own hearts. Though Christ had no convenience for retirement but a garden, yet he retired. This should particularly be our practice, after we have been at the Lord's table; we have then work to do which requires us to be private.

3. That he exhorted his disciples to pray, that though the approaching trial could not be avoided, yet that they might not in it enter into temptation to sin; that when they were in the greatest fright and danger, yet they might not have any inclination to desert Christ, nor take a step towards it. Pray that we may be kept from sin.

4. That he withdrew from them, and prayed himself; they had their errands at the throne of grace, and he had his, and therefore it was fit they should pray separately, as sometimes, when they had joint errands, they prayed together. He withdrew about a stone-cast farther into the garden, which some reckon about fifty or sixty paces, and there he kneeled down, so it is here, upon the bare ground; but the other evangelists say, that afterwards he fell on his face, and there prayed that if it were the will of God this cup of suffering, this bitter cup, might be removed from him. This was the language of that innocent dread of suffering which, being really and truly man, he could not but have in his nature.

5. That he, knowing it to be his Father's will that he should suffer and die, and that, as the matter was now settled, it was necessary for our redemption and salvation, presently withdrew that petition, did not insist upon it, but resigned himself to his heavenly Father's will: "Nevertheless, not my will be done," not the will of my human nature, but the will of God, as it is written concerning me in the volume of the book, which I delight to do; let that be done, Ps. xl. 7, 8.

6. That his disciples were asleep when he was at prayer, and when they should have been themselves praying, ver. 45. When he rose from prayer he found them sleeping, unconcerned in his sorrows; but see what a favourable construction is here put upon it, "which we had not in the other evangelists, — they were 'sleeping for sorrow.'" The great sorrow they were in upon the mournful farewells their Master had been this evening giving them had exhausted their spirits, and made them very dull and heavy, which, it being now late, disposed them to sleep. This teaches us to make the best of our brethren's infirmities, and if there be one cause better than another, charitably impute them to that.

7. That when he waked them, then he exhorted them to pray, ver. 46: "Why sleep ye?" — why do you allow yourselves to sleep? "Rise and pray." Shake off your drowsiness, that you may be fit to pray; and pray for grace, that you may be able to shake off your drowsiness. This was like the shipmaster's call to Jonah in a storm, Jonah i. 6, "Arise, call upon thy God." When we find ourselves, either by our outward circumstances or our inward dispositions, entering into temptation, it concerns us to rise and pray, "Lord, help me in this time of need."

But here are three things in this passage which we had not in the other evangelists:

First. That when Christ was in his agony "there appeared to him an angel from heaven, strengthening him," ver. 43. 1. It was an instance of the deep humiliation of our Lord Jesus, that he needed the assistance of an angel, and would admit it. The influence of the Divine nature withdrew for the present, and then, as to his human nature, he was for a little while lower than the angels, and was capable of receiving help from them. 2. When he was not delivered from his sufferings, yet he was strengthened and supported under them, and that was equivalent. If God proportion the shoulders to the burden, we shall have no reason to complain, whatever he is pleased to lay upon us. David owns this a sufficient answer to his prayer, in the day of trouble, that God strengthened him with strength in his soul, and so doth the Son of David, Ps. cxxxviii. 3. 3. The angels ministered to the Lord Jesus in his sufferings. He could have had legions of them to rescue him; nay, this one could have done it, could have chased and conquered the whole band of men carrying of water point perhaps to the domestic preparation for the approaching Passover, and would, in this case, so far serve as a subsidiary proof that it was the usual Passover day.

xxii. 19, 20. The symbolical nature of the Lord's Supper, and therefore the figurative character of these words, is proved by the fact that the Lord's Supper was instituted before Jesus was crucified. The first supper could in no proper sense be a sacrifice; and if not that, none after. The first supper foreshadowed a sacrifice, and was the pattern of a solemn rite which should be commemorative of a sacrifice. The paschal lamb itself at once commemorated the redemption from Egypt and foreshadowed the redemption of the Gospel.

xxii. 25. The name "Euergetes," or "benefactor," was a title adopted by some ancient heathen kings, as Ptolemy Euergetes, &c.

xxii. 27. The language of this verse associates it with the washing of the feet of the apostles, as recorded in John xiii. 1-16. xxii. 31, 32. Some of the ancient MSS., as the Vatican, omit the that came to take him; but he made use of his ministrations only to strengthen him; and the very visit which this angel made him now in his grief, when his enemies were awake, and his friends asleep, was such a seasonable token of the Divine favour as would be a very great strengthening to him. Yet this was not all: he probably said something to him to strengthen him; put him in mind that his sufferings were in order to his Father's glory, to his own glory, and to the salvation of those that were given him; represented to him the joy set before him, the seed he should see: with these and the like suggestions he encouraged him to go on cheerfully; and what is comforting is strengthening. Perhaps he did something to strengthen him, wiped away his sweat and tears; perhaps ministered some cordial to him, as after his temptation; or, it may be, took him by the arm and helped him off the ground, or bore him up when he was ready to faint away; and in these services of the angel the Holy Spirit was ἐνισχυὶς αὐτόν, "putting strength into him," for so the word signifies. "It pleased the Lord to bruise him" indeed; yet, did he plead against him with his great power? No, but he put strength in him, Job xxiii. 6, as he had promised, Ps. lxxxix. 21; Isa. xlix. 8; 1. 7.

Secondly. That "being in an agony he prayed more earnestly," ver. 44. As his sorrow and trouble grew upon him, he grew more importunate in prayer; not that there was before any coldness or indifference in his prayers, but there was now a greater vehemency in them, which was expressed in his voice and gesture. Note, Prayer, though never out of season, is in a special manner seasonable when we are in an agony; and the stronger our agonies are, the more lively and frequent our prayers should be. Now it was that Christ offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears, and was heard in that he feared, Heb. v. 7, and in his fear wrestled, as Jacob with the angel.

Thirdly. That in this agony "his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground." Sweat came in with sin, and was a branch of the curse, Gen. iii. 19; and therefore, when Christ was made sin and a curse for us, he underwent a grievous sweat, that in the sweat of his face we might eat bread, and that he might sanctify and sweeten all our trials to us. It is some dispute among the critics whether this sweat is only compared to drops of blood, being much thicker than drops of sweat commonly are, the pores of the body being more than ordinarily opened, or that real blood out of the capillary veins mingled with it, so that it was in colour like blood, and might truly be called a bloody sweat: the matter is not great. Some reckon this one of the times when Christ shed his blood for us: for "without shedding of blood there is no remission." Every pore was as it were a bleeding wound, and his blood stained all his raiment. This shewed the travail of his soul. He was now abroad in the open air, in a cool season, upon the cold ground, far in the night, which one would think had been enough to strike in a sweat, yet now he breaks out into a sweat, which speaks the extremity of the agony he was in.

47 And while he yet spake, behold a multitude, and he that was called Judas, one of the twelve, went before them, and drew near unto Jesus to kiss him. 48 But Jesus said unto him, Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? 49 When they which were about him saw what would follow, they said unto him, Lord, shall we smite with the sword? 50 And one of them smote the servant of the high priest, and cut off his right ear. 51 And Jesus answered and said, Suffer ye thus far. And he touched his ear, and healed him. 52 Then Jesus said unto the chief priests and captains of the temple, and the elders, which were come to him, Be ye come out, as against a thief, with swords and staves? 53 When I was daily with you in the temple, ye stretched forth no hands against me; but this is your hour, and the power of darkness.

Satan, finding himself baffled in his attempt to terrify our Lord Jesus, and so to put him out of the possession of his own soul, betakes himself (according to his usual method) to force and arms, and brings a party into the field to seize him; and Satan was in them. Here is,

First. The marking of him by Judas. Here a numerous party appears, and Judas at the head of them, for he "was guide to them that took Jesus;" they knew not where to find him, but he brought them to the place; when they were there, they knew not which was he; but Judas told them that whoever he should kiss, that same was he; so he drew near to him to kiss him, according to the wonted freedom and familiarity which our Lord Jesus admitted his disciples to. Luke takes notice of the question Christ asked him, which we have not in the other evangelists, "Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" What, is that the signal? ver. 48. Must the Son of man be betrayed, as if any thing could be concealed from him, and a plot carried on against him unknown to him? Must one of his disciples betray him, as if he had been a hard master to them, or deserved ill at their hands? Must he be betrayed with a kiss? Must the badge of friendship be the instrument of treachery? Was ever a love-token so desecrated and abused? Note, Nothing can be a greater affront or grief to the Lord Jesus than to be betrayed, and betrayed with a kiss, by those that profess relation to him, and an affection for him. Those do so who, under pretence of zeal for his honour, persecute his servants; who, under the cloak of a seeming affection for the honour of free grace, give a blow to the root of holiness and strictness of conversation. Many instances there are of Christ's being betrayed with a kiss, by those who, under the form of godliness, fight against the power of it. It were well if their own consciences would put this question to them, which Christ here puts to Judas, "Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" And will he not avenge it? Will he not revenge it?

Secondly. The effort which his disciples made for his protection; ver. 49, "when they saw what would follow," that those armed men were come to seize him, they said, "Lord, shall we smite with the sword?" Thou didst allow us to have two swords, shall we now make use of them? Never more occasion; and to what purpose should we have them, if we do not use them? They asked the question, as if they would not have drawn the sword without commission from their Master, but they were in too much haste, and too much heat, to stay for an answer; but Peter, aiming at the head of one of the servants of the high priest, missed his blow, "and cut off his right ear." As Christ by throwing them to the ground that came to take him, shewed what he could have done, so Peter by this exploit shewed what he could have done too in so good a cause, if he had had leave. The other evangelists tell us what was the check Christ gave to Peter for it. Luke here tells us,

1. How Christ excused the blow, "Suffer ye thus far," ver. 51. Dr. Whitby thinks he said this to his enemies, who came to take him, to qualify them, they might not be provoked by it to fall upon the disciples whom he had undertaken the preservation of. Pass by this injury and affront, it was without warrant from me, and there shall not be another blow struck. Though Christ had power to have struck them down, and struck them dead, yet he speaks them fair, and as it were begs their pardon for an assault made upon them by one of his followers, to teach us to give good words even to our enemies.

2. How he cured the wound, which was more than amends sufficient for the injury; "he touched his ear and healed him;" fastened his ear on again, that he might not so much as go away stigmatized, though he well deserved it. Christ hereby gave them a proof, 1st. Of his power. He that could heal, could destroy if he pleased, which should have obliged them in interest to submit to him. Had they returned the blow upon Peter, he would immediately have healed him; and what could not a small regiment do that had such a surgeon to it, immediately to help the sick and wounded? 2nd. Of his mercy and goodness. Christ here gave an illustrious example to his own rule of doing good to them that hate us, as afterwards he did of praying for them that despitefully use us: those who render good for evil, do as Christ did. One would have thought this generous piece of kindness should have overcome them, that such coals heaped on their heads should have melted them, that they could not have bound him as a malefactor, who had approved himself such a benefactor; but their hearts were hardened.

Thirdly. Christ's expostulation with the officers of the detachment that came to apprehend him, to shew what an absurd thing it was for them to make all this rout and noise, ver. 52, 53. Matthew relates it as said to the multitude; Luke tells us it was said "to the chief priests and captains of the temple," who commanded the several orders of the priests, and therefore are here put between the chief priests and the elders; so that they were all ecclesiastics, retainers to the temple, who were employed in this odious piece of service: and some of the first rank too disparaged themselves so far as to be seen in it. Now see here,

1. How Christ reasons with them concerning their proceedings. What needed they come out in the dead of night, and with swords and staves? 1st. They knew that he was one that would not resist, or raise the mob against them; he never had done anything like that: why then are ye come out as against a thief? 2nd. They knew he was one that would not abscond, for he was daily with them in the temple, in the midst of them, and never sought to conceal himself, nor did they offer to lay hands on him. Before his hour was come, it was folly for them to think to take him; and when his hour was come, it was folly for them to make all this ado to take him.

2. How he reconciles himself to their proceedings; and this we had not before; "but this is your hour, and the power of darkness." How hard soever it may seem that I should be thus exposed, I submit, for so it is determined; this is the hour allowed you to have your will against me; there is an hour appointed me to reckon for it. Now is the power of darkness; Satan, the ruler of the darkness of this world, is permitted to do his worst, to bruise the heel of the seed of the woman, and I resolve to acquiesce; let him do his worst; "the Lord shall laugh at him, for he sees that his day," his hour, "is coming," Ps. xxxvii. 13. Let this quiet us under the prevalency of the church's enemies; let it quiet us in a dying hour, that, 1st. It is but an hour that is permitted for the triumph of our adversary; a short time, a limited time. 2nd. It is their hour, which is appointed them, and in which they are permitted to try their strength, that Omnipotence may be the more glorified in their fall. 3rd. It is the power of darkness that rides master, and darkness must give way to light, and the power of darkness be made to truckle to the Prince of light. Christ was willing to wait for his triumphs till his warfare was accomplished, and we must be so too.

54 Then took they him, and led him, and brought him into the high priest's house. And Peter followed afar off. 55 And when they had kindled a fire in the midst of the hall, and were set down together, Peter sat down among them. 56 But a certain maid beheld him as he sat by the fire, and earnestly looked upon him, and said, This man was also with him. 57 And he denied him, saying, Woman, I know him not. 58 And after a little while another saw him, and said, Thou art also of them. And Peter said, Man, I am not. 59 And about the space of one hour after another confidently affirmed, saying, Of a truth this fellow also was with him: for he is a Galilean. 60 And Peter said, Man, I know not what thou sayest. And immediately, while he yet spake, the cock crew. 61 And the Lord turned, and looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how he had said unto him, Before the cock crew, thou shalt deny me thrice. 62 And Peter went out, and wept bitterly.

We have here the melancholy story of Peter's denying his Master, at the time

words "and the Lord said," but they appear in others, as the Alexandrian and Sinaitic. The Syriac-Peshito reads, "And Jesus said to Simon, Simon, behold, Satan asks that he may winnow you as wheat." The plural "you" clearly means all the apostles. The Lord prayed specially for Simon, in view of the imminent peril in which his faith would be placed by his temporary backsliding in denying his Master. "When thou art converted" means "when thou art restored," or brought back to the faith.

xxii. 38. Much has been written on the words, "It is enough." Alford says they mean "not 'they are sufficient,' but 'it is well,' 'we are sufficiently provided,' 'it was not to this that my words referred.'" Another critic exclaims, "Two swords to oppose all the powers of the world, of hell, and of death, which were about to attack him! He esteems it impossible to make the whole absurdity of the idea as evident to them as he feels it to be, and hence breaks off the conversation on this subject, in the tone of one who is conscious that he when he was arraigned before the high priest, with those that were of the cabal, that were ready to receive the prey, and to prepare the evidence for his arraignment, "as soon as it was day," before the great Sanhedrim, ver. 66. But notice is not taken here, as was in the other evangelists, of Christ's being now upon his examination before the high priest, only of his being brought "into the high priest's house," ver. 54. But the manner of expression is observable, "they took him, and led him, and brought him;" which methinks is like that concerning Saul, 1 Sam. xv. 13, "he is gone about, and passed on, and gone down," and intimates that even though they had seized their prey they were in confusion, and for fear of the people, or rather struck with inward terror upon what they had seen and heard, they took him the farthest way about, or rather knew not which way they hurried him; such a hurry were they in in their own bosoms. Now observe,

First. Peter's falling.

1. It began in sneaking. He followed Christ when he was had away prisoner; that was well, and shewed a concern for his Master; but he followed afar off, that he might be out of danger. He thought to trim the matter; to follow Christ, and so to satisfy his conscience; but to follow afar off, and so to save his reputation, and sleep in a whole skin.

2. It proceeded in keeping his distance still, and associating himself with the high priest's servants, when he should have been at his Master's elbow. The servants "kindled a fire in the midst of the hall," and sat down together to talk over their night expedition. Probably Malchus was among them, and "Peter sat down among them," as if he had been one of them, at least would be thought to be so.

3. His fall itself was disclaiming all acquaintance with Christ, and relation to him; disowning him, because he was now in distress and danger. He was charged by a sorry simple maid that belonged to the house with being a retainer to this Jesus, about whom there was now so much noise. She looked wistly upon him as he sat by the fire, only because he was a stranger, and one whom she had not seen before; and concluding that at this time of night there were no neutrals there, and knowing him not to be any of the retinue of the high priest, she concludes him to be one of the retinue of this Jesus; or perhaps she had been, some time or other, looking about her in the temple, and had seen Jesus there, and Peter with him, officious about him, and remembered him; and this man was with him, saith she. And Peter, as he had not the courage to own the charge, so he had not the wit and presence of mind to turn it off, as he might have done many ways, and therefore flat and plain denies it: "Woman, I know him not."

4. His fall was repeated a second time; ver. 58, "after a little while," before he had time to recollect himself; "another saw him, and said, Even thou art one of them," as slyly as thou sittest here among the high priest's servants. Not I, saith Peter, "Man, I am not." And a third time, "about the space of an hour after," for, saith the tempter, when he is down, down with him; let us follow the blow, till we get him past recovery,—another confidently affirms, strenuously asserts it, "Of a truth this fellow also was with him;" let him deny it if he can; for you may all perceive he is a Galilean. But he that has once told a lie is strongly tempted to persist in it; the beginning of that sin is as the letting forth of water. Peter now not only denies that he is a disciple of Christ, but that he knows any thing of him; ver. 60, "Man, I know not what thou sayest; I never heard of this Jesus."

Secondly, Peter's getting up again. See how happily he recovered himself; or rather, the grace of God recovered him. See how it was brought about.

1. "The cock crew" just as he was the third time denying that he knew Christ; and this startled him, and put him upon thinking. Note, Small accidents may have great influences.

2. "The Lord turned and looked upon him." This circumstance we had not in the other evangelists, but it is a very remarkable one. Christ is here called the Lord, for there was much of Divine knowledge, power, and grace appearing in this. Observe, Though Christ had now his back upon Peter, and was upon his trial, when one would think he had something else to mind, yet he knew all that Peter said. Note, Christ takes more notice of what we say and do than we think he doth. When Peter disowned Christ, yet Christ did not disown him, though he might justly have cast him off, and never looked upon him more, but have denied him before his Father. It is well for us that Christ doth not deal with us as we deal with him. Christ looked upon Peter, not doubting but that Peter would soon be aware of it; for he knew, that though he had denied him with his lips, yet his eye would still be towards him.

Observe, Though Peter had now been guilty of a very great offence, and which was very provoking, yet Christ would not call to him, lest he should shame him or expose him; only gave him a look, which none but Peter would understand the meaning of; and it had a great deal in it. 1st. It was a convincing look. Peter said he did not know Christ: Christ turned and looked upon him, as if he would say, Dost thou not know me, Peter? Look me in the face, and tell me so. 2nd. It was a chiding look; we may suppose he looked upon him and frowned, or some way signified his displeasure. Let us think with what an angry countenance Christ justly looks upon us when we have sinned. 3rd. It was an expostulating, upbraiding look. What, Peter, art thou he that disownest me now, when thou shouldst come and witness for me? What, thou a disciple? thou that wast the most forward to confess me to be the Son of God, and didst solemnly promise thou wouldst never disown me? 4th. It was a compassionate look; he looked upon him with tenderness. Poor Peter, how weak is thine heart! how art thou fallen and undone, if I do not help thee. 5th. It was a directing look. Christ guided him with his eye, gave him a wink to go out from that sorry company; to retire, and bethink himself a little, and then he would soon see what he had to do. 6th. It was a significant look; it signified the conveying of grace to Peter's heart, to enable him to repent. The crowing of the cock would not have brought him to repentance without this look; nor will the external means, without special, efficacious grace. Power went along with this look, to change the heart of Peter, and to bring him to himself, to his right mind.

3. "Peter remembered the words of the Lord." Note, The grace of God works in and by the Word of God; brings that to mind, and sets that home upon the conscience, and so gives the soul the happy turn: tolle et lege,—take it up and read.

4. Then "Peter went out and wept bitterly." One look from Christ melted him into tears of godly sorrow for sin. The candle was newly put out, and then a little thing lighted it again. Christ looked upon the chief priests, and made no impression upon them, as he did on Peter, who had the Divine seed remaining in him to work upon. It was not the look from Christ, but the grace of God with it, that recovered Peter, and brought him to rights.

63 And the men that held Jesus mocked him, and smote him. 64 And when they had blindfolded him, they struck him on the face, and asked him, saying,

Prophesy, who is it that smote thee? 65 And many other things blasphemously spake they against him. 66 And as soon as it was day, the elders of the people and the chief priests and the scribes came together, and led him into their council, saying, 67 Art thou the Christ? tell us. And he said unto them, If I tell you, ye will not believe: 68 And if I also ask you, ye will not answer me, nor let me go. 69 Hereafter shall the Son of man sit on the right hand of the power of God. 70 Then said they all, Art thou then the Son of God? And he said unto them, Ye say that I am. 71 And they said, What need we any further witness? for we ourselves have heard of his own mouth.

We are here told, as before in the other gospels, I. How our Lord Jesus was abused by the servants of the high priest; "the abjects gathered themselves together against him." The rude and barbarous servants, they that held Jesus, that had him in custody till the court sat, they "mocked him, and smote him," ver. 63; they would not allow him to repose himself one minute, though he had had no sleep of all night; nor to compose himself, though he was hurried to his trial, and no time given him to prepare for it. They made sport with him; this sorrowful night to him shall be a merry night to them; and the blessed Jesus, like Samson, is made the fool in the play. They hoodwinked him, and then, according to the common play that young people have among them, "they struck him on the face," and continued to do so till he named the person that smote him, ver. 64; intending hereby an affront to his prophetic office, and that knowledge of secret things which he was said to have. We are not told that he said any thing, but bore every thing; hell was let loose, and he suffered it to do its worst. A greater indignity could not be done to the blessed Jesus; yet this was but one instance of many, for, ver. 65, "many other things blasphemously spake they against him." They that condemned him for a blasphemer were themselves the vilest blasphemers that ever were.

II. How he was accused and condemned by the great Sanhedrim, consisting of "the elders of the people, the chief priests, and the scribes;" who were all up betimes, and got together "as soon as it was day," about five o'clock in the morning, to prosecute this matter. They were working this evil upon their beds, and as soon as ever the morning was light practised it, Mic. ii. 1. They would not have been up so early for any good work. It is but a short account that we have here of his trial in the ecclesiastical court.

First. They ask him, "Art thou the Christ?" He was generally believed by his followers to be the Christ, but they could not prove it upon him that he had ever said so, totidem verbis,—in so many words, and therefore urge him to own it to them, ver. 67. If they had asked him this question with a willingness to admit that he was the Christ, and to receive him accordingly, if he could give sufficient proof of his being so, it had been well, and might have been for ever well with them. But they asked it with a resolution not to believe him, but a design to ensnare him.

Secondly. He justly complained of their unfair and unjust usage of him, ver. 67, 68. They all, as Jews, professed to expect the Messiah, and to expect him at this time; no other appeared, or had appeared, that pretended to be the Messiah; he had no competitor, nor likelihood of any; he had given amazing proofs of a Divine power going along with him, which made his claims very well worthy of a free and impartial inquiry. It had been but just for these leaders of the people to have taken him into their council, and examined him there as a candidate for the Messiahship, not at the bar as a criminal. "But saith he, 1. 'If I tell you,' that I am the Christ, and give you never such convincing proofs of it, you are resolved 'you will not believe.' Why should the cause be brought on before you, who have already prejudged it, and are resolved, right or wrong, to run it down, and to condemn it? 2. 'If I ask you' what you have to object against the proofs I produce, 'you will not answer me.' Here he refers to their silence when he put a question to them which would have led them to own his authority, ch. xx. 5-7. They were neither fair judges nor fair disputants, but, when they were pinched with an argument, would rather be silent than own their conviction; 'you will neither answer me, nor let me go.' If I be not the Christ, you ought to answer the arguments with which I prove that I am; if I be, you ought to let me go; but you will do neither.

Thirdly. He referred them to his second coming for the full proof of his being the Christ, to their confusion, since they would not now admit the proof of it to their conviction; ver. 69, "Hereafter shall the Son of man sit," and be seen to sit, "on the right hand of the power of God," and then you will not need to ask whether he be the Christ or no.

Fourthly. Hence they inferred that he set up himself as the Son of God, and asked him whether he were so or no; ver. 70, "Art thou then the Son of God?" He called himself the Son of man, referring to Daniel's vision of the Son of man that came near before the Ancient of days, Dan. vii. 13, 14; but they understood so much as to know, that if he was that Son of man, he was also the Son of God. "And art thou so?" By this it appears to have been the faith of the Jewish church that the Messiah should be both Son of man and Son of God.

Fifthly. He owns himself to be the Son of God; "Ye say that I am;" that is, 'I am as ye say;' compare Mar. xiv. 62, "Jesus said, I am." This confirms Christ's testimony concerning himself, that he was the Son of God, that he stood to it, when he knew he should suffer for standing to it.

Sixthly. Upon this they ground his condemnation, ver. 71, "What need we any further witness?" It was true they needed not any farther witness to prove that he said he was the Son of God, they had it from his own mouth; but did they not need proof that he was not so, before they condemned him as a blasphemer for saying that he was so? Had they no apprehension that it was possible he might be so; and then what horrid guilt they should bring upon themselves in putting him to death? No, "they know not, neither will they understand." They cannot think it possible he should be the Messiah, though never so evidently clothed with Divine power and grace, if he appear not, as they expect, in worldly pomp and grandeur. Their eyes being blinded with the admiration of that, they rush on in this dangerous prosecution, as the horse into the battle.

xxii. 51. "Suffer ye thus far" has no reference to bodily suffering. The Greek word for "suffer" here means to allow or permit; and the Lord's meaning is "allow," or "give me leave, to this extent"—i.e., to touch the wounded man's ear and to heal him.

xxii. 54. According to some it was Annas who is here meant by "high-priest," while others believe it was Caiaphas. It was Annas, we have no doubt, because John xviii. 13 expressly says they "led him away to Annas first." He was afterwards sent on to Caiaphas.

shall not be understood, and therefore esteems all further discussion useless." The sense may be, "That is enough: say no more."

xxii. 43, 44. These verses, though not found in some of the oldest MSS., are found in others, as in the Sinaitic MS. Though not in the Vatican MS., they are in the Syriac-Peshito, and are appealed to by Justin Martyr as part of the sacred record ("Dialogue with Trypho," cap. 103). With regard to the sweating of blood, cases strictly analogous have been observed and reported by modern physicians.

CHAPTER XXIII.

This chapter carries on and concludes the history of Christ's sufferings and death. We have here, I. His arraignment before Pilate the Roman governor, ver. 1-5. II. His examination before Herod, who was tetrarch of Galilee, under the Romans likewise, ver. 6-12. III. Pilate's struggle with the people to release Jesus, his repeated testimonies concerning his innocence, but his yielding at length to their importunity, and condemning him to be crucified, ver. 13-25. IV. An account of what passed as they led him to be crucified, and his discourse to the people that followed, ver. 26-31. V. An account of what passed at the place of execution, and the indignities done him there, ver. 32-38. VI. The conversion of one of the thieves, as Christ was hanging on the cross, ver. 39-43. VII. The death of Christ, and the prodigies that attended it, ver. 44-49. VIII. His burial, ver. 50-56.

AND the whole multitude of them arose, and led him unto Pilate. 2 And they began to accuse him, saying, We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that he himself is Christ a King. 3 And Pilate asked him, saying, Art thou the King of the Jews? And he answered him and said, Thou sayest it. 4 Then said Pilate to the chief priests and to the people, I find no fault in this man. 5 And they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place. 6 When Pilate heard of Galilee, he asked whether the man were a Galilæan. 7 And as soon as he knew that he belonged unto Herod's jurisdiction, he sent him to Herod, who himself also was at Jerusalem at that time. 8 And when Herod saw Jesus, he was exceeding glad: for he was desirous to see him of a long season, because he had heard many things of him; and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by him. 9 Then he questioned with him in many words; but he answered him nothing. 10 And the chief priests and scribes stood and vehemently accused him. 11 And Herod with his men of war set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe, and sent him again to Pilate. 12 And the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together: for before they were at enmity between themselves.

Our Lord Jesus was condemned as a blasphemer in the spiritual court, but it was the most impotent malice that could be that that court was acted by, for when they had condemned him they knew they could not put him to death, and therefore take another course.

First. They accuse him before Pilate; "the whole multitude of them arose," when they saw they could go no farther with him in their court, "and led him unto Pilate," though it was no judgment day, no assizes or sessions; and they demand justice against him, not as a blasphemer, that was no crime that he took cognizance of, but as one disaffected to the Roman government, which they in their hearts did not look upon as any crime at all, or if it were one, they themselves were much more chargeable with it than he was; only it would serve the turn, and answer the purpose of their malice. And it is observable, that that which was the pretended crime for which they employed the Roman powers to destroy Christ, was the real crime for which the Roman powers, not long after, destroyed them.

1. Here is the indictment drawn up against him, ver. 2, in which they pretended a zeal for Cæsar only to ingratiate themselves with Pilate; but it was all malice against Christ, and nothing else. They misrepresented him, 1st. As making the people rebel against Cæsar. It was true, and Pilate knew it, that there was a general uneasiness in the people under the Roman yoke, and they wanted nothing but an opportunity to shake it off. Now they would have Pilate believe that this Jesus was active to foment that general discontent, which, if the truth were known, they themselves were the aiders and abettors of; "we have found him perverting the nation," as if converting them to God's government were perverting them from the civil government; whereas nothing tends more to make men good subjects than making them Christ's faithful followers. Christ had particularly taught that they ought to give tribute to Cæsar, though he knew there were those that would be offended at him for it; and yet he is here falsely accused as "forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar." Innocency is no fence against calumny. 2nd. As making himself a rival with Cæsar; though the very reason why they rejected him, and would not own him to be the Messiah, was because he did not appear in worldly pomp and power and did not set up for a temporal prince, nor offer to do any thing against Cæsar; yet that is it they charge him with, that he said "he himself is Christ a king." He did say he was Christ; and if so, then a king; but not such a king as was ever likely to give disturbance to Cæsar. When his followers would have made him a king, Jno. vi. 15, he declined it; though by the many miracles he wrought he made it appear, that if he would have set up in competition with Cæsar he would have been too hard for him.

2. His pleading to the indictment. "Pilate asked him, Art thou the King of the Jews?" ver. 3; to which he answered, "Thou sayest it," that is, It is as thou sayest, that I am entitled to the government of the Jewish nation, but in rivalry with the scribes and Pharisees, who tyrannize over them in matters of religion, not in rivalry with Cæsar, whose government relates only to their civil interests. Christ's kingdom is wholly spiritual, and will not interfere with Cæsar's jurisdiction. Or, "Thou sayest it;" but canst thou prove it? what evidence hast thou for it? All that knew him knew the contrary, that he never pretended to be the King of the Jews, in opposition to Cæsar as supreme, or to the governors that were sent by him, but the contrary.

3. Pilate's declaration of his innocency; ver. 4, he "said to the chief priests, and the people" that seemed to join with them in the prosecution, "I find no fault in this man." What breaches of your law he may have been guilty of I am not concerned to inquire, but I find nothing proved upon him that makes him obnoxious to our court.

4. The continued fury and outrage of the prosecutors, ver. 5. Instead of being moderated by Pilate's declaration of his innocency, and considering, as they ought to do, whether they were not bringing the guilt of innocent blood upon themselves, they were the more exasperated, more exceeding fierce. We do not find that they have any particular fact to produce, much less any evidence to prove it; but they resolve to carry it with noise and confidence, and say it, though they cannot prove it, "He stirs up the people" to rebel against Cæsar, "teaching throughout all Judæa, beginning from Galilee, to this place." He did stir up the people, but it was not to any thing factious or seditious, but to every thing that was virtuous and praiseworthy. He did teach, but they could not charge him with teaching any doctrine that tended to disturb the public peace, or make the government uneasy or jealous.

Secondly. They accuse him before Herod.

1. Pilate removed him and his cause to Herod's court. The accusers mentioned Galilee, the northern part of Canaan; "Why," saith Pilate, "is he of that country? Is he a Galilæan?" ver. 6. "Yes," said they, "that is his head-quarters; there he hath spent most of his time." Let us send him to Herod, then, saith Pilate, "for Herod is now in town, and it is but fit he should have cognizance of his cause, since he belongs to Herod's jurisdiction." Pilate was already sick of the cause, and desirous to rid his hands of it, and that seems to be the true reason of sending him to Herod. But God ordered it so for the more evident fulfilling of the Scripture, as appears, Acts iv. 26, 27, where that of David, Ps. ii. 2, "the kings of the earth and the rulers set themselves against the Lord and his anointed," is expressly said to be fulfilled in Herod and Pontius Pilate.

2. Herod was very willing to have the examining of him; ver. 8, "when he saw Jesus he was exceeding glad," and perhaps the more glad because he saw him a prisoner, saw him in bonds; "he had heard many things of him," in Galilee, where his miracles had for a great while been all the talk of the country, and he longed to see him; not for any affection he had for him or his doctrine, but purely out of curiosity; and it was only to gratify that, that he "hoped to have seen some miracle done by him," which would serve him to talk of as long as he lived. And in order to this, he "questioned with him in many things," that at length he might bring him to something in which he might shew his power. Perhaps he pumped him concerning things secret or things to come, or concerning his curing of diseases. But Jesus "answered him nothing," nor would he gratify him so much as with the repetition of one miracle. The poorest beggar that asked a miracle for the relief of his necessity was never denied, but this proud prince, that asked a miracle merely for the gratifying of his curiosity, is denied. He might have seen Christ and his wondrous works many a time in Galilee, and would not; and therefore it is justly said, Now he would see them, and shall not; they are hid from his eyes, because he knew not the day of his visitation. Herod thought, now he had him in bonds, he might command a miracle; but miracles must not be made cheap, nor Omnipotence be at the beck of the greatest potentate.

3. His prosecutors appeared against him before Herod, for they were restless in the prosecution; "they stood and vehemently accused him," ver. 10, impudently and boldly, so the word signifies. They would make Herod believe that he had poisoned Galilee too with his seditious notions. Note, It is no new thing for good men and good ministers, that are real and useful friends to the civil government, to be falsely accused as factious and seditious, and enemies to government.

4. "Herod" was very abusive to him; he, "with his men of war" his attendants, and officers, and great men, "set him at nought." They made nothing of him, so the word is. Horrid wickedness! to make nothing of Him who made all things. They laughed at him as a fool; for they knew he had wrought many miracles to befriend others, and why would he not now work one to befriend himself? or else, as one that had lost his power, and was become weak as other men. Herod, that had been acquainted with John Baptist, and had more knowledge of Christ too than Pilate had, was more abusive to Christ than Pilate was; for knowledge without grace doth but make men the more ingeniously wicked. Herod arrayed Christ in a gorgeous robe, some gaudy painted clothes, as a mock-king; and so he taught Pilate's soldiers afterwards to do him the same indignity. He was ringleader in that abuse.

5. Herod returned him to Pilate, and it proved an occasion of the making of them friends, they having been for some time before at variance. Herod could not get sight of a miracle, but would not condemn him neither as a malefactor; and therefore "sent him again to Pilate," ver. 11, and so returned Pilate's civility and respect in sending the prisoner to him; and this mutual obligation, with the messages that passed between them on this occasion, brought them to a better understanding, one of another, than there had been of late between them, ver. 12. They had been "at enmity between themselves," probably upon Pilate's killing the Galileans, who were Herod's subjects, ch. xiii. 1, or some other such matter or controversy as used to be among princes and great men. Observe how those that quarrelled with one another, yet could unite against Christ, as Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek, though divided among themselves, were confederate against the Israel of God, Ps. lxxxiii. 7. Christ is the great Peacemaker; both Pilate and Herod owned his innocency, and their agreeing in that cured their disagreeing in other things.

13 And Pilate, when he had called together the chief priests and the rulers and the people, 14 Said unto them, Ye have brought this man unto me, as xxii. 55. Oosterzee observes that it is well known the nights in Palestine, especially in spring, are very cold. Hence the need of a fire.

xxii. 56. John xviii. 18 says Peter stood, while the other evangelists say he sat. In his restless condition of mind he doubtless did both.

xxii. 61. The court in which Peter was may have been separated from the hall of justice by a sort of colonnade, which enabled those who were in one room to see and hear much that took place in the other. This view is taken by eminent authorities. As to the possibility of Peter's hearing a cock crow when fowls were not allowed in Jerusalem, we have noted that sometimes they were kept there. Besides, as the Romans were in authority, it is evident that animals reckoned not clean might be kept by them. In various other cases, as in this, it is necessary to remember the Roman supremacy.

xxii. 66. Our version misses the exact sense of part of this verse; one that perverteth the people: and, behold, I, having examined him before you, have found no fault in this man touching those things whereof ye accuse him: 15 No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him; and, lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto him. 16 I will therefore chastise him, and release him. 17 (For of necessity he must release one unto them at the feast.) 18 And they cried out all at once, saying, Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas: 19 (Who for a certain sedition made in the city, and for murder, was cast into prison.) 20 Pilate therefore, willing to release Jesus, spake again to them. 21 But they cried, saying, Crucify him, crucify him. 22 And he said unto them the third time, Why, what evil hath he done? I have found no cause of death in him: I will therefore chastise him, and let him go. 23 And they were instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified. And the voices of them and of the chief priests prevailed. 24 And Pilate gave sentence that it should be as they required. 25 And he released unto them him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison, whom they had desired; but he delivered Jesus to their will.

We have here the blessed Jesus run down by the mob, and hurried to the cross in the storm of a popular noise and tumult, raised by the malice and artifice of the chief priests, as agents for the prince of the power of the air.

First. Pilate solemnly protests that he believes he has done nothing worthy of death or of bonds. And if he did believe so, he ought immediately to have discharged him; and not only so, but to have protected him from the fury of the priests and rabble, and to have bound his prosecutors to their good behaviour for their insolent carriage; but being himself an ill man, he had no kindness for Christ; and, having made himself otherwise obnoxious, was afraid of displeasing either the emperor or the people; and therefore, for want of integrity, he "called together the chief priests and rulers and people," (whom he should have dispersed, as a riotous, routous, and seditious assembly, and forbid them to come near him,) and will hear what they have to say to whom he should have turned a deaf ear, for he plainly saw what spirit acted them, ver. 14. "You have brought," saith Pilate, "this man to me," and because I have a respect for you, "I have examined him before you," and have heard all you have to allege against him, and I can make nothing of it, "I find no fault in him," you cannot prove the things whereof you accuse him.

Secondly. He appeals to Herod concerning him; ver. 15, "I sent you to him" who is supposed to have known more of him than I have done, and he hath sent him back, not convicted of any thing, nor under any mark of his displeasure; in his opinion his crimes are not capital. He has laughed at him as a weak man, but has not stigmatized him as a dangerous man: he thought Bedlam a fitter place for him than Tyburn.

Thirdly. He proposeth to release him, if they will but consent to it. He ought to have done it without asking leave of them; fiat justitia, ruat cælum,—"let justice have its course, though the heavens should be desolated;" but the fear of man brings many into this snare, that whereas justice should take place, though heaven and earth come together, they will do an unjust thing against their consciences rather than pull an old house about their ears. Pilate declares him innocent, and therefore has a mind to release him; yet to please the people, 1. He will release him under the notion of a malefactor, because "of necessity he must release one," ver. 17; so that whereas he ought to have been released by an act of justice, and thanks to nobody, he would have him released by an act of grace, and be beholden to the people for it. 2. He will chastise him and release him. If no fault be to be found in him, why should he be chastised? There is as much injustice in scourging as in crucifying an innocent man; nor would it be justified by pretending that this would satisfy the clamours of the people, and make him the object of their pity who was now to be the object of their envy. We must not do evil that good may come.

Fourthly. The people chose rather to have Barabbas released; a wretched fellow, that had nothing to recommend himself to their favour but the daring-ness of his crimes: he was imprisoned for a sedition made in the city, and for murder, of all crimes among men the least pardonable, yet this was the criminal that was preferred before Christ; ver. 18, 19, "Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas;" and no wonder that such a man is the favourite and darling of such a mob; he that was really seditious, rather than he that was really loyal, and falsely accused of sedition.

Fifthly. When Pilate urged the second time that Christ should be released, they cried out, "Crucify him, crucify him," ver. 20, 21. They not only will have him die, but will have him die so great a death; nothing less will serve but he must be crucified: "Crucify him, crucify him."

Sixthly. When Pilate the third time reasoned with them, to shew them the unreasonableness and injustice of it, they were the more peremptory and outrageous; ver. 22, "Why, what evil hath he done?" Name his crime: "I have found no cause of death," and you cannot say what cause of death you have found in him; and therefore, if you will but speak the word, "I will chastise him and let him go." But popular fury, the more it is complimented, the more furious it grows: "they were instant with loud voices," with great noises, or outcries, not requesting, but "requiring that he might be crucified;" as if they the sense is, "And when it became day, the presbytery (or council) of the people, comprising both chief priests and scribes, was assembled, and led him away to their Sanhedrim," &c. Here the word "presbytery" denotes the members of the Sanhedrim, which consisted of "chief priests and scribes," and a certain number of elders. In this verse the word "Sanhedrim" means the meeting or session of that body in its hall assembled; in other words, the meeting and the place of meeting.

Seventhly. Pilate's yielding at length to their importunity. "The voices of the people and of the chief priests prevailed," and were too hard for Pilate, and overruled him to go contrary to his convictions and inclination. He had not courage to go against so strong a stream, but "gave sentence that it should be as they required," ver. 24. Here is judgment turned away backward, and justice standing afar off, for fear of popular fury: "Truth is fallen in the street, and equity cannot enter," Isa. lix. 14; "Judgment was looked for, but behold oppression; righteousness, but behold a cry," Isa. v. 7. This is repeated, ver. 25, with the aggravating circumstance of the release of Barabbas; "he released unto them him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison," who hereby would be hardened in his wickedness, and do the more mischief, because him they had desired, being altogether such an one as themselves; "but he delivered Jesus to their will," and he could not deal more barbarously with him than to deliver him to their will who hated him with a perfect hatred, and whose tender mercies were cruelty.

26 And as they led him away, they laid hold upon one Simon, a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the cross, that he might bear it after Jesus. 27 And there followed him a great company of people, and of women, which also bewailed and lamented him. 28 But Jesus turning unto them said, Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children. 29 For, behold, the days are coming, in the which they shall say, Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which never gave suck. 30 Then shall they begin to say to the mountains, Fall on us; and to the hills, Cover us. 31 For if they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry?

We have here the blessed Jesus, the Lamb of God, led as a lamb to the slaughter, to the sacrifice. It is strange with what expedition they went through his trial; how they could do so much work in so little time, though they had so many great men to deal with, attendance on whom used to be a work of time. He was brought before the chief priests at break of day, ch. xxii. 26, after that to Pilate, then to Herod, then to Pilate again; and there seems to have been a long struggle between Pilate and the people about him. He was scourged and crowned with thorns, and contumeliously used; and all this was done in four or five hours' time, or six at most; for he was crucified between nine o'clock and twelve. Christ's persecutors resolve to lose no time, for fear lest his friends at the other end of the town should get notice of what they were doing, and should rise to rescue him. Never any one was so chased out of the world as Christ was; but so he himself said, "Yet a little while, and ye shall not see me," a very little while indeed.

Now as they led him away to death, we find, First. One that was a bearer, that carried his cross, Simon by name, a Cyrenian, who probably was a friend of Christ, and was known to be so, and this was done to put a reproach upon him; they laid Christ's cross upon him, "that he might bear it after Jesus," ver. 26, lest Jesus should faint under it, and die away, and so prevent the farther instances of malice they designed. It was pity, but a cruel pity, that gave him this ease.

Secondly. Many that were mourners, true mourners, who followed him bewailing and lamenting him. These were not only his friends and well-wishers, but the common people that were not his enemies, and were moved with compassion towards him, because they had heard the fame of him, and what an excellent, useful man he was, and had reason to think he suffered unjustly; this drew a great crowd after him, as is usual at executions, especially of those that have been persons of distinction; "a great company of people followed him," especially of women, ver. 27; some led by pity, others by curiosity; but they also (as well as those that were his particular friends and acquaintance) "bewailed and lamented him." Though there were many that reproached and reviled him, yet there were some that valued him, and pitied him, and were sorry for him, and were partakers with him in his sufferings. The dying of the Lord Jesus may, perhaps, move natural affections in many that are strangers to devout affections: many bewail Christ that do not believe in him, and do not love him above all.

Now here we are told what Christ said to these mourners, though one would think he should be wholly taken up with his own concern; yet he found time and heart to take cognizance of their tears. Christ died lamented, and has a bottle for the tears of those that lamented him. He turned to them, though they were strangers to him, and bade them not weep for him, but for themselves; he diverts their lamentation into another channel, ver. 28.

1. He gives them a general direction concerning their lamentations: "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me;" not that they were to be blamed for weeping for him, but commended rather: those hearts were hard indeed that were not affected with such sufferings of such a person; but they must not weep only for him—those were profitless tears that they shed for him—but rather let them weep for themselves and for their children, with an eye to the destruction that was coming upon Jerusalem, which some of them might live to see, and share in the calamities of; or at least their children would, for whom they ought to be solicitous. Note, When with an eye of faith we behold Christ crucified, we ought to weep, not for him, but for ourselves. We must not be affected with the death of Christ as with the death of a common person, whose calamity we pity, or of a common friend, whom we are like to part with. The death of Christ was a thing peculiar; it was his victory and triumph over his enemies; it was our deliverance, and the purchase of eternal life for us; and therefore weep not for him, but let us weep for our own sins, and the sins of our children, that were the cause of his death; and weep for fear (such were the tears here prescribed) of the miseries we shall bring upon ourselves if we slight his love, and reject his grace, as the Jewish nation did, which brought upon them the ruin here foretold. When our dear relations and friends die in Christ, we have no reason to weep for them, who have put off the burthen of xxii. 69. "Hereafter" is scarcely correct, because the Greek rather signifies "henceforth"—i.e., from this time. The preceding words, "nor let me go," are omitted by the Sinaitic, Vatican, and other MSS., but are found in numerous ancient copies and authorities.

xxiii. 1. "The whole multitude of them arose"—i.e., the whole company of the Sanhedrim, which consisted of seventy members.

xxiii. 2. The accusers begin with a deceitful and false utterance, hoping to create a prejudice in Pilate's mind against Jesus and in the flesh, are made perfect in holiness, and are entered into perfect rest and joy; but for ourselves and our children, who are left behind in a world of sins, and sorrows, and snares.

2. He gives them a particular reason why they should weep for themselves and for their children: "For, behold," sad times are coming upon your city; it will be destroyed, and you will be involved in the common destruction. When Christ's own disciples sorrowed after a goodly sort for his leaving them, he wiped away their tears with the promise that he would see them again, and they should rejoice, Jno. xvi. 22; but when these daughters of Jerusalem bewailed him only with a worldly sorrow, he turned their tears into another channel, and told them they should have something given them to cry for. Let them be afflicted, and mourn, and weep, Jas. iv. 9. He had lately wept over Jerusalem himself, and now he bids them weep over it: Christ's tears should set us a weeping. Let the daughters of Zion, that own Christ for their king, rejoice in him, for he comes to save them; but let the daughters of Jerusalem, that only weep for him, but do not take him for their king, weep and tremble to think of his coming to judge them.

Now the destruction of Jerusalem is here foretold by two proverbial sayings, that might then fitly be used, which both speak it very terrible, that what people commonly dread they would then desire—to be written childless, and to be buried alive.

1st. They would wish to be written childless; whereas, commonly, those that have no children envy those that have, as Rachel envied Leah; then those that have children will find them such a burthen in attempting to escape, and such a grief when they see them either fainting for famine, or falling by the sword, that they will envy those that have none, and say, "Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare," that have no children to be given up to the murderer, or to be snatched out of his hands. It would not only go ill with those who at that time were with child or giving suck, as Christ had said, Mat. xxiv. 19, but it would be terrible to those who ever had had children, and suckled them, and had them now alive: see Hos. ix. 11–14. See the vanity of the creature, and the uncertainty of its comforts; for such may be the changes of Providence concerning us, that those very things may become the greatest burthens, cares, and griefs to us, which we have delighted in as the greatest blessings.

2nd. They would wish to be buried alive, ver. 30; "they shall begin to say to the mountains, Fall on us; and to the hills, Cover us." This also refers to a passage in the same prophecy with the former, Hos. x. 8; they shall wish to be hid in the darkest caves, that they might be out of the noise of these calamities; they will be willing to be sheltered upon any terms, though with the hazard of being crushed to pieces: this would be the language especially of the great and mighty men, Rev. vi. 16. They that would not flee to Christ for refuge, and put themselves under his protection, will in vain call to hills and mountains to shelter them from his wrath.

3. He shews how natural it was for them to infer that desolation from his sufferings; ver. 31, "If they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" Some think this is borrowed from Eze. xx. 47, "The fire shall devour every green tree in thee, and every dry tree." These words may be applied.

1st. More particularly to the destruction of Jerusalem, which Christ here foretold, and which the Jews by putting him to death brought upon themselves. "If they," that is, the Jews, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, "do these things upon the green tree," if they do thus abuse an innocent and excellent person for his good works, how may they expect God to deal with them, for their so doing, who have made themselves a dry tree, a corrupt and wicked generation, and good for nothing? If this be their sin, what do you think will be their punishment? Or take it thus: If they (that is the Romans, their judges and their soldiers, abuse me thus,) who have given them no provocation, who am to them as a green tree, which you seem to be as much enraged at, what will they do by Jerusalem and the Jewish nation, who will be so very provoking to them, and make themselves as a dry tree, as fuel to the fire of their resentments? If God suffer those things to be done to me, what will he appoint to be done to those barren trees, of whom it had been often said, that they should be hewn down and cast into the fire? Mat. iii. 10; vii. 19.

2nd. It may be applied more generally to all the revelations of God's wrath against sin and sinners. If God deliver me up to such sufferings as these, because I am made a sacrifice for sin, what will he do with sinners themselves? Christ was a green tree, fruitful and flourishing; now if such things were done to him, we may from thence infer what should have been done to the whole race of mankind if he had not interposed, and what shall be done to those that continue dry trees, notwithstanding all that is done to make them fruitful. If God did this to the Son of his love, when he found but sin imputed to him, what shall he do to the generation of his wrath, when he finds sin reigning in them? If the Father were pleased in doing these things to the green tree, why should he be loath to do it to the dry? Note, The consideration of the bitter sufferings of our Lord Jesus should engage us to stand in awe of the justice of God, and to tremble before him. The best saints, compared with Christ, are dry trees; if he suffer, why may not they expect to suffer; and what then shall the damnation of sinners be?

32 And there were also two other, malefactors, led with him to be put to death. 33 And when they were come to the place, which is called Calvary, there they crucified him, and the malefactors, one on the right hand, and the other on the left. 34 Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do. And they parted his raiment, and cast lots. 35 And the people stood beholding. And the rulers also with them derided him, saying, He saved others; let him save himself, if he be Christ, the chosen of God. 36 And the soldiers also mocked him, coming to him, and offering him vinegar. 37 And saying, If thou be the king of the Jews, save thyself. 38 And a superscription also was written over him in letters of Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew, THIS IS THE KING OF THE JEWS. 39 And one of the malefactors which were hanged railed on him, saying, If thou be Christ, save thyself and us. 40 But the other answering rebuked him, saying, Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? 41 And we indeed justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss. 42 And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom. 43 And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, To day shalt thou be with me in paradise.

In these verses we have,

First. Divers passages which we had before in Matthew and Mark, concerning Christ's sufferings.

1. That there were "two other, malefactors, led with him" to the place of execution, who it is probable had been for some time under sentence of death, and were designed to be executed as this day; which was probably the pretence for making such haste in the prosecution of Christ, that he and these two malefactors might be executed together, and one solemnity might serve.

2. That he was crucified at a place called Calvary, Kparion, the Greek name for Golgotha, the place of a skull; an ignominious place, to add to the reproach of his sufferings; but significant, for there he triumphed over death as it were upon his own dunghill. He was crucified, that is, his hands and feet were nailed to the cross, as it lay upon the ground; and then it was lifted up, and fastened into the earth, or some socket to receive it. This was a painful and shameful death, above any other.

3. That he was crucified in the midst between two thieves, as if he had been the worst of the three: thus he was not only treated as a transgressor, but numbered with them, the worst of them.

4. That the soldiers, who were employed in the execution, seized his garments as their fee, and divided them among themselves by lot; "they parted his raiment and cast lots;" it was worth so little, that if it were divided it would come to next nothing, and therefore they cast lots for it.

5. That he was reviled, and reproached, and treated with all the scorn and contempt imaginable, when he was lifted up upon the cross. It was strange that so much barbarity should be found in the human nature. "The people stood beholding," not at all concerned, but rather pleasing themselves with the spectacle; "and the rulers," whom from their office one would take to be men of sense and men of honour, they stood among the rabble "and derided him," to set those on that were about them to do so too; and they said, "He saved others, let him save himself." Thus is he upbraided for the good works he had done, as if it were indeed for these that they crucified him. They triumph over him as if they had conquered him; whereas he was himself then more than a conqueror: they challenge him to save himself from the cross, when he was saving others by the cross; "If he be the Christ, the chosen of God, let him save himself." They knew that the Christ is the chosen of God, designed by him, and dear to him. If he, as the Christ, would deliver our nation from the Romans, (and they could not form any other idea but that of the Messiah,) let him deliver himself from the Romans, that have him now in their hands. Thus the Jewish rulers jeered him as captured by the Romans, instead of subduing them: the Roman soldiers jeered him as the king of the Jews; a people good enough for such a prince, and a prince good enough for such a people. They mocked him, ver. 36, 37; they made sport with him, and made a jest of his sufferings; and when they were drinking sharp, sour wine themselves, such as was generally allotted them, they triumphantly asked him if he would pledge them, or drink with them; and they said, "If thou be the king of the Jews, save thyself;" for as the Jews prosecuted him under the notion of a pretended Messiah, so the Romans under the notion of a pretended king.

6. That the superscription over his head, setting forth his crime, was, "This is the King of the Jews," ver. 38. He is put to death for pretending to be the king of the Jews, so they meant it; but God intended it to be a declaration of what he really was, notwithstanding his present disgrace: he is the King of the Jews, the King of the church; and his cross is the way to his crown. This was written in those that are called the three learned languages—Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew; for those are best learned that have learned Christ. It was written in these three languages that it might be known and read of all men; but God designed by it to signify that the Gospel of Christ should be preached to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, and be read in all languages. The Gentile philosophy made the Greek tongue famous; the Roman laws and government made the Latin tongue so; and the Hebrew excelled them all, for the sake of the Old Testament. In these three languages is Jesus Christ proclaimed king. Young scholars, that are taking pains at school to make themselves masters of these three languages, should aim at this, that in the use of them they may increase their acquaintance with Christ.

Secondly. Here are two passages which we had not before; and they are very remarkable ones.

1. Christ's prayer for his enemies; ver. 34, "Father, forgive them." Seven remarkable words Christ spoke after he was nailed to the cross, and before he died, and this is the first. One reason why he died the death of the cross was, that he might have liberty of speech to the last, and so might glorify his Father, and edify those about him. As soon as ever he was fastened to the cross, or while they were nailing him, he prayed this prayer; in which observe,

1st. The petition, "Father, forgive them." One would think he should have prayed, "Father, consume them; the Lord look upon it, and requite it." The sin they were now guilty of might justly have been made unpardonable, and justly might they have been excepted by name out of the act of indemnity. No: these are particularly prayed for; now he made intercession for transgressors, as was foretold, Isa. liii. 12; and it is to be added to his prayer, Jno. xvii., to complete the specimen he gave of his intercession within the veil; that for saints, this for sinners. Now the sayings of Christ upon the cross, as well as his sufferings, had a farther reach than they seemed to have. This was a mediatorial word, and expiatory of the intent and meaning of his death, "Father, forgive them;" not only these, but all that shall repent and believe the Gospel; and he did not intend that these should be forgiven upon any other terms. Father, that which I am now suffering and dying for, is in order to this, that poor sinners may be pardoned. Note, First The great thing favour of themselves. In their hearts the high priests would have been but too glad to get rid of Cæsar and all his agents, and to set up as king one of their own nation. Their sole reason for giving a political turn to the charge was their inability to succeed by other means.

xxiii. 7. "Herod's jurisdiction," or authority, included Galilee, as stated in chap. iii. 1. Herod had come to Jerusalem for the Passover, and he would but too readily show his religious zeal by listening to the charges of blasphemy. On other grounds he might wish to recover Pilate's favour.

xxiii. 15. From this it would seem that even Herod was not convinced of the truth of the accusations made against Jesus. In any case, he agreed with Pilate that he had done nothing deserving of death. For "nothing worthy of death is done unto him" real "nothing worthy of death is done by him." With this conclusion Pilate is satisfied, and proposes to chastise and release the prisoner.

which Christ died to purchase and procure for us is, the forgiveness of sin. Secondly. This is that which Christ intercedes for, for all that repent, and believe in the virtue of his satisfaction; his blood speaks this, "Father, forgive them." Thirdly. The greatest sinners may, through Christ, upon their repentance, hope to find mercy: "Father, forgive them;" though they were his persecutors and murderers.

2nd. The plea; "for they know not what they do;" for if they had known, they would not have crucified him, 1 Cor. ii. 8. There was a veil upon his glory, and upon their understandings; and how could they see through two veils? They wished his blood on them and their children, but had they known what they did, they would have wished it again. Note, First. The crucifiers of Christ, "know not what they do;" it is because they will not know it. Secondly. There is a kind of ignorance, that doth in part excuse sin,—ignorance through want of the means of knowledge, or of a capacity to receive instruction, through the infelicities of education, or inadvertency. The crucifiers of Christ were kept in ignorance by their did against Christ and his doctrine, they thought into them, so that, in what they did against Christ and his doctrine, they thought they did God service, Jno. xvi. 2. Such are to be pitied and prayed for. This prayer of Christ was answered not long after, when many of those that had a hand in his death were converted by Peter's preaching.

This is written also for example to us. 1st. We must in prayer call God Father; and come to him with reverence and confidence, as children to a father. 2nd. The great thing we must beg of God, both for ourselves and others, is the forgiveness of sins. 3rd. We must pray for our enemies, and those that hate and persecute us; must extenuate their offences, and not aggravate them, as we must our own, "they know not what they do;" peradventure it was an oversight;—and must be earnest with God in prayer for the forgiveness of their sins, their sins against us. This is Christ's example to his own rule, Mat. v. 44, 45, "Love your enemies;" and it very much strengthens the rule; for if Christ loved and prayed for such enemies, what enemies can we have which we are not obliged to love and pray for?

II. The conversion of the thief upon the cross, which is an illustrious instance of Christ's triumphing over principalities and powers, then when he seemed to be triumphed over by them. Christ was crucified between two thieves; and in them was represented the different effects which the cross of Christ would have upon the children of men, to whom it would be brought near in the preaching of the Gospel. They are all malefactors, all guilty before God. Now the cross of Christ is to some a savour of life unto life; to others, of death unto death. To them that perish it is foolishness; but to them that are saved it is the wisdom of God and the power of God.

1st. Here was one of these malefactors that was hardened to the last. At the cross of Christ he railed on him, as others did, ver. 39; he said, "If thou be the Christ," as they say thou art, "save thyself and us." Though he was now in pain and agony, and in the valley of the shadow of death, yet that did not humble his proud spirit, nor teach him to give good language; no, not to his fellow sufferer: "though thou bray a fool in a mortar, yet will not his foolishness depart from him;" no troubles will of themselves work a change in a wicked heart; but sometimes they irritate the corruption, which one would think they should mortify. He challengeth Christ to save both himself and them. Note, There are some that have the impudence to rail upon Christ, and yet the confidence to expect to be saved by him; nay, and to conclude that if he do not save them, he is not to be looked upon as the Saviour.

2nd. Here was the other of them that was softened at the last. It was said in Matthew and Mark, that both the thieves, even "they that were crucified with him, reviled him," which some think is by a figure put for one of them, but others think they both reviled him at first, till the heart of one of them was wonderfully changed, and with it his language, on a sudden. This malefactor, when just ready to fall into the hands of Satan, was snatched as a brand out of the burning, and made a monument of Divine mercy and grace; and Satan was left to roar, as a lion disappointed of his prey. This gives no encouragement to any to put off their repentance to their deathbed, or to hope that then they shall find mercy; for though it is certain that true repentance is never too late, it is as certain that late repentance is seldom true. None can be sure that they shall have time to repent at death; but every man may be sure he cannot have the advantages that this penitent thief had, whose case was altogether extraordinary. He never had any offer of Christ, nor day of grace before now; he was designed to be made a singular instance of the power of Christ's grace, now at a time when he was crucified in weakness. Christ, having conquered Satan, in the destruction of Judas and the preservation of Peter, erects this farther trophy of his victory over him, in the conversion of this malefactor, as a specimen of what he would do. We shall see the case extraordinary, if we observe,

First. The extraordinary operations of God's grace upon him, which appeared in what he said. Here were so many evidences given, in a short time, of a blessed change wrought in him, as that more could not have been given in so little compass.

First. He reproved him for railing on Christ, as destitute of the fear of God, and having no sense at all of religion: "Dost not thou fear God?" This implies that it was the fear of God, which restrained him from following the multitude to do this evil: "I fear God, and therefore dare not do it; and dost not thou?" All that have their eyes opened see this to be at the bottom of the wickedness of the wicked, that they have not the fear of God before their eyes: "If thou hadst any humanity in thee, thou wouldest not insult over one that is thy fellow sufferer; thou art in the same condition; thou art a dying man too; and therefore, whatever these wicked people do, it ill becomes thee to abuse a dying man."

Secondly. He owns that he deserved what was done to him: "We indeed justly." It is likely they both suffered for one and the same crime, and therefore he spake with the more assurance, "We receive the due reward of our deeds." This magnifies Divine grace, as acting in a distinguishing way. These two had been comrades in sin and suffering, and yet one is saved, and the other perisheth; two that had gone together all along hitherto, and yet now "one taken, and the other left." He doth not say, Thou indeed justly, but, We. Note, True penitents acknowledge the justice of God in all the punishments of their sin; God has done right, but we have done wickedly.

Thirdly. He believes Christ to have suffered wrongfully. Though he was condemned in two courts, and run upon as if he had been the worst of malefactors, yet this penitent thief is convinced by his carriage in his sufferings that he "has done nothing amiss." The chief priests would have him crucified between the malefactors, as one of them; but this thief has more sense than they, and owns his none of them. Whether he had before heard of Christ, and of his wondrous works, doth not appear, but the Spirit of grace enlightened him with this knowledge, and enabled him to say, "This man hath done nothing amiss;"—οὐδὲν ἁμαρτία—nothing absurd, or unbecoming his character.

2nd. See what he said to our Lord Jesus, ver. 42: "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." This is the prayer of a dying sinner to a dying Saviour. It was the honour of Christ to be thus prayed to, though he was upon the cross, reproached and reviled; it was the happiness of the thief thus to pray; perhaps he never prayed before, and yet now was heard and saved at the last gasp. While there is life there is hope; and while there is hope there is room for prayer.

First. Observe his faith in this prayer. In his confession of sin, ver. 44, he discovered repentance towards God; in this petition he discovered faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ. He owns him to be Lord, and to have a kingdom, and that he was going to that kingdom; that he should have authority in that kingdom, and that those should be happy whom he favours; and to believe and confess all this was a great thing at this time of day. Christ was now in the depth of disgrace—deserted by his own disciples, reviled by his own nation, suffering as a pretender, and not delivered by his Father. He made this profession before those prodigies happened which put honour upon his sufferings, and which startled the centurion; yet verily we have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. He believed another life after this, and desired to be happy in that life; not as the other thief, to be saved from the cross, but to be well done for when the cross had done its worst.

Secondly. Observe his humility in this prayer. All his request is, "Lord, remember me." He doth not pray, Lord, prefer me, as they did, Mat. xx. 21; though he having the honour, so as none of the disciples had, to drink of Christ's cup, and to be baptized with his baptism, either on his right hand or on his left in his sufferings, when his own disciples had deserted him, he might have had some colour to ask, as they did, to sit on his right hand and on his left in his kingdom; acquaintance in sufferings hath sometimes gained such a point, Jer. lii. 31, 32. But he is far from the thought of it; all he begs is, "Lord, remember me," referring himself to Christ in what way to remember him. It is a request like that of Joseph to the chief butler, "Think on me," Gen. xl. 14; and it sped better; the chief butler forgot Joseph, but Christ remembered this thief.

Thirdly. There is an air of importunity and fervency in this prayer; he doth as it were breathe out his soul in it: "Lord, remember me," and I have enough, I desire no more; into thy hands I commit my case. Note, To be remembered by Christ, now he is in his kingdom, is what we should earnestly desire and pray for; and it will be enough to secure our welfare, living and dying. Christ is in his kingdom interceding: "Lord, remember me," and intercede for me. He is there ruling: "Lord, remember me," and rule in me by thy Spirit. He is there preparing places for those that are his: "Lord, remember me," and prepare a place for me; remember me at death; remember me in the resurrection." See Job xiv. 13.

Secondly. The extraordinary grants of Christ's favour to him: "Jesus said unto him," in answer to his prayer, "Verily I say unto thee," "I, the Amen,—the faithful witness,—I say amen to this prayer; put my fiat to it. Nay, thou shalt have more than thou didst ask, 'This day thou shalt be with me in paradise,'" ver. 43. Observe.

1st. To whom this was spoken; to the penitent thief,—to him, and not to his companion. Christ upon the cross is like Christ upon the throne; for "now is the judgment of this world;" one departs with a curse, the other with a blessing. Though Christ was now himself in the greatest struggle and agony, yet he had a word of comfort to speak to a poor penitent, that committed himself to him. Note, Even great sinners, if they be true penitents, shall, through Christ, obtain not only the pardon of their sins, but a place in the paradise of God, Heb. ix. 15. This magnifies the riches of free grace, that rebels and traitors shall not only be pardoned, but preferred, thus preferred.

2nd. By whom this was spoken. This was another mediatorial word which Christ spoke, though upon a particular occasion, yet with a general intention, to explain the true intent and meaning of his sufferings; as he died to purchase the forgiveness of sins for us, ver. 34, so also to purchase eternal life for us. By this word we are given to understand, that Jesus Christ died to "open the kingdom of heaven to all penitent, obedient believers."

First. Christ here lets us know that he was going to paradise himself,—to Hades, to the invisible world; his human soul was removing to the place of separate souls; not the place of the damned, but to paradise, the place of the blessed. By this he assures us that his satisfaction was accepted, and the Father was well pleased in him, else he had not gone to paradise; that was the beginning of the joy set before him, which he comforted himself with the prospect of. He went by the cross to the crown, and we must not think of going any other way, or of being perfected but by sufferings.

Secondly. He lets all penitent believers know that when they die they shall go to be with him there. He was now, as a priest, purchasing this happiness for them; and is ready, as a king, to confer it upon them, when they are prepared and made ready for it. See here how the happiness of heaven is set forth to us. 1. It is paradise, a garden of pleasure, the paradise of God, Rev. ii. 7, alluding to the garden of Eden, in which our first parents were placed when they were innocent. In the second Adam we are restored to all we lost in the first Adam; and more, to a heavenly paradise, instead of an earthly one. 2. It is being with Christ there; that is the happiness of heaven, to see Christ, and sit with him, and share in his glory, Jno. xvii. 24. 3. It is immediate upon death: "This day thou shalt be with me;" to-night, before to-morrow. The souls of the faithful, after they are delivered from the burden of the flesh, immediately are in joy and felicity; the spirits of just men immediately made perfect. Lazarus departs, and is comforted presently; and Paul with Christ immediately, Phil. i. 23.

44 And it was about the sixth hour, and there was a darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour. 45 And the sun was darkened, and the veil of the temple was rent in the midst. 46 And when Jesus had cried with a loud voice, he said, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit: and having said thus, he gave up the ghost. 47 Now when the centurion saw what was done, he glorified God, saying, Certainly this was a righteous man. 48 And all the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things which were done, smote their breasts, and returned. 49 And all his acquaintance, and the women that followed him from Galilee, stood afar off, beholding these things.

xxiii. 17. This verse is omitted by the Vatican, Alexandrian, and other MSS., but occurs in the Sinaitic, Cambridge, and other ancient copies.

xxiii. 23. "They were instant;" that is, "were urgent." "Of them"—i.e., of the people, who were present, as already mentioned in verse 13.

xxiii. 26. Later times professed to know the actual road taken on this occasion, and the exact spots where various incidents occurred.

It is scarcely needful to say that the havoc made with Jerusalem after its surrender to Titus would effectually destroy any landmarks which the first Christians associated with the incidents actually recorded. Superstition has invented and added to them.

xxiii. 28. The expression "daughters of Jerusalem," meaning "women of Jerusalem," fairly teaches that these were not the women who had followed Jesus from Galilee, but part of the crowd which had come together, as is usual at public executions and spectacles.

In these verses we have three things.

First, Christ's dying magnified, by the prodigies that attended it. Only two are here mentioned, which we had an account of before.

1. The darkening of the sun at noonday: "It was now about the sixth hour;" that is, according to our computation, twelve o'clock at noon; "and there was a darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour;" the sun was eclipsed, and the air exceedingly clouded at the same time, both which concurred to this thick darkness, which continued three hours, not three days, as that of Egypt did.

2. The rending of the veil of the temple. The former prodigy was in the heavens, this in the temple; for both these are the houses of God, and could not but feel it when the Son of God was thus abused, and thus signify their resentment of it. By this rending of the veil was signified the taking away of the ceremonial law, which was a wall of partition between Jews and Gentiles, and of all other difficulties and discouragements in our approach to God, so that now we may come boldly to the throne of grace.

Secondly, Christ's dying explained, ver. 46, by the words with which he breathed out his soul. Jesus had cried with a loud voice, when he said, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" so we are told in Matthew and Mark; and it should seem it was with a loud voice that he said this too, to shew his earnestness, and that all the people might take notice of it. And this he said, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit."

1. He borrowed these words from his father David, Ps. cxxi. 5; not that he needed to have words put into his mouth; but he chose to make use of David's words, to shew that it was the Spirit of Christ that testified in the Old Testament prophets, and that he came to fulfil the Scripture. Christ died with Scriptures in his mouth; thus he directs us to make use of Scripture language in our addresses to God.

2. In this address to God he calls him Father; when he complained of being forsaken, he cried, "Eli, Eli, my God;" but to shew that that dreadful agony of his soul was now over, he here calls God Father. When he was giving up his life and soul for us, he did for us call God Father, that we through him might receive the adoption of sons.

3. Christ made use of these words in a sense peculiar to himself as Mediator. He was now to "make his soul an offering for our sin," Isa. liii. 10; to "give his life a ransom for many," Mat. xx. 28; "by the eternal Spirit to offer himself," Heb. ix. 14. He was himself both the priest and the sacrifice; our souls were forfeited, and his must go to redeem the forfeiture; the price must be paid into the hands of God, the party offended by sin; to him he had undertaken to make full satisfaction. Now by these words he offered up the sacrifice; did as it were lay his hand upon the head of it, and surrender it; "I deposit it," I pay it down into thy hands; Father, accept of my life and soul, instead of the lives and souls of the sinners I die for. The animus offerentis, "the goodwill of the offerer," was requisite to the acceptance of the offering. Now Christ here expresseth his cheerful willingness to offer himself, as he had done when it was first proposed to him, Heb. x. 9, 10; "Lo, I come to do thy will," "by the which will we are sanctified."

4. Christ here signifies his dependence upon his Father for his resurrection, by the reunion of his soul and body. He commends his spirit into his Father's hand, to be received into paradise, and returned the third day. By this it appears that our Lord Jesus, as he had a true body, so he had a reasonable soul, which existed in a state of separation from the body, and thus he was made like unto his brethren: this soul he lodged in his Father's hand, committed to his custody, resting in hope that it should not be left in Hades, in its state of separation from the body; no, not so long as that the body might see corruption.

5. Christ has hereby left us an example; has fitted those words of David to the purpose of dying saints, and hath as it were sanctified them for their use. In death, our great care should be about our souls; and we cannot more effectually provide for their welfare than by committing them now into the hands of God, as a Father, to be sanctified and governed by his Spirit and grace; and at death, committing them into his hands to be made perfect in holiness and happiness. We must shew that we are freely willing to die, that we firmly believe another life after this, and are desirous of it, by saying, "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit."

Thirdly, Christ's dying improved, by the impressions it made upon those that attended him.

1. The centurion, that had command of the guard, was much affected with what he saw, ver. 47. He was a Roman, a Gentile, a stranger to the consolations of Israel, and yet he glorified God. He never saw such amazing instances of Divine power, and therefore took occasion from thence to adore God as the Almighty. And he bore a testimony to the patient sufferer: "Certainly this was a righteous man," and was unjustly put to death. God's manifesting his power so much to do him honour, was a plain evidence of his innocency. His testimony in Matthew and Mark goes farther: "Truly this was the Son of God." But in this case this amounts to the same; for if he was a righteous man, he said very truly when he said he was the Son of God; and therefore that testimony of his concerning himself must be admitted; for if it were false, he was not a righteous man.

2. The disinterested spectators could not but be concerned. This is taken notice of only here, ver. 48; "all the people that came together to that sight," as is usual upon such occasions, "beholding the things which were done," could not but go away very serious for the time, whatever they were when they came home; "they smote their breasts, and returned." 1st. They laid the thing very much to heart for the present; they looked upon it as a wicked thing to put him to death, and could not but think that some judgment of God would come upon their nation for it. Probably those very people, were of those that had cried, "Crucify him, crucify him;" and when he was nailed to the cross, reviled and blasphemed him; but now were so terrified with the darkness and earthquake, and the uncommon manner of his expiring, that they had not only their mouths stopped, but their consciences startled; and in remorse for what they had done, as the publican, they "smote upon their breasts," beat upon their own hearts, as those that had indignation at themselves. And some think this was a happy step towards that good work which was afterwards wrought upon them, when they were pricked to the heart, Acts ii. 37. 2nd. Yet it should seem the impression soon wore off; they "smote their breasts, and returned." They did not shew any farther token of respect to Christ, nor inquire more concerning him; but went home, and, we have reason to fear, in a little time they quite forgot it. Thus many that see Christ evidently set forth, crucified among them in the Word and sacraments, are a little affected for the present, but it doth not continue; they smite their breast, and return; they see Christ's face in the glass of the ordinances, and admire him; but they go away, and straightway forget what manner of man he is, and what reason they have to love him.

3. His own friends and followers were forced to keep their distance, and yet got as near as they could and durst, to see what was done, ver. 49; "all his acquaintance," that knew him, and were known of him, "stood afar off," for fear lest, if they had been near him, they should have been taken up as favourites of him. This was part of his sufferings, as of Job's, Job xix. 13, "He has put my brethren far from me, and mine acquaintance are verily estranged from me;" Ps. lxxxviii. 18. And "the women that followed him" together "from Galilee were beholding these things," not knowing what to make of them, nor so ready as they should have been to take them for certain preludes of his resurrection. Now was Christ "set for a sign that should be spoken against," as Simeon foretold, "that the thoughts of many hearts might be revealed," ch. ii. 34, 35.

50 And, behold, there was a man named Joseph, a counsellor; and he was a good man, and a just: 51 (The same had not consented to the counsel and deed of them;) he was of Arimathæa, a city of the Jews: who also himself waited for the kingdom of God. 52 This man went unto Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus. 53 And he took it down, and wrapped it in linen, and laid it in a sepulchre that was hewn in stone, wherein never man before was laid. 54 And that day was the preparation, and the sabbath drew on. 55 And the women also, which came with him from Galilee, followed after, and beheld the sepulchre, and how his body was laid. 56 And they returned, and prepared spices and ointments; and rested the sabbath day according to the commandment.

We have here an account of Christ's burial; for he must be brought not only to death, but to the dust of death, Ps. xxii. 15, according to the sentence, Gen. iii. 19, "unto the dust shalt thou return." Observe,

I. Who buried him. His acquaintance stood afar off; they had neither money to bear the charge, nor courage to bear the odium, of burying him decently; but God raised up one that had both; "a man named Joseph," ver. 50. His character is, that "he was a good man, and a just;" a man of unspotted reputation for virtue and piety; was not only just to all, but good to all that needed him; and care to bury the dead, as becomes the hope of the resurrection of the dead, is one instance of goodness and beneficence. He was a person of quality, a counsellor, a senator, a member of the Sanhedrim, one of the elders of the Jewish church. Having said this of him, it was necessary to add, that though he was of that body of men who had put Christ to death, yet he "had not consented to their counsel and deed," ver. 51; though it was carried by the majority, yet he entered his protest against it, and followed not the multitude to do evil. Note, That evil counsel and deed shall not be reckoned our act which we have not consented to; nay, he not only dissented openly from those that were enemies to Christ, but he consented secretly with those that were his friends. He "himself waited for the kingdom of God;" he believed the Old Testament prophecies of the Messiah and his kingdom, and expected the accomplishment of them. This was the man that appears upon this occasion to have a true respect for the Lord Jesus. Note, There are many who are hearty in Christ's interests, who, though they do not make any show in their outward profession of it, yet will be more ready to do him a piece of real service, when there is occasion, than others that make a greater figure and noise.

II. What he did towards the burying of him. 1. He "went to Pilate," the judge that condemned him, "and begged the body of Jesus," for it was at his dispose; and though he might have raised a party sufficient to have carried off the body by violence, yet he would take the regular course, and do it peaceably. 2. He "took it down," it should seem with his own hands, "and wrapped it in linen." They tell us it was the manner of the Jews (and that the word here used signifies so much) to roll the bodies of the dead, as we do little children in their swaddling clothes; so that the piece of fine linen, which he bought whole, he cut into many pieces for that purpose. It is said of Lazarus, he was bound hand and foot, Jno. xi. 44. Grave clothes are to the saints as swaddling clothes, which they shall outgrow, and put off when they come to the perfect man.

III. Where he was buried; "in a sepulchre that was hewn in stone;" that the prison of the grave might be made strong, as the church, when she was brought into darkness, had her way enclosed with hewn stone, Lam. iii. 2, 9; but it was a sepulchre in which "never man before was laid," for he was buried on such an account as never any one before him was buried, only in order to his rising again the third day by his own power; and he was to triumph over the grave, so as never any man did.

IV. When he was buried, ver. 54; "on the day of the preparation, when the sabbath drew on." This is given as a reason why they made such haste with the funeral, because the sabbath drew on, which required their attendance to other work, preparing for the sabbath, and going forth to welcome it. Note, Weeping must not hinder sowing. Though they were in tears for the death of Christ, yet they must apply themselves to the sanctifying of the sabbath. And when the sabbath draws on, there must be preparation; our worldly affairs must be so ordered as that they may not hinder us from our sabbath work; and our holy affections must be so excited as that they may carry us on in it.

V. Who attended the funeral, ver. 55; not any of the disciples, but only "the women that came with him from Galilee," ver. 55; who as they stayed by him while he hung on the cross, so they followed him, all in tears no doubt, "and beheld the sepulchre," where it was, what was the way to it, "and how his body was laid" in it. They were led to this, not by their curiosity, but by their affection to the Lord Jesus, which was strong as death, cruel as the grave, and which many waters could not quench. Here was a silent funeral, and not a solemn one, and yet his rest was glorious.

VI. What preparation was made for the embalming of his body, after he was buried, ver. 56; "they returned, and prepared spices and ointments," which was more an evidence of their love than of their faith; for had they remembered and believed what he had so often told them, that he should rise again the third day, they would have spared their cost and pains herein, as knowing that in a short time there would be a greater honour put upon his body by the glory of his resurrection, than they could put honour upon it with air most xxiii. 31. Proverbial in form. Green wood, retaining sap and vitality, is less likely to be uprooted and less easily burned than that which is dry and dead.

xxiii. 33. "Calvary" is from the Latin Vulgate. The Greek in all the evangelists has the word Kranion, another form of the Latin cranium, "a skull." It is impossible to say why the place was so called, though common to suppose it was a knoll or small round hill.

xxiii. 34. This verse is omitted by the Vatican MS., as far as the words "what they do." It is also left out by some other authorities, but the majority have it.

xxiii. 38. The words, "in letters of Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew," are not contained in some of the oldest copies, but are in the Sinaitic and Peshito.

xxiii. 43. Neander says Paradise is "a symbolical name for the regions of bliss," and regards the promise as one of "immediate bliss."

precious ointments; but as busy as they were in this preparation, they "rested the sabbath day," and did none of this servile work thereon, not only according to the custom of their nation, but "according to the commandment" of their God; which, though the day be altered, is still in full force; "Remember the sabbath day to keep it holy."

CHAPTER XXIV.

Our Lord Jesus went gloriously down to death, in spite of the malice of his enemies, who did all they could to make his death ignominious; but he rose again more gloriously; of which we have an account in this chapter; and the proofs and evidences of Christ's resurrection are more fully related by this evangelist than they were by Matthew and Mark. Here is, I. Assurances given by two angels, to the women who visited the sepulchre, that the Lord Jesus was risen from the dead, according to his own word, which the angels refer them to, ver. 1-7; and the report of this to the apostles, ver. 8-11. II. The visit which Peter made to the sepulchre, and his discoveries there, ver. 12. III. Christ's conference with the two disciples that were going to Emmaus, and his making of himself known to them, ver. 13-35. IV. His appearing to the eleven disciples themselves, the same day at evening, ver. 36-48. V. The farewell he gave them, and his ascension into heaven, and the joy and praise of his disciples whom he left behind, ver. 49-53.

NOW upon the first day of the week, very early in the morning, they came unto the sepulchre, bringing the spices which they had prepared, and certain others with them. 2 And they found the stone rolled away from the sepulchre. 3 And they entered in, and found not the body of the Lord Jesus. 4 And it came to pass, as they were much perplexed thereabout, behold, two men stood by them in shining garments: 5 And as they were afraid, and bowed down their faces to the earth, they said unto them, Why seek ye the living among the dead? 6 He is not here, but is risen: remember how he spake unto you when he was yet in Galilee, 7 Saying, The Son of man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again. 8 And they remembered his words, 9 And returned from the sepulchre, and told all these things unto the eleven, and to all the rest. 10 It was Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary the mother of James, and other women that were with them, which told these things unto the apostles. 11 And their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not. 12 Then arose Peter, and ran unto the sepulchre; and stooping down, he beheld the linen clothes laid by themselves, and departed, wondering in himself at that which was come to pass.

The manner of the reuniting of Christ's soul and body in his resurrection is a mystery, one of the secret things that belong not to us; but the infallible proofs of his resurrection, that he did indeed rise from the dead, and was thereby proved to be the Son of God, are things revealed, which belong to us, and to our children; and some of them we have here in these verses, which relate the same story for substance that we had in Matthew and Mark.

I. We have here the affection and respect which the good women that had followed Christ shewed to him, after he was dead and buried, ver. 1. As soon as ever they could, after the sabbath was over, they came to the sepulchre to embalm his body; not to take it out of the linen in which Joseph had wrapped it, but to anoint the head and face, and perhaps the wounded hands and feet, and to scatter sweet spices upon and about the body; as it is usual with us to strew flowers about the dead bodies and graves of our friends, only to shew our goodwill towards the taking off the deformity of death, if we could, and to make them somewhat the less loathsome to those that are about them. The zeal of those good women for Christ did continue; the spices which they had prepared the evening before the sabbath at a great expense; they did not upon the second thoughts, when they slept upon it, dispose of otherwise, suggesting "to what purpose is this waste?" but they brought them to the sepulchre on the morning after the sabbath, early, very early. It is a rule of charity, "every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give," 2 Cor. ix. 7; what is prepared for Christ, let it be used for him. Notice is taken of the names of these women, "Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary the mother of James;" grave, matronly women, it should seem they were. Notice is also taken of certain others with them, ver. 1; and again, ver. 10; these, that had not joined in preparing the spices, yet would go along with them to the sepulchre; as if the number of Christ's friends increased when he was dead, Jno. xii. 24, 32. The daughters of Jerusalem, when they saw how inquisitive the spouse was after her beloved, were desirous to seek him with her, Cant. vi. 1; so were these other women. The zeal of some provokes others.

II. The surprise they were in, when they found the stone rolled away, and the grave empty, ver. 2, 3. They were much perplexed at that, ver. 4, which they had much reason to rejoice in, that "the stone was rolled away from the sepulchre," by which it appeared that he had a legal discharge, and leave to come out; and that they "found not the body of the Lord Jesus," by which it appeared he had made use of his discharge, and was come out. Note, Good Christians often perplex themselves about that with which they should comfort and encourage themselves.

III. The plain account which they had of Christ's resurrection from two angels, that appeared to them in shining garments, not only white, but bright, and casting a lustre about them; they first saw one angel without the sepulchre, who presently went in and sat with another angel in the sepulchre, "one at the head, and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain;" so the evangelists may be reconciled. The women when they saw the angels were afraid, lest they had some ill news for them; but instead of inquiring of them, "bowed down their faces to the earth," to look for their dear Master in the grave; they would rather find him in his grave clothes, than angels themselves in their shining garments; a dying Jesus has more beauty in the eyes of a believer than angels themselves. These women like the spouse, when found by the watchmen, (and angels are called watchmen,) enter not into any other conversation with them, but "saw ye him whom my soul loveth?" Now here, 1. They upbraid the women with the absurdity of the search they were making, ver. 5: "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" witness is hereby given to Christ that he is living; of him "it is witnessed that he liveth," Heb. vii. 8; and it is the comfort of all the saints, "I know that my Redeemer liveth;" for because he lives we shall live also; but a reproof is given to those that look for him "among the dead," among the dead heroes, that the Gentiles worshipped, as if he were but like one of them; that look for him in an image, or a crucifix, the work of men's hands; or among unwritten traditions, and the inventions of men; and indeed, all they that expect happiness and satisfaction in the creature, or perfection in this imperfect state, may be said to seek the living among the dead.

2. They assure them that he is risen from the dead, ver. 6: "He is not here, but is risen," is risen by his own power. He has quitted his grave, to return no more to it. These angels were competent witnesses, for they had been sent express from heaven with orders for his discharge; and we are sure that their record is true, they durst not tell a lie.

3. They refer them to his own words; "remember what he spake to you when he was yet in Galilee." If they had duly believed and observed the prediction of it, they would easily have believed the thing itself, when it came to pass; and therefore, that the tidings might not be such a surprise to them as it seemed to be, he repeats to them what Christ had often said in their hearing; "The Son of man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men;" and though it was done by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, yet they that did it were not the less sinful for doing it. He told them that he must be crucified; surely they could not forget that which they had with so much concern seen fulfilled; and would not that bring to their mind, that which always followed, the "third day he shall rise again?" Observe, these angels from heaven bring not any new gospel, but put them in mind, as the angels of the churches do, of the sayings of Christ, and teach them how to improve and apply them.

IV. Their satisfaction in this account, ver. 8. The women seemed to acquiesce; they "remembered his words," when they were thus put in mind of them, and concluded from thence, if he were risen, it was no more than they had reason to expect; and now were ashamed of the preparations they had made to embalm him on the third day who had often said he would on the third day rise again. Note, A reasonable remembrance of the words of Christ will help us to a right understanding of his providence.

V. The report they brought of this to the apostles; "they returned from the sepulchre, and told all these things to the eleven, and to all the rest" of Christ's disciples, ver. 9. It doth not appear that they were together in a body; they were "scattered every one to his own;" perhaps scarce two or three of them together in the same lodgings; but one went to some of them, and another to others of them, so that in a little time that morning they got them all notice of it. But we are told, ver. 11, how the report was received, "their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not." They thought it was only the fancy of the women, and imputed it to the power of imagination; for they also had forgotten Christ's words, and wanted to be put in mind of them; not only what he had said to them in Galilee, some time ago, but what he had said very lately, in the night wherein he was betrayed; "again a little while and ye shall see me. I will see you again." One would be amazed at the stupidity of these disciples, who had themselves so often professed that they believed Christ to be the Son of God, and the true Messiah, had been so often told he must die and rise again, and then enter into his glory, had seen him more than once raise the dead, that they should be so backward to believe his raising himself. Surely it would seem the less strange to them, when hereafter this complaint would justly be taken up by them, to remember, that when time was it might justly have been taken up against them: "Who hath believed our report?"

VI. The inquiry which Peter made hereupon, ver. 12. It was Mary Magdalene that brought the report to him, as appears Jno. xx. 1, 2; where this story of his running to the sepulchre is more particularly related. 1. Peter hastened to the sepulchre, upon the report; perhaps ashamed of himself, to think that Mary Magdalene should have been there before him; and yet perhaps he had not been so ready to go thither now, if the women had not told him among other things that the watch was fled. Many that are swift-footed enough when there is no danger, are but cow-hearted when there is. Peter now ran to the sepulchre, who but the other day ran from his Master. 2. He looked into the sepulchre, and took notice how orderly the linen clothes in which Christ was wrapped were taken off, and folded up, and laid by themselves, but the body gone. He was very particular in making his observations, as if he would rather credit his own eyes than the testimony of the angels. 3. He went away, as he thought, not much the wiser, "wondering in himself at that which was come to pass." Had he remembered the words of Christ, even this was enough to satisfy him that he was risen from the dead; but having forgotten them, he is only amazed with the thing, and knows not what to make of it. There is many a thing puzzling and perplexing to us, which would be both plain and profitable, if we did but rightly understand the words of Christ, and had them ready to us.

13 And, behold, two of them went that same day to a village called Emmaus, which was from Jerusa-xxiii. 44, 45. Julius Africanus says the heathen historian Thallus calls this darkness an eclipse of the sun; this, however, it could not be. It is stated in the Gemara that the folding doors of the Temple, though locked, suddenly burst open about forty years before the fall of Jerusalem.

xxiii. 54. The sense of this verse is, "and the day was Friday, and Sabbath (Saturday) was approaching." The time answered to our Friday afternoon. The Greek word rendered "drew on" literally

xxiv. 1. The women had purchased the aromatics on Friday evening, and came to the tomb with them on the Sunday morning. The apparently different account of the purchase in Mark xvi. 1 is to be explained in accordance with the clearer statement here. The expression, "and certain others with them," is not found in the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS., and is omitted in some modern editions.

lem about threescore furlongs. 14 And they talked together of all these things which had happened. 15 And it came to pass, that, while they communed together and reasoned, Jesus himself drew near, and went with them. 16 But their eyes were holden that they should not know him. 17 And he said unto them, What manner of communications are these that ye have one to another, as ye walk, and are sad? 18 And the one of them, whose name was Cleopas, answering said unto him, Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things which are come to pass there in these days? 19 And he said unto them, What things? And they said unto him, Concerning Jesus of Nazareth, which was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people: 20 And how the chief priests and our rulers delivered him to be condemned to death, and have crucified him. 21 But we trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel: and beside all this, to day is the third day since these things were done. 22 Yea, and certain women also of our company made us astonished, which were early at the sepulchre; 23 And when they found not his body, they came, saying, that they had also seen a vision of angels, which said that he was alive. 24 And certain of them which were with us went to the sepulchre, and found it even so as the women had said: but him they saw not. 25 Then he said unto them, O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken: 26 Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory? 27 And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself. 28 And they drew nigh unto the village, whither they went: and he made as though he would have gone further. 29 But they constrained him, saying, Abide with us: for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent. And he went in to tarry with them. 30 And it came to pass, as he sat at meat with them, he took bread, and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them. 31 And their eyes were opened, and they knew him; and he vanished out of their sight. 32 And they said one to another, Did not our heart burn within us, while he talked with us by the way, and while he opened to us the scriptures? 33 And they rose up the same hour, and returned to Jerusalem, and found the eleven gathered together, and them that were with them, 34 Saying, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon. 35 And they told what things were done in the way, and how he was known of them in breaking of bread.

This appearance of Christ to the two disciples going to Emmaus was mentioned, and but just mentioned, before, Mar. xvi. 12; here it is largely related. It happened the same day that Christ rose, the first day of the new world that rose with him. One of these two disciples was Cleopas, or Alpheus, said by the ancients to be the brother of Joseph, Christ's supposed father; who the other was is not certain; some think it was Peter. It should seem indeed that Christ did appear particularly to Peter that day, which the eleven spoke of among themselves, ver. 34, and Paul mentions, 1 Cor. xv. 5; but it could not be Peter that was one of the two, for he was one of the eleven to whom the two returned. And besides, we know Peter so well as to think, that if he had been one of the two, he would have been the chief speaker, and not Cleopas. It was one of those that were associate with the eleven, mentioned ver. 9. Now in this passage of story we may observe,

First, The walk and talk of these two disciples: "they went to a village called Emmaus," which is reckoned to be about two hours' walk from Jerusalem. It is here said to be about sixty furlongs, seven measured miles, ver. 13. Whether they went thither upon business, or to see some friend, doth not appear. I suspect they were going homewards to Galilee, with an intention not to inquire more after this Jesus; that they were meditating a retreat, and stole away from their company, without asking leave, or taking leave; for the accounts brought them that morning of their Master's resurrection seemed to them as idle tales; and if so, no wonder they began to think of making the best of their way home.

But as they travelled they "talked together of all these things which had happened," ver. 14. They had not courage to confer of these things, and consult what was to be done in the present juncture at Jerusalem, for fear of the Jews; but when they were got out of the hearing of the Jews, they could talk it over with more freedom: they talked over these things, reasoning with themselves concerning the probabilities of Christ's resurrection; for according as these appeared they would either go forward or return back to Jerusalem. Note, It well becomes the disciples of Christ, when they are together, to talk of his death and resurrection; thus they may improve one another's knowledge, refresh one another's memory, and stir up one another's devout affections.

Secondly, The good company they met with upon the road, when Jesus himself came and joined himself to them; ver. 15, "they communed together and reasoned," and perhaps were warm at the argument; one hoping, that their Master was risen, and would set up his kingdom, the other despairing, "that Jesus himself drew near," as a stranger that, seeing them travel the same way that he went, told them he should be glad of their company.

We may observe it for our encouragement to keep up Christian conference and edifying discourse among us, that where but two together are well employed in work of that kind, Christ will come to them and make a third. When they that fear the Lord speak one to another, the Lord hearkens and hears, and is with them of a truth; so that two thus twisted in faith and love become a threefold cord, not easily broken, Ecc. iv. 12. They, in their communings and reasonings together, were searching for Christ, comparing notes concerning him, that they might come to more knowledge of him; and now Christ comes to them. Note, They who seek Christ shall find him; he will manifest himself to those that inquire after him, and give knowledge to those who use the helps for knowledge which they have. When the spouse inquired of the watchmen concerning her Beloved, it was but a little that she passed from them but she found him, Cant. iii. 4.

But though they had Christ with them, they were not at first aware of it; ver. 16, "their eyes were holden that they should not know him." It should seem there was both an alteration in the object,—for it is said in Mark that now "he appeared in another form,"—and a restraint upon the organ; for here it is said that their eyes were held by a Divine power; or, as some think, there was a confusion in the medium, the air was so disposed that they could not discern who it was. No matter how it was, but so it was, they did not know him; Christ so ordering it that they might the more freely discourse with him, and he with them; and that it might appear that his Word, and the influence of it, did not depend upon his bodily presence, which the disciples had too much doted upon, and must be weaned from. But he could teach them and warm their hearts by others, who should have his spiritual presence with them, and should have his grace going along with them unseen.

Thirdly, The conference that was between Christ and them, when he knew them, and they knew not him. Now Christ and his disciples, as is usual when friends meet incognito, or in a disguise, are here crossing questions.

1. Christ's first question to them is concerning their present sadness, which plainly appeared in their countenances, ver. 17: "What manner of communications are these that ye have one to another, as ye walk, and are sad?" It is a very kind and friendly inquiry. Observe,

1st. They were sad; it appeared to a stranger that they were so. First. They had lost their dear Master, and were, in their own apprehensions, quite disappointed in their expectations from him. They had given up the cause, and knew not what course to take to retrieve it. Note, Christ's disciples have reason to be sad when he withdraws from them; to fast when the Bridegroom is taken from them. Secondly. Though he was risen from the dead, yet either they did not know it, or did not believe it, and so they were still in sorrow. Note, Christ's disciples are often sad and sorrowful, even then when they have reason to rejoice, but through the weakness of their faith, they cannot take the comfort that is offered to them. Thirdly. Being sad, they had communications one with another concerning Christ. Note, 1st. It becomes Christians to talk of Christ. Were our hearts as full of him, and of what he has done and suffered for us, as they should be, out of the abundance of the heart the mouth would speak, not only of God and his providence, but of Christ and his grace and love. 2nd. Good company and good converse is an excellent antidote against prevailing melancholy. When Christ's disciples were sad, they did not each one get by himself, but continued as he sent them out, two and two, for two is better than one, especially in times of sorrow. Giving vent to the grief may perhaps give ease to the grieved; and by talking it over, we may talk ourselves, or our friends may talk us, into a better frame. Joint-mourners should be mutual comforters; comforts sometimes come best from such.

2nd. Christ came up to them and inquired into the matter of their talk, and the cause of their grief: "What manner of communications are these?" Though Christ was now entered into his state of exaltation, yet he continued tender of his disciples, and concerned for their comfort. He speaks as one troubled to see their melancholy: "Wherefore look ye so sadly to-day," Gen. xl. 7. Note, Our Lord Jesus takes notice of the sorrow and sadness of his disciples, and is afflicted in their afflictions. Christ has hereby taught us, First. To be conversable. Christ here fell into discourse with two grave, serious persons, though he was a stranger to them, and they knew him not; and they readily embraced it. It doth not become Christians to be morose and shy, but to take pleasure in good society. Secondly. We are hereby taught to be compassionate. When we see our friends in sorrow and sadness, we should, like Christ here, take cognizance of their grief, and give them the best counsel and comfort we can; "weep with them that weep."

2. In answer to this, they put a question to him concerning his strangeness, ver. 18: "Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things that are come to pass there in these days?" Observe,

1st. Cleopas gave him a civil answer; he doth not rudely ask him, "What is that to you what we are talking of?" and bid him go about his business. Note, We ought to be civil to those who are civil to us, and to carry ourselves obligingly to all, both in word and deed. It was a dangerous time now with Christ's disciples, yet he was not jealous of this stranger, that he had any design upon xxiv. 4. The sense of the Greek words rendered "stood by them" is explained by eminent critics to be, "suddenly appeared before them." The angels are described according to the form in which they appeared. Matthew xxviii. 5 speaks of an angel in the singular number; Mark, too (xvi. 5), speaks of an angel as a young man; from which some have inferred that the narratives are inconsistent with each other. Lessing says, "First one appeared, and then another; first in this place, then in that; now in company, now alone." On this and other presumed discrepancies in the Gospel narratives of the resurrection, it is impossible to dwell in these brief notes. The subject has been ably treated of by the more recent critical commentators, and by the best writers upon the life of Christ. The incidental variations are no more than must be expected in accounts of events which followed one another rapidly, and were related by persons whose mental condition must have been one of great anxiety and excitement.

them, to inform against them, or bring them into trouble. Charity is not forward to think evil, nor, not of strangers.

2nd. He is full of Christ himself, and of his death and sufferings, and wonders that every body else is not so too. "What, art thou such a stranger in Jerusalem as not to know what has been done to our Master there?" Note, Those are strangers indeed in Jerusalem that know not of the death and sufferings of Christ. What, are they daughters of Jerusalem, and yet so little acquainted with Christ, as to ask, "What is thy beloved more than another beloved?"

3rd. He is very willing to inform this stranger concerning Christ, and to draw on farther discourse with him upon this subject. He would not have any one that had the face of a man to be ignorant of Christ. Note, Those who have themselves the knowledge of Christ crucified should do what they can to spread that knowledge, and lead others into an acquaintance with him. And it is observable, these disciples that were so forward to instruct the stranger were instructed by him; for to him that has, and uses what he has, shall be given.

4th. It appears, by what Cleopas saith, that the death of Christ made a mighty noise in Jerusalem, so that it could not be imagined any man should be such a stranger in the city as not to know of it. It was all the talk of the town, and discoursed of in all companies. Thus the matter of fact came to be universally known, which, after the pouring out of the Spirit, was to be explained.

3. Christ, by way of reply, asks concerning their knowledge; ver. 19, "he said unto them, What things?" thus making himself yet more a stranger. Observe, 1st. Jesus Christ made light of his own sufferings in comparison with the joy set before him, which was the recompence of it. Now he was entering upon his glory, see with what unconcernedness he looks back upon his sufferings. "What things?" He had reason to know what things, for to him they were bitter things, and heavy things; and yet he asks, "What things?" The sorrow was forgotten for joy that the Manchild of our salvation was born. He took pleasure in infirmities for our sakes, to teach us to do so for his sake. 2nd. Those whom Christ will teach he will first examine how far they have learned; they must tell him what things they know, and then he will tell them what was the meaning of these things, and lead them into the mystery of them.

4. They hereupon give him a particular account concerning Christ, and the present posture of his affairs. Observe the story they tell, ver. 19, &c.

1st. Here is a summary of Christ's life and character. The things they are full of are "concerning Jesus of Nazareth;" so he was commonly called, "who was a prophet," a teacher come from God; he preached a true and excellent doctrine, which had manifestly its rise from heaven, and its tendency towards heaven; he confirmed it by many glorious miracles, miracles of mercy, so that he was "mighty in deed and word before God and all the people," that is, he was both a mighty favourite of Heaven and a mighty blessing to this earth. He was, and appeared to be, greatly beloved of God, and much the darling of his people. He had great acceptance with God, and a great reputation in the country. Many are great before all the people, and are caressed by them, who are not so before God, as the scribes and Pharisees; but Christ was mighty both in his doctrine and in his doings, "before God and all the people." Those were strangers in Jerusalem that did not know this.

2nd. Here is a modest narrative of his sufferings and death, ver. 20. Though he was so dear both to God and man, yet "the chief priests and our rulers," in contempt of both, "delivered him" to the Roman power, "to be condemned to death, and they have crucified him." It is strange they did not aggravate the matter more, and lay more load upon those that had been guilty of crucifying Christ; but perhaps, because they spoke to one that was a stranger, they thought it prudent to avoid all reflections upon the chief priests and their rulers, how just soever.

3rd. Here is an intimation of their disappointment in him, as the reason of their sadness; "we trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel," ver. 21; we are of those who not only looked upon him to be a prophet, like Moses, but, like him, a redeemer too. He was depended upon, and great things expected from him, by them that looked for redemption, and in it for the consolation of Israel. Now if "hope deferred maketh the heart sick," hope disappointed, especially such a hope, kills the heart dead. But see how they made that the ground of their despair which, if they had understood it aright, was the surest ground of their hope, and that was the dying of the Lord Jesus; "we trusted," say they, "that it had been he that should have redeemed Israel." And is it not he that doth redeem Israel? Nay, is he not by his death paying the price of their redemption? was it not necessary, in order to his saving Israel from their sins, that he should suffer? So that now that most difficult part of his undertaking was got over, they had more reason than ever to trust that this is he that shall deliver Israel; yet now they are ready to give up the cause.

4th. Here is an account of their present amazement with reference to his resurrection. First, "This is the third day" since he was crucified and died, and that was the day when it was expected, if ever, that he should rise again, and rise in glory and outward pomp, and shew himself as publicly in honour as he had been shewn three days before in disgrace; but we see no sign of it. Nothing appears, as we expected, to the conviction and confusion of his prosecutors, and the consolation of his disciples; but all is silent. Secondly, They own that there was a report among them that he was risen, but they seem to speak of it very slightly, and as what they gave no credit at all to; ver. 22, 23, "certain women also of our company made us astonished," and that was all, "which were early at the sepulchre, and found the body gone;" and they said they had "seen a vision of angels, which said he was alive." But we are ready to think it was only their fancy, and no real thing, for angels would have been sent to the apostles, not to the women, and women are easily imposed upon. Thirdly, They acknowledge that some of the apostles had made a visit to the sepulchre, and found it empty; ver. 24, but "him they saw not," and therefore we have reason to fear that he is not risen; for if he were, surely he would have shewn himself to them. So that, upon the whole matter, we have no great reason to think that he is risen, and therefore have no expectations from him now. Our hopes were all nailed to his cross, and buried in his grave.

5th. Our Lord Jesus, though not known by face to them, makes himself known to them by his word.

First, He reproves them for their incogitancy, and the weakness of their faith in the Scriptures of the Old Testament; ver. 25, "O fools, and slow of heart to believe." When Christ forbade us to say to our brother, "Thou fool," it was intended to restrain us from giving unreasonable reproaches, not from giving just reproofs. Christ called them fools, not as it signifies wicked men, in which sense he forbade it us, but as it signifies weak men. He might call them fools, for he knows our foolishness, the foolishness that is bound in our hearts. They are fools that act against their own interest; so they did who would not admit the evidence given them that their Master was risen, but put away the comfort of it. That which is condemned in them as their foolishness is, 1st. Their slowness to believe. Believers are branded as fools by atheists, and infidels, and free-thinkers, and their most holy faith censured as a fond credulity; but Christ tells us that those are fools who are slow of heart to believe, and are kept from it by prejudices never impartially examined. 2nd. Their slowness to believe the writings of the prophets. He doth not so much blame them for their slowness to believe the testimony of the women and of the angels, but for that which was the cause thereof—their slowness to believe the prophets; for if they had given the prophets of the Old Testament their due weight and consideration, they would have been as sure of Christ's rising from the dead that morning, being the third day after his death, as they were of the rising of the sun; for the series and succession of events, as it is settled by prophecy, is no less certain and inviolable than as it is settled by providence; were we but more conversant with the Scripture, and the Divine counsels as far as they are made known in the Scripture, we should not be subject to such perplexities as we often entangle ourselves in.

Secondly, He shews them that the sufferings of Christ, which were such a stumblingblock to them, and made them unfit to believe his glory, were really the appointed way to his glory, and he could not go to it any other way; ver. 26, "Ought not Christ" (the Messiah) "to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?" was it not decreed, and was not that decree declared, that the promised Messiah must first suffer and then reign? that he must go by his cross to his crown? Had they never read the 53rd of Isaiah and the 9th of Daniel, where the prophets speak so very plainly of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow? 1 Pet. i. 11. The cross of Christ was it that they could not reconcile themselves to; now here he shews them two things, which take off the offence of the cross: 1st. That the Messiah ought to suffer these things; and therefore his sufferings were not only no objection against his being the Messiah, but really a proof of it,—as the afflictions of the saints are an evidence of their sonship,—and they were so far from ruining their expectations, that really they were the foundation of their hopes. He could not have been a Saviour if he had not been a sufferer. Christ's undertaking our salvation was voluntary, but having undertaken it, it was necessary he should suffer and die. 2nd. That when he had suffered these things, he should enter into his glory, which he did at his resurrection; that was his first step upwards. Observe, It is called his glory, because he was duly entitled to it, and it was the glory he had before the world was; he ought to enter into it, for in that, as well as in his sufferings, the Scripture must be fulfilled. He ought to suffer first, and then to enter into his glory; and thus the reproach of the cross is for ever rolled away; and we are directed to expect the crown of thorns, and then that of glory.

Thirdly, He expounded to them the Scriptures of the Old Testament which spake of the Messiah, and shewed them how they were fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth, and now can tell them more concerning him than they could before tell him; ver. 27, "beginning at Moses," the first inspired writer of the Old Testament, he went in order through "all the prophets," and "expounded to them the things concerning himself," shewing that the sufferings he had now gone through were so far from defeating the prophecies of the Scripture concerning him, that they were the accomplishment of them. He began at Moses, who recorded the first promise, in which it was plainly foretold that the Messiah should have his heel bruised, but that by it the serpent's head should be incurably broken. Note, 1st. There are things dispersed throughout all the Scriptures concerning Christ which it is of great advantage to have collected and put together. You cannot go far in any part of Scripture but you meet with something that has reference to Christ, some prophecy, some promise, some prayer, some type or other; for he is the true treasure hid in the field of the Old Testament. A golden thread of gospel grace runs through the whole web of the Old Testament; there is an eye of that white to be discerned in every place. 2nd. The things concerning Christ need to be expounded. The eunuch, though a scholar, would not pretend to understand them except some man should guide him, Acts viii. 31; for they were delivered darkly according to that dispensation; but now the veil is taken away, the New Testament expounds the Old. 3rd. Jesus Christ is himself the best expositor of Scripture, particularly the Scriptures concerning himself; and even after his resurrection it was in this way that he led people into the knowledge of the mystery concerning himself; not by advancing new notions independent upon the Scripture, but by shewing how the Scripture was fulfilled, and turning them over to the study of them. Even the Apocalypse itself is but a second part of the Old Testament prophecies, and has continually an eye to them. "If men believe not Moses and the prophets," they are incurable. 4th. In studying the Scriptures it is good to be methodical, and to take them in order; for the Old Testament light shone gradually to the perfect day; and it is good to observe how, at sundry times and in divers manners, (subsequent predictions improving and giving light to the preceding ones,) God spake to the fathers concerning his Son, by whom he has now spoken to us. Some begin their Bible at the wrong end, that study the Revelations first; but Christ has here taught us to begin at Moses. Thus far the conference between them.

Fourthly, Here is the discovery which Christ at length made of himself to them. One would have given a great deal for a copy of the sermon Christ preached to them by the way, of that exposition of the Bible he gave them, but it is not thought fit we should have it, we have the substance of it in other Scriptures; the disciples are so charmed with it, that they think they are come too soon to their journey's end; but so it is: "they drew nigh to the village whither they went," ver. 28, where, it should seem, they determined to take up for that night. And now,

1. They courted his stay with them. "He made as though he would have gone further." He did not say he would, but he seemed to them to be going further, and did not readily turn in to their friend's house, which it would not be decent for a stranger to do unless he were invited: he would have gone further if they had not courted his stay; so that here was nothing like dissimulation in the case. If a stranger be shy, every one knows the meaning of it; he will not thrust himself rudely upon your house or company; but if you make it appear that you are freely desirous of him for your guest or companion, he knows not but he may accept your invitation. And this was all that Christ did when "he made as though he would have gone further." Note, Those that would have Christ dwell with them must invite him, and be importunate with him. Though he is often found of those that seek him not, yet those only that seek can be sure to find; and if he seem to draw off from us, it is but to draw out our importunity; as here, "they constrained him;" both of them laid hold on him with a kind and friendly violence, saying, "Abide with us." Note, Those that have experienced the pleasure and profit of communion with Christ, cannot but covet more of his company, and beg of him, not only to walk with them all day, but to abide with them at night. When "the day is far spent," and "it is towards evening," we begin to think of retiring for our repose, and then it is proper to have our eye to Christ, and beg of him to "abide with us," to manifest himself to us, and to fill our minds with good thoughts of him, and good affections to him. Christ yielded to their importunity; "he went in to tarry with them." Thus ready is Christ to give farther instructions and comforts to those who improve what they have received. He has promised, that if any man open the door to bid him welcome, he will come in to him, Rev. iii. 10.

xxiv. 10. Although three names only are mentioned here, the reader must note that the evangelist refers to "other women." Matt. xxviii. 1 only names two women—two of the Maries. Mark xvi. 1 also names the two Maries, and adds Salome. John xx. 1 only mentions Mary Magdalene. Thus we find the names of four women, and an intimation that there were more. It is therefore mere idleness to say that the evangelists contradict each other in this matter. Each records some of the facts, and all the records agree.

xxiv. 13. This beautiful episode is peculiar to Luke, although the fact is referred to in Mark xvi. 12. The village of Emmaus was about sixty furlongs (between seven and eight miles) from Jerusalem, according to the ordinary reading. There is, however, another reading, which makes the distance a hundred and sixty furlongs, or over twenty miles from the city. The smaller number is most in accordance with internal probability, and by far the best supported by the evidence of MSS. and versions. The difference is important only as

2. He manifested himself to them, ver. 30, 31. We may suppose he continued his discourse with them, which he began upon the road; for thou must talk of the things of God "when thou sittest in the house, as well as when thou walkest by the way." While supper was a getting ready, which perhaps was soon done, the provision was so small and mean, it is likely he entertained them with such communication as was good and to the use of edifying; and so likewise as they sat at meat, his lips fed them. But still they little thought that it was Jesus himself that was all this while talking with them, till at length he was pleased to throw off his disguise, and then to withdraw.

1st. They began to suspect it was he, when, as they sat down to meat, he undertook the office of the master of the feast, which he performed so like himself, and like what he used to do among his disciples, that by it they discerned him; "he took bread, and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them." This he did with his usual air both of authority and affection, with the same gestures and mien, with the same expressions, perhaps, in craving a blessing, and in giving the bread to them. This was not a miraculous meal, like that of the five loaves, nor a sacramental meal, like that of the eucharist, but a common meal, yet Christ here did the same as he did in those, to teach us to keep up our communion with God through Christ in common providences, as well as in special ordinances, and to crave a blessing and give thanks at every meal, and to see our daily bread provided for us, and broken to us, by the hand of Jesus Christ, the Master, not only of the great family, but of all our families. Wherever we sit down to eat, let us set Christ at the upper end of the table, take our meat as blessed to us by him, and eat and drink to his glory, and receive contentedly and thankfully what he is pleased to carve out to us, be the fare never so coarse and mean; we may well receive it cheerfully, if we can by faith see it coming to us from Christ's hand, and with his blessing.

2nd. Presently "their eyes were opened," and then they saw who it was, and knew him well enough; whatever it was which had hitherto concealed him from them, it was now taken out of the way; the mists were scattered, the veil taken off, and then they made no question but it was their Master. He might, for wise and holy ends, put on the shape of another, but no other could put on his, and therefore it must be he. See how Christ, by his Spirit and grace, makes himself known to the souls of his people. First. He opens the Scriptures to them, for they are they which testify of him, to those who search them, and search for him in them. Secondly. He meets them at his table in the ordinance of the Lord's supper, and commonly there makes farther discoveries of himself to them; is "known to them in the breaking of bread;" but, Thirdly. The work is completed by the opening of the eyes of their mind, and causing the scales to fall off from them, as from Paul's in his conversion. If he that gives the revelation do not give the understanding, we are in the dark still.

3rd. He immediately disappeared; "he vanished out of their sight:" ἀφαντος ἐγένετο.—he withdrew himself from them; slipped away of a sudden, and went out of sight: or, he became not visible by them; was made inconspicuous from them. It should seem that though Christ's body, after his resurrection, was the very same body in which he suffered and died, as appeared by the marks in it, yet it was so far changed as to become either visible or not visible, as he thought fit to make it, which was a step towards its being made a glorious body. As soon as he had given his disciples one glimpse of him, he was gone presently. Such short and transient views have we of Christ in this world, we see him, but in a little while lose the sight of him again; when we come to heaven, the vision of him will have no interruptions.

Fifthly. Here is the reflection which these disciples made upon this conference, and the report they made of it to their brethren at Jerusalem.

1. The reflection they each of them made upon the influence which Christ's discourse had upon them; ver. 32, "they said one to another, Did not our hearts burn within us?" I am sure mine did, saith one; and so did mine, saith the other; I never was so affected with any discourse in all my life. Thus do they not so much compare notes as compare hearts, in review of the sermon Christ had preached to them. They found the preaching powerful, even when they knew not the preacher; it made things very plain and clear to them; and, which was more, brought a Divine heat, with a Divine light, into their souls, such as put their hearts into a glow, and kindled a holy fire of pious and devout affections in them. Now this they take notice of for the confirming of their belief, that it was indeed, as at last they saw, Jesus himself that had been talking with them all along: What fools were we that we were not sooner aware who it was! for none but he, no word but his, could make our hearts burn within us as they did; it must be he that has the key of the heart, it could be no other. See here,

1st. What preaching is likely to do good, such as Christ's was; plain preaching, and that which is familiar and level to our capacity; "he talked with us by the way;" and scriptural preaching; he "opened to us the Scriptures," the Scriptures relating to himself. Ministers should shew people their religion in their Bibles, and that they preach no other doctrine to them but what is there; must shew that they make that the fountain of their knowledge, and the foundation of their faith. Note, The expounding of those Scriptures which speak of Christ has a direct tendency to warm the hearts of his disciples, both to quicken them and to comfort them.

2nd. What hearing is likely to do good; that which makes the heart burn; when we are much affected with the things of God, especially with the love of Christ in dying for us, and have our hearts thereby drawn out in love to him, and drawn up in holy desires and devotions, then "our hearts burn within us," when our hearts are raised and elevated, and are as the sparks which fly upward towards God; and when they are kindled and carried out with a holy zeal and indignation against sin, both in others and in ourselves, and we are in some measure refined and purified from it by the spirit of judgment, and the spirit of burning, then we may say, through grace our hearts are thus inflamed.

3. The report they brought of this to their brethren at Jerusalem: ver. 33, "they rose up the same hour;" so transported with joy at this discovery Christ had made of himself to them, that they could not stay to make an end of their supper, but returned with all speed to Jerusalem, though it was towards evening. If they had had any thoughts of quitting their relation to Christ, this soon banished all such thoughts out of their mind, and there needed no more to send them back to his flock. However, it should seem they intended at least to take up their quarters to-night at Emmaus, but now they had seen Christ, they could not rest till they had brought the good news to the disciples, both for the confirmation of their trembling faith, and for the comfort of their sorrowful spirits, with the same comforts wherewith they were comforted of God. Note, It is the duty of those to whom Christ hath manifested himself to let others know what he has done for their souls. When thou art converted, instructed, comforted, strengthen thy brethren. These disciples were full of this matter themselves, and must go to their brethren to give vent to their joys, as well as to give them satisfaction that their Master was risen. Observe,

1st. How they found them, just when they came in among them, discoursing on the same subject, and relating another proof of the resurrection of Christ. They found the eleven, and those that were their usual companions gathered together late in the night, to pray together, it may be, and to consider what was to be done in this juncture; and they found them saying among themselves, (λέγοντες, it is the saying of the eleven, not of the two, as is plain by the original,) and when these two came in, they repeated to them, with joy and triumph, "The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon," ver. 34. That Peter had a sight of him before the rest of the disciples had, appears, 1 Cor. xv. 5, where it is said, "he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve." The angel having ordered the women to tell Peter of it particularly, Mar. xvi. 7, for his comfort, it is highly probable that our Lord Jesus did himself presently the same day appear to Peter, though we have no particular narrative of it, to confirm the word of his messengers. This he had related to his brethren; but observe, Peter doth not here proclaim it, and boast of it himself; he thought that did not become a penitent; but the other disciples speak of it with exultation, "The Lord is risen indeed;" ὁ ὢντος, 'really,' it is now past dispute; no room is left to doubt it, for he has appeared not only to the women, but to Simon.

2nd. How they seconded their evidence with an account of what they had seen: ver. 35, "they told what things were done in the way." The words that were spoken by Christ to them in the way having a wonderful effect and influence upon them, are here called the things that were done in the way; for the words that Christ speaks are not an empty sound, but "they are spirit, and they are life," and wondrous things are done by them; done by the way, by the by, as it were, where it is not expected. They told also how he was at length "known to them in the breaking of bread;" then, when he was carrying out blessings to them, God opened their eyes to discern who it was. Note, It would be of great use for the discovery and confirmation of truth, if the disciples of Christ would compare their observations and experiences, and communicate to each other what they know and have felt in themselves.

36 And as they thus spake, Jesus himself stood in the midst of them, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. 37 But they were terrified and affrighted, and supposed that they had seen a spirit. 38 And he said unto them, Why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? 39 Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have. 40 And when he had thus spoken, he shewed them his hands and his feet. 41 And while they yet believed not for joy, and wondered, he said unto them, Have ye here any meat? 42 And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honeycomb. 43 And he took it, and did eat before them. 44 And he said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me. 45 Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures, 46 And said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day: 47 And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. 48 And ye are witnesses of these things. 49 And, behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you: but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high.

Five times Christ was seen the same day that he rose: by Mary Magdalene alone in the garden, Jno. xx. 14; by the women, as they were going to tell the disciples, Mat. xxviii. 9; by Peter alone; by the two disciples going to Emmaus, and now, at night, by the eleven, which we have an account of in these verses, as also, Jno. xx. 19. Observe,

1. The great surprise which his appearing gave them. He came in among them very reasonably, as they were comparing notes concerning the proofs of his resurrection: "as they thus spake," and were ready perhaps to put it to the question, whether the proofs produced amounted to evidence sufficient of their Master's resurrection, or no, and how they should proceed, "Jesus himself stood in the midst of them," and put it out of question. Note, Those who make the best use they can of their evidences for their comfort, may expect farther assurances, and that the Spirit of Christ will witness with their spirits (as Christ here witnessed with the disciples, and confirmed their testimony,) that they are the children of God, and risen with Christ. Observe,

1. The comfort Christ spoke to them: "Peace be unto you." This intimates in general, that it was a kind visit which Christ now made them, a visit of love and friendship. Though they had very unkindly deserted him in his sufferings, yet he takes the first opportunity of seeing them together; for he deals not with us as we deserve. They did not credit those who had seen him, therefore he comes himself, that they might not continue in their disconsolate incredulity. He had promised that after his resurrection he would see them in Galilee; but so desirous was he to see them, and satisfy them, that he anticipated the appointment, and sees them at Jerusalem. Note, Christ is often better than his word, but never worse. Now his first word to them was, connected with the site of Emmaus. One Emmaus is represented by Amwas, the Greek Nicopolis, twenty-two Roman miles from Jerusalem, and this has been regarded as the place intended by Luke, from the time of Eusebius at least. Dr. Robinson says this view prevailed for thirteen centuries, and was not questioned till modern times. The writer mentioned gives the arguments on both sides, and concludes in favour of Nicopolis ("Biblical Researches," vol. iii. 146, &c.). Another claimant to the honour is a place now called El-Kubeibeh, which is about nine miles from Jerusalem. In favour of the more distant locality we now have the authority of the Sinaitic MS., which herein differs from the Vatican MS., the Peshito-Syriac, and the weight of documentary evidence.

xiv. 18. We learn from this that one of the two disciples was named Cleopas, but who the other was is unknown. Origen thought it was Simon; Epiphanius calls him Nathanael; Theophylact believed it was Luke himself, and so Lange thinks.

"Peace be to you," not in a way of compliment, but of consolation. This was a common form of salutation among the Jews, and Christ would thus express his usual familiarity with them, though he was now entered into his state of exaltation. Many, when they are advanced, forget their old friends, and take state upon them, but we see Christ as free with them as ever. Thus Christ would at the first word intimate to them that he did not come to quarrel with Peter for denying him, and the rest for outrunning him; no, he came peaceably, to signify to them that he had forgiven them, and was reconciled to them.

2. The fright which they put themselves into upon it; ver. 37, "they were terrified, supposing that they had seen a spirit," because he came in among them without any noise, and was in the midst of them ere they were aware. The word used, Mat. xiv. 26, when they said, "It is a spirit," is φάντασμα. It is a spectre, an apparition; but the word here used is πνεῦμα, the word that properly signifies a spirit; they supposed it to be a spirit not clothed with a real body. Though we have an alliance and correspondence with the world of spirits, and are hastening to it, yet while we are here in this world of sense and matter, it is a terror to us to have a spirit so far change its own nature as to become visible to us, and conversable with us, for it is something and bodes something very extraordinary.

11. The great satisfaction which his discourse gave them, wherein we have,

First. The reproof he gave them for their causeless fears; ver. 38, "Why are ye troubled, and why do frightful thoughts arise in your hearts?" Observe here, 1. That when at any time we are troubled, thoughts are apt to rise in our hearts that do us hurt. Sometimes the trouble is the effect of the thoughts that arise in our hearts; our griefs and fears take rise from those things that are the creatures of our own fancy. Sometimes the thoughts arising in the heart are the effect of the trouble; without are fightings, and then within are fears. Those that are melancholy and troubled in mind, have thoughts arising in their hearts which reflect dishonour upon God, and create disquiet to themselves: "I am cut off from thy sight." "The Lord has forsaken and forgotten me."

2. That many of the troublesome thoughts with which our minds are disquieted arise from our mistakes concerning Christ. They here thought they had seen a spirit when they saw Christ, and that put them into this fright. We forget that Christ is our elder brother, and look upon him to be at as great a distance from us as the world of spirits is from this world, and therewith terrify ourselves. When Christ is by his Spirit convincing and humbling us, when he is by his providence trying and converting us, we mistake him, as if he designed our hurt, and that troubles us.

3. That all the troublesome thoughts which rise in our hearts at any time are known to the Lord Jesus, even at the first rise of them, and they are displeasing to him. He chid his disciples for such thoughts, to teach us to chide ourselves for them. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? why art thou troubled? why do thoughts arise that are neither true nor good, that have neither foundation nor fruit, but hinder our joy in God, disfit us for our duty, give advantage to Satan, and deprive us of the comforts laid up for us.

Secondly. The proof he gave them of his resurrection, both for the silencing of their fears, by convincing them that he was not a spirit, and for the strengthening of their faith in that doctrine which they were to preach to the world, by giving them a full satisfaction concerning his resurrection, which, if not true, their faith and preaching was all vain. Two proofs he gives them:

1. He shews them his body, particularly "his hands and his feet." They saw that he had the shape and features and exact resemblance of their Master; but is it not his ghost? No, saith Christ, "Behold my hands and feet; you see I have hands and feet, and therefore have a true body; you see I can move these hands and feet, and therefore have a living body; and you see the marks of the nails in my hands and feet, and therefore it is my own body, the same that you saw crucified, and not a borrowed one. He lays down this principle, that "a spirit has not flesh and bones;" it is not compounded of gross matter, shaped into various members, and consisting of divers heterogeneous parts, as our bodies are. He doth not tell us what a spirit is,—it is time enough to know that when we go to the world of spirits,—but what it is not, it "has not flesh and bones." Now hence he infers, it is I myself, whom you have been so intimately acquainted with, and have had such familiar conversation with; it is I myself, whom you have reason to rejoice in, and not to be afraid of. Those who know Christ aright, and know him as theirs, will have no reason to be terrified at his appearances, at his approaches.

He appeals to their sight, shews them his hands and his feet, which were pierced with the nails. Christ retained the marks of them in his glorified body, that they might be proofs that it was he himself, and he was willing they should be seen. He afterwards shewed them to Thomas, for he is not ashamed of his sufferings for us; little reason then have we to be ashamed of them, or of ours for him. As he shewed his wounds here to his disciples for the enforcing of his instructions to them, so he shewed them to his Father for the enforcing of his intercessions with him. He appears in heaven "as a Lamb that had been slain," Rev. v. 6; his blood speaks, Heb. xii. 24. He makes intercession in the virtue of his satisfaction; he saith to the Father, as here to the disciples, "Behold my hands and my feet," 2 Cor. xiii. 6, 7.

He appeals to their touch; "handle me, and see." He would not let Mary Magdalene touch him at that time, Jno. xx. 17; but the disciples here are intrusted to do it, that they who were to preach his resurrection, and to suffer for doing so, might be themselves abundantly satisfied concerning it. He bade them handle him, that they might be convinced that he was not a spirit. If there were really no spirits, or apparitions of spirits, as by this and other instances it is plain the disciples did believe there were, now had been a proper time for Christ to have undeceived them, by telling them there were no such things; but he seems to take it for granted that there have been, and may be, apparitions of spirits, else what need so much pains to prove that he was not one? There were many heretics in the primitive times,—atheists, I rather think they were, who said that Christ had never any substantial body, but that it was a mere phantasm, which was neither really born, nor truly suffered. Such wild notions as these, we are told, the Valentians and Manichees had, and the followers of Simon Magus; they were called δοκίμας and φαντασμάτις. Blessed be God, these heresies are long since buried; and we know, and are sure, that Jesus Christ was no spirit or apparition, but had a true and real body, even after his resurrection.

2. He eats with them, to shew that he had a real and true body; and that he was willing to converse freely and familiarly with his disciples, as one friend with another. St. Peter lays a great stress upon this, Acts x. 41, "We did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead."

1st. When they saw his hands and his feet, yet they knew not what to say; "they believed not for joy, and wondered," ver. 14. It was their infirmity that they believed not, that yet they believed not, ἐν τῇ ἀπιστοῦντων αὐτῶν, "they as yet being unbelievers." This very much corroborates the truth of Christ's resurrection, that the disciples were so slow to believe it. Instead of stealing away his body, and saying he is risen when he is not, as the chief priests suggested they would do, they are ready to say again and again, he is not risen when he is. Their being incredulous of it at first, and insinuating upon the utmost proofs of it, shews, that when afterwards they did believe it, and ventured their all upon it, it was not but upon the fullest demonstration of the thing that could be. But though it was their infirmity, yet it was an excusable one; for it was not from any contempt of the evidence offered them that they believed not; but, First, "They believed not for joy;" as Jacob, when he was told that Joseph was alive; they thought it too good news to be true. When the faith and hope are therefore weak, because the love and desires are strong, that weak faith shall be helped, and not rejected. Secondly, They wondered; they thought it not only too good but too great to be true, forgetting both the Scriptures and the power of God.

2nd. For their farther conviction and encouragement he called for some meat. He sat down to meat with the two disciples at Emmaus, but it is not said that he did eat with them; now lest that should be made an objection, he here did actually eat with them and the rest, to shew that his body was really and truly returned to life; though he did not eat and drink, and converse constantly with them as he had done, (and as Lazarus did after his resurrection, who not only returned to life, but to his former state of life, and to die again,) because it was not agreeable to the economy of that state he was risen to. "They gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honeycomb," ver. 42. The honeycomb perhaps was used as sauce to the broiled fish, for Canaan was a land flowing with honey. This was mean fare; yet if it be the fare of the disciples, their Master will fare as they do, because in the kingdom of our Father they shall fare as he does, shall eat and drink with him in his kingdom.

Thirdly. The insight he gave them into the word of God, which they had heard and read, by which faith in the resurrection of Christ is wrought in them, and all the difficulties cleared.

1. He refers them to the word which they had heard from him, when he was with them, and puts them in mind of that, as the angel had done, ver. 44: "These are the words which I said unto you," in private, many a time, "while I was yet with you." We should better understand what Christ doth, if we did but remember what he hath said, and had but the art of comparing them together.

2. He refers them to the word they had read in the Old Testament, which the word they had heard from him directed them to; "all things must be fulfilled which were written." Christ had given them this general hint, for the regulating of their expectations, that whatever they found written concerning the Messiah in the Old Testament must be fulfilled in him, what was written concerning his sufferings, as well as what was written concerning his kingdom, those God had joined together in the prediction, and it could not be thought they should be put asunder in the event. All things must be fulfilled, even the hardest, even the heaviest, even the vinegar; he could not die till he had that, because he could not till then say, "It is finished." The several parts of the Old Testament are here mentioned, as containing each of them things concerning Christ: "the law of Moses," that is, the Pentateuch, or the five books written by Moses; "the prophets," containing not only the books that are purely prophetic, but those historical books that were written by prophetic men. "The Psalms" contain also the other writings, which they called the Hagiographa. See in what various ways of writing God did of old reveal his will; but all proceeded from one and the selfsame Spirit, who by them gave notice of the coming and kingdom of the Messiah; for "to him bare all the prophets witness."

3. By an immediate present work upon their minds, which they themselves could not but be sensible of; he gave them to apprehend the true intent and meaning of the Old Testament prophecies of Christ, and to see them all fulfilled in him, ver. 45: "Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures." In his discourse with the two disciples, he took the veil from off the text by opening the Scriptures; here he took the veil from off the heart by opening the mind. Observe here, 1st. That Jesus Christ by his Spirit operates on the minds of men, on the minds of all that are his. He has access to our spirits, and can immediately influence them. It is observable how he did now, after his resurrection, give a specimen of those two great operations of his Spirit upon the spirits of men: his enlightening the intellectual faculties with a Divine light, when he opened the understandings of his disciples, and his invigorating of the active powers with a Divine heat, when he made their hearts burn within them. 2nd. Even good men need to have their understandings opened; for though they are not darkness, as they were by nature, yet in many things they are in the dark. David prays, "Open mine eyes; give me an understanding;" and St. Paul, that knows so much of Christ, sees his need to learn more. 3rd. Christ's ways of working faith in the soul, and gaining the throne there, is by opening the understanding to discern the evidence of those things that are to be believed. Thus he comes into the soul by the door, while Satan, as a thief and a robber, climbs up some other way. 4th. The design of opening the understanding is that we may understand the Scriptures; not that we may be wise above what is written, but that we may be wiser in what is written, and may be made wise to salvation by it. The Spirit in the Word, and the Spirit in the heart, say the same thing. Christ's scholars never learn above their Bibles in this world; but they need to be learning still more and more out of their Bibles, and to grow more ready and mighty in the Scriptures. That we may have right thoughts of Christ, and our mistakes concerning him rectified, there needs no more but to be made to understand the Scriptures.

Fourthly. The instructions he gave them as apostles, who were to be employed in setting up his kingdom in the world. They expected, while their Master was with them, that they should be preferred to posts of honour, which they thought themselves quite disappointed of when he was dead. "No," saith he, "you are now to enter upon them;" "ye are to be witnesses of these things," ver. 48; to carry the notice of them to all the world; not only to report them as matter of news, but to assert them as evidence given upon the trial of the great cause that has been so long depending between God and Satan, the issue of which must be the casting down and casting out of the prince of this world. You are fully assured of these things yourselves, you are eye and ear witnesses of them, go and assure the world of them; and the same Spirit that has enlightened you shall go along with you for the enlightening of others. Now here they are told,

1. What they must preach. They must preach the Gospel, must preach the New Testament, as the full accomplishment of the Old, as the continuation and conclusion of Divine revelation. They must take their Bibles along with them, (especially when they preached to the Jews; nay, and Peter in his first sermon to the Gentiles, directed them to consult the prophets, Acts x. 43;) and must shew people how it was written of old concerning the Messiah, and the glories and graces of his kingdom, and then must tell them how upon their certain knowledge all this was fulfilled in the Lord Jesus.

2. The great gospel truth concerning the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ must be published to the children of men, ver. 46: "Thus it was written," in the sealed book of the Divine counsels from eternity, the volume of that book of the covenant of redemption, and thus it was written in the open book of the Old Testament, among the things revealed, and therefore "thus it behoved Christ to suffer," for the Divine counsels must be performed, and care taken that no word of God fall to the ground. Go and tell the world, First, That Christ suffered, as it was written of him. Go preach Christ crucified; be not ashamed of his cross, not ashamed of a suffering Jesus. Tell them xxiv. 22. It is generally and with reason believed that the speakers were not of the apostolic number; verse 33 must be regarded as conclusive on that point. But it is evident that they were among the devoted and faithful adherents to Christ.

xxiv. 23. Here, what are spoken of, as "two men" in ver. 4, are expressly called angels, though without specifying the number.

xxiv. 27. De Wetts remarks, "It were much to be wished that we knew what prophecies of the death and triumph of Christ are here meant; there are but few that point to the subject." Upon which Dean Alford well says, "I take the things concerning him to mean something very different from mere prophetic passages. The whole Scriptures are a testimony to him; the whole history of the chosen people, with its types, and its law, and its prophecies, is a showing forth of him; and it was here the whole—all the Scriptures—that he laid out before them." The Hebrew canon was the same as our own for the Old Testament, to the exclusion of books called apocryphal.

what he suffered, and why he suffered, and how all the Scriptures of the Old Testament were fulfilled in his sufferings. Tell them that it behoved him to suffer, that it was necessary to the taking away of the sin of the world, and the deliverance of mankind from death and ruin; nay, it became him to be perfected through sufferings, Heb. ii. 10. Secondly, That he rose from the dead on the third day, by which not only all the offence of the cross was rolled away, but he was declared to be the Son of God with power; and in this also the Scriptures were fulfilled: see 1 Cor. xv. 3, 4. Go tell the world how often you saw him after he rose from the dead, and how intimately you conversed with him. "Your eyes see," (as Joseph said to his brethren, when his discovering of himself to them was as life from the dead,) "that it is my mouth that speaketh unto you," Gen. xlv. 12. Go and tell them, then, that he that was dead is alive, and lives for evermore, and has the keys of death and the grave.

2nd. The great gospel duty of repentance must be pressed upon the children of men. Repentance for sin must be preached in Christ's name, and by his authority, ver. 47; all men, everywhere must be called and commanded to repent, Acts xvii. 30. Go and tell people that the God that made them, and the Lord that bought them, expect and require that, immediately upon this notice given, they turn from the worship of the gods they have made, to the worship of the God that made them; and not only so, but from serving the interests of the world and the flesh, they must turn to the service of God in Christ—must mortify all sinful habits, and forsake all sinful practices; their hearts and lives must be changed, and they must be universally renewed and reformed.

3rd. The great Gospel privilege of the remission of sins must be proposed to all, and assured to all that repent and believe the Gospel. Go tell a guilty world, that stands convicted and condemned at God's bar, that there is an act of indemnity passed the royal assent, which all that repent and believe shall have the benefit of, and not only be pardoned, but preferred by. Tell them there is hope concerning them.

2. To whom they must preach. Whither must they carry these proposals, and how far doth their commission extend? They are here told,

1st. That they must preach this among all nations; they must disperse themselves, like the sons of Noah after the flood, some one way and some another, and carry this light along with them, wherever they went. The prophets had preached repentance and remission to the Jews, but the apostles must preach them to all the world. None are exempted from the obligations the Gospel lays upon men to repent; nor are any excluded from those inestimable benefits which are included in the remission of sins, but those that by their unbelief and impenitency put a bar in their own door.

2nd. That they must begin at Jerusalem: there they must preach their first Gospel sermon; there the Gospel church must be first formed; there the Gospel day must dawn, and thence that light shall go forth which must take hold on the ends of the earth. And why must they begin there? First. Because thus it was written, and therefore it behoved them to take this method. The word of the Lord must go forth from Jerusalem, Isa. ii. 3. And see Joel ii. 32; iii. 16; Obad. 21; Zec. xiv. 8. Secondly. Because there the matters of fact on which the Gospel was founded were transacted; and therefore there they were first attested, where, if there had been any just cause for it, they might be best contested and disproved. So strong, so bright, is the first shining forth of the glory of the risen Redeemer, that it dares face those daring enemies of his that had put him to an ignominious death, and sets them at defiance. Begin at Jerusalem, that the chief priests may try their strength to crush the Gospel, and may rage to see themselves disappointed. Thirdly. Because he would give us a farther example of forgiving enemies. Jerusalem had put the greatest affronts imaginable upon him, both the rulers and the multitude, for which that city might justly have been excepted by name out of the act of indemnity. No, so far from that, the first offer of gospel grace is made to Jerusalem; and thousands there are in a little time brought to partake of that grace.

3. What assistance they should have in preaching. It is a vast undertaking they are here called to, a very large and difficult province, especially considering the opposition this service would meet with, and the sufferings it would be attended with. If therefore they ask, "Who is sufficient for these things?" here is an answer ready, ver. 49. "Behold I send the promise of my Father upon you, and ye shall be endued with power from on high." He here assures them that in a little time the Spirit should be poured out upon them in greater measures than ever, and they should thereby be furnished with all those gifts and graces which were necessary to their discharge of this great trust; and therefore they must tarry at Jerusalem, and not enter upon it till this be done. Note, 1st. Those who receive the Holy Ghost are thereby endued with a power from on high, a supernatural power—a power above any of their own. It is from on high, and therefore draws the soul upward, and makes it to aim high. 2nd. Christ's apostles could never have planted his Gospel, and set up his kingdom in the world, as they did, if they had not been endued with such a power; and their admirable achievements prove that there was an excellency of power going along with them. 3rd. This power from on high was the promise of the Father, the great promise of the New Testament, as the promise of the coming of Christ was of the Old Testament; and if it be the promise of the Father, we may be sure that the promise is inviolable, and the thing promised invaluable. 4th. Christ would not leave his disciples till the time was just at hand for the performing of this promise. It was but ten days after the ascension of Christ that there came the descent of the Spirit. 5th. Christ's ambassadors must stay till they have their powers, and not venture upon their embassy till they have received full instructions and credentials; though one would think never was such haste as now for the preaching of the Gospel, yet the preachers must tarry till they be endued with power from on high; and tarry at Jerusalem, though a place of danger, because there this promise of the Father was to find them, Joel ii. 28.

50 And he led them out as far as to Bethany, and he lifted up his hands, and blessed them. 51 And it came to pass, while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven. 52 And they worshipped him, and returned to Jerusalem with great joy: 53 And were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God. Amen.

xxiv. 31. The sudden disappearance of our Lord must imply his bodily removal, and not merely that he became invisible. We agree with Hammond that in what manner or by what means he disappeared is unknown; the words do not necessarily imply a miracle.

xxiv. 33. This shows that the two were not of the number of apostles, and favours the opinion that Emmaus was not over twenty miles from Jerusalem, but a moderate walking distance. The apostles and their friends were talking of the strange events of the past day.

xxiv. 36. The Saviour had followed the two disciples back to Jerusalem, and unexpectedly appeared in the company.

xxiv. 37—39. They supposed they saw a ghost or spectre. In their actual state of mind, they could not realise the bodily presence

This evangelist omits the solemn meeting between Christ and his disciples in Galilee; but what he said to them there, and at other interviews, he tacks to what he said to them at the first visit he made them, on the evening of the day he rose; and has now nothing more to account for but his ascension into heaven, which we have a very brief narrative of in these verses; in which we are told.

First. How solemnly Christ took leave of his disciples. Christ's design being to reconcile heaven and earth, and continue a days-man between them, it was necessary he should lay his hands on them both, and in order thereunto that he should pass and repass. He had business to do in both worlds, and accordingly came from heaven to earth in his incarnation, to despatch his business here, which, when he had finished, he returned to heaven to reside there, and negotiate our affairs with the Father. Observe,

1. From whence he ascended; from Bethany, near Jerusalem, adjoining to the mount of Olives. There he had done eminent services for his Father's glory, and there he entered upon his glory. There was the garden in which his sufferings began; there he was in his agony; and Bethany signifies 'the house of sorrow.' Those that would go to heaven must ascend thither from the house of sufferings and sorrows,—must go by agonies to their joys. The mount of Olives was pitched upon long since to be the place of Christ's ascension, Zec. xiv. 4; "his feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives." And here it was that a while ago he began his triumphant entry into Jerusalem, ch. xix. 29.

2. Who were the witnesses of his ascension. He "led out his disciples" to see him. Probably it was very early in the morning that he ascended, before people were stirring, for he never shewed himself openly to all the people after his resurrection, but only to chosen witnesses. The disciples did not see him rise out of the grave, because his resurrection was capable of being proved by their seeing him alive afterwards; but they saw him ascend into heaven, because they could not otherwise have an ocular demonstration of his ascension; they were led out on purpose to see him ascend, had their eye upon him when he ascended, and were not looking another way.

3. What was the farewell he gave them. "He lifted up his hands and blessed them." He did not go away in displeasure, but in love; he left a blessing behind him; "he lifted up his hands," as the high priest did when he blessed the people; see Lev. ix. 22. He blessed as one having authority, commanded the blessing, which he had purchased; he blessed them as Jacob blessed his sons. The apostles were now as the representatives of the twelve tribes, so that in blessing them he blessed all his spiritual Israel, and put his Father's name upon them. He blessed them as Jacob blessed his sons, and Moses the tribes at parting, to shew that having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end.

4. How he left them; while "he was blessing them he was parted from them," not as if he were taken away before he had said all he had to say, but to intimate that his being parted from them did not put an end to his blessing of them; for the intercession which he went to heaven to make for all his is a continuation of that blessing; he began to bless them on earth, but he went to heaven to go on with it. Christ was now sending his apostles to preach his Gospel to the world, and he gives them his blessing, not for themselves only, but to be conferred in his name upon all that should believe on him through their word, for in him "all the families of the earth were to be blessed."

5. How his ascension is described. 1st. "He was parted from them," was taken from their head, as Elijah from Elisha's. Note, The dearest friends must part; those that love us, and pray for us, and instruct us, must be parted from us. The bodily presence of Christ himself was not to be expected always in this world; those that knew him after the flesh must now henceforth know him so no more. 2nd. He was "carried up into heaven," not by force, but by his own act and deed. As he rose, so he ascended by his own power, yet attended by angels. There needed no chariot of fire, or horses of fire; he knew the way, and being the Lord from heaven, could go back himself. He ascended in a cloud, as the angel in the smoke of Manoa's sacrifice, Jud. xiii. 20.

Secondly. How cheerfully his disciples continued their attendance on him, and on God through him, even now he was parted from them.

1. They paid their homage to him at his going away, to signify, that though he was going into a far country, yet they would continue his loyal subjects, that were willing to have him reign over them; "they worshipped him," ver. 52. Note, Those that receive blessings from Christ he expects adorations from. He blessed them, in token of gratitude for which they worshipped him. This fresh display of Christ's glory drew from them fresh acknowledgment and adorations of it. They knew, that though he was parted from them, yet he could and did take notice of their adorations of him; the cloud that received him out of their sight did not put them or their services out of his sight.

2. They "returned to Jerusalem with great joy." There they were ordered to continue till the Spirit should be poured out upon them; and thither they went accordingly, though it was into the mouth of danger. Thither they went, and there they stayed with great joy. This was a wonderful change, and an effect of the opening of their understandings. When Christ told them he must leave them, sorrow filled their hearts; yet now they see him go, they are filled with joy, being convinced at length that it was expedient for them and for the church that he should go away to send the Comforter. Note, The glory of Christ is the joy, the exceeding joy, of all true believers, even while they are here in this world; much more will it be so when they go to the new Jerusalem, and find him there in his glory.

3. They abounded in acts of devotion, while they were in expectation of the promise of the Father, ver. 53. 1st. They attended the temple service at the hours of prayer; God had not as yet quite forsaken it, and therefore they did not: they "were continually in the temple," as their Master was, when he was at Jerusalem. "The Lord loves the gates of Zion," and so should we. Some think they had their place of meeting, as disciples, in some of the chambers of the temple, which belonged to some Levite that was well affected to them; but others think it is not likely that that either could be concealed from, or would be connived at, by the chief priests and rulers of the temple. 2nd. Temple sacrifices they knew were superseded by Christ's sacrifice, but the temple songs they joined in. Note, While we are waiting for God's promises, we must go forth to meet them with our praises; praising and blessing God is work that is never out of season; and nothing doth better prepare the mind for the receiving of the Holy Ghost than holy joy and praise. Fears are silenced, sorrows sweetened and allayed, and hopes kept up.

The amen that concludes seems to be added by the church and every believer to the reading of the Gospel; signifying an assent to the truths of the Gospel, and a hearty concurrence with all the disciples of Christ in praising and blessing God. "Amen." Let him be continually praised and blessed.

of their risen Lord. Without refuting the once popular notion about ghosts, he proved that it was himself in his own proper person. We learn from John xx. 19, that the doors were closed when Jesus entered, but whether they were locked, as some think, is an open question. If he entered through the doors while locked, the appearance was miraculous, but in any case the occurrence was startling and unlooked-for.

xxiv. 41, 42. The request for food and the partaking of it was a conclusive evidence that Jesus had risen bodily from the dead. The words "and of an honeycomb" are omitted by several ancient authorities, as the Sinaitic, Vatican, Cambridge, and Alexandrian MSS.; but they are in various other uncial MSS., and in the Peshito and Vulgate versions, and were known to Justin Martyr.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE GOSPEL OF ST. LUKE.

CHAP. I.—3. Having had perfect understanding. The literal translation of the original would be, 'having exactly traced every thing from the first;' or, 'having, by diligent and careful investigation, followed up every thing to the source, to obtain an accurate account of the matter.' This much better expresses the idea. 33. Over the house of Jacob. The house of Jacob means the same thing as the family of Jacob, or the descendants of Jacob, that is, the children of Israel. This was the name by which the ancient people of God were known, and it is the same as saying that he shall reign over his own church and people for ever. This he does by giving them laws, by defending them, and by guiding them; and this he will do for ever in the kingdom of his glory. Of his kingdom there shall be no end. He shall reign among his people on earth until the end of time, and still be their King in heaven. His is the only kingdom that shall never have an end. He is the only King that shall never lay aside his diadem and robes, and that shall never die. He is the only King that can defend us from all our enemies, sustain us in death, and reward us in eternity. Oh, how important, then, to have an interest in his kingdom; and how unimportant, compared with his favour, is the favour of all earthly monarchs! 35. The power of the Highest. This evidently means that the body of Jesus should be created by the direct power of God. It was not by ordinary generation; but, as the Messiah came to redeem sinners—to make atonement for others, and not for himself—it was necessary that his human nature should be pure, and freed from the corruption of the fall. God therefore prepared him a body by direct creation, that should be pure and holy: see Heb. x. 5. 45. Blessed is she that believed. That is, Mary, who believed what the angel spoke to her. She was blessed, not only in the act of believing, but because the thing promised would certainly be fulfilled. From these expressions of Elizabeth we may learn: 1st. That the spirit of prophecy had not entirely ceased among the Jews. 2nd. That the Holy Ghost is the source of light, comfort, and joy. 3rd. That every thing about the birth of Jesus is remarkable, and that he must have been more than a mere man. 4th. That the prospect of the coming of the Messiah was one of great joy and rejoicing to ancient saints; and, 5th. That it was a high honour to be the mother of him that should redeem mankind. It is from that honour that the Roman Catholics have determined that it is right to worship the Virgin Mary, and to offer prayers to her: an act of worship as idolatrous as any that could be offered to a creature. For, 1st. It is not any where commanded in the Bible. 2nd. It is expressly forbidden to worship any being but God, Ex. xxxiv. 14; xx. 4, 5; Deu. vi. 13, 14; Isa. xlv. 20: it is idolatry to worship or pray to a creature. 4th. It is absurd to suppose that the Virgin Mary can be in all places at the same time, to hear the prayers of thousands at once, or that she can aid them. There is no idolatry more gross, and of course more wicked, than to worship the creature more than the Creator, Rom. i. 25. 48. All generations. All men,—all posterity. Call me blessed. Pronounce me highly favoured, or happy in being the mother of the Messiah. It is right to consider her as highly favoured, or happy; but this certainly does not warrant us to worship her, or to pray to her. Abraham was blessed in being the father of the faithful; Paul, in being the apostle to the Gentiles; Peter, in first preaching the Gospel to them; but who would think of worshipping or praying to Abraham, Paul, or Peter? 50. From generation to generation. From one age to another. That is, it is unceasing; it continues, and abounds. But it means also more than this. It means, that God's mercy will descend on the children, and children's children, of those that fear him, and keep his commandments, Ex. xx. 6. In this respect, it is an unspeakable privilege to be descended of pious parents; to have been the subject of their prayers, and to have received their blessing. And it is also a matter of vast guilt not to copy their example, and to walk in their steps. If God is disposed to shew mercy to thousands of generations, how heavy will be the condemnation if they do not avail themselves of it, and early seek his favour! 68. And redeemed. That is, was about to redeem, or had given the pledge that he would redeem. This was spoken under the belief that the Messiah, the Redeemer, was about to appear, and would certainly accomplish his work. The literal translation of this passage is, 'He hath made redemption, or ransom, for his people.' A ransom was the price paid to deliver a captive taken in war. A is a prisoner taken in war by B. B has a right to detain him a prisoner by the laws of war, but C offers B a price if he will release A, and suffer him to go at liberty. The price which he pays, and which must be satisfactory to B,—that is, be a reason to B why he should release him,—is called a price, or ransom. Men are sinners: they are bound over to just punishment by the law. The law is holy, and God, as a just governor, must see that the law is honoured, and the wicked punished. But if any thing can be done which will have the same good effect as the punishment of the sinner, or will be an equivalent for it,—that is, be of equal value to the universe,—God may consistently release him. If he can shew the same hatred of sin, and deter others from sinning, and accomplish the purity of the sinner, the sinner may be released. Whatever will accomplish this is called a ransom, because it is, in the eye of God, a sufficient reason why the sinner should not be punished; it is an equivalent for his sufferings, and God is satisfied. The blood of Jesus, that is, his death, in the place of sinners, constitutes such a ransom. It is in their stead; it is for them; it is equivalent to their punishment. It is not itself a punishment, for that always supposes personal crime; but it is what God is pleased to accept in the place of eternal sufferings of the sinner. The king of the Locrians made a law that an adulterer should be punished with the loss of his eyes. His son was the first offender, and the father decreed that his son should lose one eye, and he himself should lose one also: this was the ransom. He shewed his love, his regard for the honour of his law, and the determination that the guilty should not escape. So God gave his Son a ransom, to shew his love, his regard to justice, and his willingness to save men; and his Son, in his death, was a ransom. He is often so called in the New Testament, Mat. xx. 28; Mar. x. 45; Tit. ii. 14; Heb. ix. 12.

CHAP. II.—2. And this taxing was first made. This verse has given as much perplexity, perhaps, as any one in the New Testament. The difficulty has consisted in the fact that Cyrenius, or Quirinius, was not governor of Syria until twelve or fifteen years after the birth of Jesus. Jesus was born during the reign of Herod, at that time Varus was president of Syria. Herod was succeeded by Archelaus, who reigned eight or nine years; and after he was removed, Judea was annexed to the province of Syria, and Cyrenius was sent as the governor, Josephus, Ant., b. xvii. sec. 5. The difficulty has been to reconcile this account with that in Luke: various attempts have been made to do this; the one that seems most satisfactory is that proposed by Dr. Lardner. According to his view, it means, 'This was the first census of Cyrenius, governor of Syria.' It is called the first, to distinguish it from one afterwards taken by Cyrenius, Acts v. 37. It is said to be the census taken by Cyrenius, governor of Syria; not that he was then governor, but that it was taken by him who was afterwards familiarly known as governor. Cyrenius, governor of Syria, was the name by which the man was known; and it was not improper to say that the taxing was made by Cyrenius, the governor of Syria, though he might not have been actually governor for many years afterwards. Thus Herodian says, that 'to Marcus the emperor were born several daughters and two sons,' though several of those children were born to him before he was emperor. According to this, Augustus sent Cyrenius, an active, enterprising man, to take this census. At that time he was a Roman senator: afterwards he was made governor of the same country, and received the title which Luke gives him. 34. And for a sign. The word sign here denotes a conspicuous or distinguished object; and the Lord Jesus was such an object of contempt and rejection by all the people. He was despised, and his religion has been the common mark or sign for all the wicked, the profligate, and the profane, to curse, and ridicule, and oppose: compare Isa. viii. 18, and Acts xxviii. 22; never was a prophecy more exactly fulfilled than this. Thousands have rejected the Gospel and fallen into ruin, thousands are still falling of those who are ashamed of Jesus, thousands blaspheme him, deny him, speak all manner of evil against him, and would crucify him again if he were in their hands. But thousands also by him are renewed, justified, and raised up to life and peace. 35. That the thoughts. This is connected with the preceding verse: "He shall be a sign, a conspicuous object to be spoken against, that the thoughts of many hearts may be made manifest:" that is, that they might shew how much they hated holiness. Nothing so brings out the feelings of sinners as to tell them of Jesus Christ. Many treat him with silent contempt; many are ready to gnash their teeth; many curse him;—all shew how much by nature the heart is opposed to religion, and thus are really, in spite of themselves, fulfilling the Scriptures and the prophecies: so true is it that "none can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost," 1 Cor. xii. 3.

CHAP. III.—1, 2. Fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar, Pontius Pilate being governor. There is one remark to be made here about the manner in which the Gospels were written. They have every mark of openness and honesty. An impostor does not mention names, and times, and places particularly: it would be easily seen that he was an impostor. But the sacred writers describe objects and men as if they were perfectly familiar with them; they never appear to be guarding themselves: they speak of things most minutely; and if they had been impostors, it would have been easy to detect them. If, for example, John did not begin to preach in the fifteenth year of Tiberias; if Philip was not tetrarch of Iturea; if Pontius Pilate was not governor of Judea, how easy would it have been to detect them in falsehood! Yet it was never done. Nay, we have evidence of that age in Josephus, that these descriptions are strictly true; and consequently the Gospels must have been written by men who were personally acquainted with what they wrote; who were not impostors, and who were honest men. If they were honest, then the Christian religion is true.

CHAP. IV.—16. And, as his custom was, he went, &c. From this it appears that the Saviour regularly attended the service of the synagogue. In that service, the scriptures of the Old Testament were read, prayers were offered, and the Word of God was explained. There was great corruption in doctrine and practice at that time; but Christ did not, on that account, keep away from the place of public worship. From this we may learn: 1st. That it is our duty regularly to attend public worship. 2nd. That it is better to attend a place which is not entirely pure, or where just such doctrines are not delivered as we would wish, than not attend at all. It is of vast importance that the public worship of God should be maintained; and it is our duty to assist in maintaining it, to shew by our example that we love it, and to win others also to love it: see Heb. x. 25. At the same time, this remark should not be construed as enjoining it as our duty to attend a place where the true God is not worshipped, or where he is worshipped by pagan rites and pagan prayers. If, therefore, the Unitarian does not worship the true God,—and if the Roman Catholic worships God in a manner forbidden, and offers homage to the creatures of God also, thus being guilty of idolatry—it cannot be the duty of a man to attend on such a place of worship. 17. When he had opened the book. Literally, 'when he had unrolled the book.' Books, among the ancients, were written on parchments, or vellum, that is, skins of beasts, and were rolled together on two rollers, beginning at each end; so that while reading they rolled off from one to the other. Different forms of books were indeed used, but this was the most common. When used, the reader unrolled the MS. as far as the place which he wished to find, and kept before him just so much as he would read. When the roller was done, it was carefully deposited in a case. 18. Hath anointed me. Anciently, kings and prophets, and the high priests, were set apart to other work by anointing with oil, 1 Kin. xix. 15, 16; Ex. xxix. 7; 1 Sam. ix. 16, &c. This oil or ointment was made of various substances, and it was forbidden to imitate it, Ex. xxx. 34—38. Hence those who were set apart to the work of God, as king, or prophet, or priest, were called the Lord's anointed, 1 Sam. xvi. 6; Ps. lxxxix. 9; Isa. xlv. 1. Hence the Son of God is called the Messiah,—a Hebrew word, signifying the Anointed; or the Christ,—a Greek word, signifying the same thing; and by his being anointed is not meant that he was literally anointed, for he was never set apart in that manner: but that God hath set him apart for this work; that he had constituted or appointed him to be the Prophet, Priest, and King of his people. 30. Passing through the midst of them, he went his way. This escape was very remarkable. It is remarkable that he should escape out of their hands when the very object was to destroy him; that he should escape in so peaceful a manner, without violence or conflict. A similar case is recorded in Jno. viii. 59. There are but two ways of accounting for this: 1st. That other Nazarenes, who had not been present in the synagogue, heard what was doing, and came to rescue him, and in the contest that rose between the two parties, Jesus silently escaped. 2nd. More probably, Jesus, by Divine power, by the force of a word, or look, stilled xxiv. 43. The Vulgate adds to this verse, "taking the remains, he gave to them." The same appears in some Greek authorities. Jerome refers to some copies in which there was a still longer addition. Although a manifest interpolation, it is curious: "And they made excuse, saying, The word of iniquity and unbelief is substance which suffices not the true excellence of God to be apprehended by unclean spirits, therefore even now reveal thy righteousness." When or by whom this was first written is unknown.

xxiv. 44. From this point we have a bare summary of incidents which occurred between the resurrection-day and that of the ascension. There are no indications of time, and hence a captious criticism might suggest that Luke places the ascension immediately after the resurrection. A reference to Acts i. 2—9, however, shows that the evangelist was acquainted with many details which are not here included, among the rest the fact that the ascension did not occur until forty days after the resurrection. The sayings which follow, to the their passions, arrested their purposes, and passed silently through them. That he had such a power over the spirits of men, we learn from the occurrence in Gethsemane, when he said, "I am he; and they went backward, and fell to the ground," Jno. xviii. 6.

CHAP. V.—5. At thy word. At thy command. Though it seemed so improbable that they should take any thing, after having in vain toiled all night, and still more improbable by launching into the deep; yet he was willing to trust the word of Jesus, and make the trial. This was a remarkable instance of faith. Peter, as it appears, knew little then of Jesus. He was not then a chosen apostle. Jesus came to them almost a stranger, and unknown; and yet at his command, Peter resolved to make another trial, and go once more out into the deep. Oh, if all would as readily obey Jesus, all would be in like manner blessed! If sinners would thus obey him, they would find all his promises sure. He never disappoints: he asks only that we have confidence in him, and he will give to us every needful blessing. 23. And he left all. Luke here mentions a circumstance favourable to Matthew, or Levi, as he is here called, which Matthew himself has omitted. Luke says, "he left all." Had Matthew said this, it would have been a commendation of himself, utterly unlike the evangelists. No men were ever farther from praising themselves than they were. 29. And Levi made him a great feast. This circumstance Matthew, or Levi, as he is here called, has omitted. It shews how little inclined the evangelists are to say any thing in favour of themselves, or to praise themselves. True religion does not seek to commend itself, or to speak of what it does, even when it is done for the Son of God. It seeks retirement; delights rather in the consciousness of doing well, than in its being known; and leaves its good deeds to be spoken of, if spoken of at all, by others. This is agreeable to the direction of Solomon; Pr. xxvii. 2, "Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth." This feast was made expressly for our Lord, and attended by many publicans, probably men of wicked character; and it is not improbable that Matthew got them together for the purpose of bringing them into contact with our Lord, to do them good. Our Saviour did not refuse to go, and to go, too, at the risk of being accused as a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners, Mat. xi. 19. But his motives were pure: in the thing itself there was no harm. It afforded an opportunity of doing good; and we have no reason to doubt that it was improved by the Lord Jesus. Happy would it be if all the great feasts that are made were made in honour of our Lord. Happy, if he would be a welcome guest there! and happy if ministers and pious people who attend them, demeaned themselves as the Lord Jesus did, and they were made the means of advancing his kingdom. But, alas! there are few places where our Lord would be so unwelcome as at great feasts; and few places that serve so much to render the mind more gross, dissipated, and irreligious.

CHAP. VI.—5. The Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath. In Mark ii. 27, the Lord said unto them, "The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath." The declaration in the text is to be understood in connexion with this statement, and the meaning of it appears to be "not that, the institution being Jewish and temporary, he had authority to set it aside, with other ceremonial observances," seeing it is not as an institution for Israel, but for man, that he speaks of it; but rather, that the sabbath having been instituted in subordination to the great moral ends of man's being, and his own mission, and the "work which he is to do," as "the Son of man," being, above all the other plans and plings of Jehovah, intended to promote those ends,—he had full authority, as the commissioned King of Zion, to introduce any such changes in the observance as might coincide with the special nature of the moral purposes of God, with respect to man, in its institution. Such, for example, was the coming change of the day.—Dr. Wardlaw, on the Sabbath. "Do these explanations make void the law of the sabbath? Do they not rather establish it? Can it be imagined that our Lord would have thus spoken of this institution if it had been his intention to abolish or supersede it? The very pains he takes to place it on its right footing, may shew the light in which he regarded it as a standing commandment of God, of perpetual obligation in the church. In all his conversations on this subject,—often as he had occasion to denounce the superstitious observance of the sabbath, and to define the true doctrine respecting it,—he never gives a single hint of its being a legal or ceremonial rite, about to pass away. On the contrary, all the principles and rules which he lays down, assume, not only its Divine origin, but its continued obligation, and unequivocally imply that, whatever change might be made as to the day of its observance, (Ps. cxviii. 24; and perhaps, also, Isa. lxxv. 17) and in honour of his resurrection, (Jno. xx. 1, 26; 1 Cor. xvi. 2; Rev. i. 10) there was to be no change in the real and essential character of the ordinance."—The Son of man Lord of the Sabbath, a Sermon, by Dr. Candlish. See also Supplementary Note on Deu. v. 15. 17. Tyre and Sidon. Supplementary Note, Mat. xi. 21.

CHAP. VII.—11. A city called Nain, &c. This city was in Galilee, in the boundaries of the tribe of Issachar. It was about two miles south of mount Tabor, and not far from Capernaum. It is now a small village inhabited by Jews, Mahometans, and Christians.—The raising of this young man was one of the most decisive and instructive of our Lord's miracles. There was no doubt that he was dead: there could be no delusion, and no agreement to impose on the people. He came near to the city with no reference to this young man; he met the funeral procession, as it were, by accident; and by a word he restored him to life. All those who had the best opportunity of judging—the mother, the friends,—believed him to be dead, and were about to bury him. The evidence that he came to life was decisive: he sat up, he spoke, and all were impressed with the full assurance that God had raised him to life. Many witnesses were present, and none doubted that Jesus, by a word, had restored him to his weeping mother. The whole scene was affecting: here was a widowed mother, who was following her only son, her stay and hope, to the grave; he was borne along, one in the prime of life, and the only comfort of his parent,—impressive proof that the young, the useful, the vigorous, and the lovely may die. Jesus met them, apparently a stranger: he approached the procession, as if he had something important to say: he touched the bier, and the procession stood still. He was full of compassion for the weeping parent; and, by a word, restored the youth, stretched upon the bier, to life: he sat up, and spoke. Jesus therefore had power over the dead. He also has power to raise sinners, dead in trespasses and sins, to life. He can speak the word; and, though in their death of sin they are borne along towards ruin, he can open their eyes and raise them up, and restore them revived to real life, or to their friends. Often he raises up children in this manner, and gives them, converted to God, to their friends; imparting as real joy as he gave to the widow of Nain, by raising her son from the dead. And every child should remember, if he has pious parents, that there is no way in which he can give so much joy to them as by embracing Him who is the resurrection and the life, and resolving to live in his glory. 36. Sat down to meat. The original word here means only that he placed himself, or reclined, at the table. The notion of sitting at meals is taken from modern customs, and was not practised by the Jews. 38. Stand at his feet. They reclined, at their meals on their left side, and their feet therefore were extended from the table, so that persons could easily approach them: see Supplementary Note, Mat. xxvi. 20. Began to wash his feet. Among Eastern people it was customary, before eating, to wash the feet. The reason for this was, that they wore sandals, which covered only the bottom of the feet, and that when they ate they reclined on couches, or sofas. Among them it was also reckoned an act of hospitality and kindness to wash the feet, or bring water for it: see Gen. xviii. 4; Jud. xix. 21. The woman therefore began to shew her love for Christ, and at the same time her humility and penitence, by pouring forth a flood of tears, and washing his feet, in the manner of a servant. 48. Thy sins are forgiven. What a gracious assurance to the weeping, loving penitent! How that voice, spoken to the troubled sinner, stills his anguish, allays his troubled feelings, and produces peace to the soul! And how manifest is it, that he that could say this must be God! No man has a right to forgive sin. No man can speak peace to the soul, and give assurance that its transgressions are pardoned. Here, then, Jesus gave indubitable proof that he was God, as well as man—that he was the Lord of the conscience, as well as the pitying friend; and that he was as able to read the heart, and give peace there, as to witness the external expression of sorrow for sin. 49. Who is this? A very pertinent question. Who could he be but God? Man could not do it; and there is no wonder that they were amazed.

CHAP. VIII.—3. Ministered [imparted for his support] of their substance; their property; their possessions. Christians then believed, when they professed to follow Christ, that it was proper to give all up to him—their property, as well as their hearts. And the same thing is still required; that is, to commit all that we have to his disposal; to be willing to part with it for the promotion of his glory; and to leave it when he calls us away from it. Behold, ye poor and afflicted of the Lord—tried ones,—how Jesus, the Son of God, when he humbled himself to be made man, condescended to have his wants supplied by the bounty of his people. Oh! how hath he dignified the path of honest poverty by his bright example! Never, then, forget what Paul was commanded to tell the church, "Ye know," said he, "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be made rich."—Hawker.

CHAP. IX.—45. It was hid from them. They had imbibed the common notions of the Jews that he was to be a prince and a conqueror, to deliver the nation. They could not understand how that could be, if he was soon to be delivered into the hands of his enemies to die. In this way it was hid from them, not by God, but by their previous false belief; and from this we learn, that the plainest truths of the Bible are unintelligible to many, because they have embraced some belief or opinion before, which is erroneous, and which they are unwilling to abandon. The proper way of reading the Bible is to lay aside all previous opinions and submit entirely to God. The apostles should have supposed that their previous notions of the Messiah were wrong, and should have renounced them; they should have believed that what Jesus then said was consistent with his being the Christ: so we should believe that all that God says is consistent with truth, and should forsake all other opinions.

CHAP. X.—4. Salute no man by the way. Salutations among the Orientals did not consist, as among us, of a slight bow, or extension of the hand, but was performed by many embraces, and inclinations, and even prostrations of the body on the ground. All this required much time; and as the business on which the seventy were sent was urgent, they were required not to delay their journey by long and formal salutations of the persons whom they met. "If two Arabs of equal rank meet each other, they extend to each other the right hand, and having clasped, they elevate them, as if to kiss them. Each one then draws back his hand and kisses it instead of his friend's, and then places it upon his forehead. The parties then continue the salutation by kissing each other's beard. They give thanks to God that they are once more permitted to see their friend; they pray to the Almighty in his behalf. Sometimes they repeat not less than ten times the ceremony of grasping hands and kissing." The salutation of friends, therefore, was a ceremony which consumed much time; and it was on this account that our Lord, on this occasion, forbade them to delay their journey to greet others. A similar direction is found in 2 Kin. iv. 29. 17. The devils are subject to us through thy name. "There," Waltsgenius says, "Christ cast out devils by a virtue residing in himself: his disciples only in the name and by the power of the Lord." Seeing, then, this power accompanied them to all parts of the world, it is necessary that Christ's presence should be with them every where. Now such a presence is a certain indication of the Deity, 1 Kin. viii. 27; Ps. cxxxix. 7; Jer. xxiii. 24; Am. ix. 2, 3. 18. I beheld Satan, as lightning, fall from heaven. Satan, being spoiled of his dominion, may be said to fall from heaven, by a phrase familiar both to sacred and profane writers. So of the fall of the king of Babylon, the prophet says, "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer!" Isa. xiv. 12. Of the fall of the colleague of Antoninus, Cicero says, "Thou hast pulled him down from heaven." And when Pompey was overthrown, he is said, by him, "to have fallen from the stars."—Whitby. Satan had thus instantaneously (as lightning) been cast down from heaven; or his original apostacy, and his usurped dominion on earth, with the idolatrous worship which he had devised to establish, was about to be thrown down in the same sudden and surprising manner, by means of the Gospel preached to the nations, in which work the seventy disciples would, in a short time, be employed; so that their success in casting out devils was only an emblem of a far more decisive victory, which they and their coadjutors and successors would by his power obtain over Satan, the ruler of the whole multitude of evil spirits.—Scott.

CHAP. XI.—4. For we also forgive, &c. This is somewhat different from the expression in Matthew, though the sense is the same. The idea is, that unless we forgive others, God will not forgive us; and unless we come to him really forgiving all others, we cannot expect pardon. It does not mean, that by forgiving others we deserve forgiveness ourselves, or merit it, but that it is a disposition without which God cannot consistently pardon us. Every one that is indebted to us. Every one that has injured us. It does not refer to pecuniary transactions, but to offences similar to those which we have committed against God, and for which we ask forgiveness. Besides the variations in the expressions in this prayer, Luke has omitted the doxology, or close, altogether; and this shews that Jesus did not intend that we should always use just this form, but that it was a general direction how to pray; or rather, that we were to pray for these things, though not always using the same words. 37. Dine with him. The Jews, as well as the Greeks and Romans, had but two principal meals. The first was a slight repast, and was taken about ten or eleven o'clock of our time, and consisted chiefly of fruit, milk, cheese, &c. The second meal was partaken of about three o'clock, p.m., and was their principal meal. 52. Key of knowledge. A key is made to open a lock or door. By their false interpretation of the Old Testament, they had taken away the true key of understanding it. They had hindered the people from understanding the Scriptures respecting the Messiah; and those who were coming to me ye hindered. If there be any sin of peculiar magnitude, it is that of keeping the people in end of verse 49, were probably uttered on various occasions, and are not to be viewed as a consecutive discourse. They represent the topics upon which the Lord spoke from time to time. The phrase, "the law of Moses, the prophets, and the Psalms," includes the whole of the Old Testament as divided by the Jews.

xxiv. 46. A better reading here is, "Thus it is written that Christ should suffer and rise from the dead on the third day."

xxiv. 47. Some ancient copies, as the Sinaitic and Vatican, here have "repentance for remission of sins," or "in order to remission."

xxiv. 53. "Amen" is omitted in several MSS. About ninety years after the resurrection, Marcion, the heretic, published an abridged and altered copy of St. Luke's Gospel in his own name.

Additional Notes.—Chap. ix. 39. By "teareth" here and in verse 42, where the form of the Greek word is stronger, we must understand throwing into convulsions or spasms.

ignorance. And few men are so guilty as they who by false instructions prevent them from coming to a knowledge of the truth, and embracing it as it is in Jesus. 54. Laying wait for him. Or, rather, laying snares for him. It means that they endeavoured to entangle him in his talk; that they did as men do who catch birds—who lay snares, and deceive them, and take them unawares. That they might accuse him. Before the Sanhedrim, or great council of the nation, and thus secure his being put to death. From this we may learn, 1st. That faithful reproofs must be expected to excite opposition and hatred. Though the conscience may be roused, and may testify against the man that is reproofed, yet that does not prevent his hating the reproof and the reprover. 2nd. We see here the manner in which wicked men will endeavour to escape the reproofs of conscience. Instead of repenting, they seek vengeance, and resolve to put the reprover to shame, or to death. 3rd. We see the exceeding malignity which men may have against the Lord Jesus. Well it was said that he was set for the fall of many in Israel, that thereby the thoughts of many hearts might be revealed! Men, now, are not by nature less opposed to Jesus than they were then. 4th. We see the wisdom, purity, and firmness of the Saviour. To their souls he had been faithful. He had boldly reproofed them for their sins. They sought his life. Multitudes of the artful and learned gathered around him, to endeavour to draw out something of which they might accuse him. Yet in vain. Not a word fell from his lips of which they could accuse him. Every thing that he said was calm, mild, peaceful, wise, and lovely. Even his cunning and bitter adversaries were always confounded, and retired in shame and confusion. Here surely must have been something more than man. None but God manifest in the flesh could have known all their designs, seen all their wickedness and their wiles, and escaped the cunning stratagems that were laid to confound and entangle him in his conversation. 5th. The same infinitely wise Saviour can still meet and confound all his own enemies, and those of his people, and deliver all his followers, as he did himself, from all the snares laid by a wicked world to lead them to sin and death.

CHAP. XII.—33. Sell that ye have. Sell your property. Exchange it for that which ye can use in distributing charity. This was the condition of their being disciples. Their property they gave up; they forsook it; or they put it into common stock, for the sake of giving alms to the poor, Acts ii. 44; iv. 32; Jno. xii. 6; Acts v. 2. Bags which wax not old. The word bags here means purses, or the bags attached to their girdles, in which they carried their money. By bags which wax not old, Jesus means that we should lay up treasure in heaven; that our aim should be to be prepared to enter there, where all our wants will be for ever provided for. Purses, here, grow old and useless. Wealth takes to itself wings. Riches are easily scattered, or we must soon leave them; but that wealth which is in heaven abides for ever. It never is corrupted, never flies away, never is to be left. Wax. This word is from an old Saxon word, and in the Bible means to grow. 47. Many stripes. Shall be severely and justly punished. They who have many privileges, who are often warned, who have the Gospel, and do not repent and believe, and do good works, shall be far more severely punished than others. They who are early taught in Sunday schools, or by pious parents, or in other ways, and grow up in sin and impenitence, will have much more to answer for than they who have no such privileges. They will justly suffer more than almost any other class of mankind. 49. And what will I? This passage might be better expressed in this manner: 'And what would I, but that it were kindled? Since it is necessary for the advancement of religion that such divisions should take place; since the Gospel cannot be established without conflicts, and strifes, and hatreds; I am even desirous that they should come. Since the greatest blessing of mankind must be attended with such unhappy divisions, I am willing, nay desirous, that they should come.' He did not wish evil in itself; but as it was the occasion of good, he was desirous that, if it must take place, it should take place soon. From this we learn, 1st. That the promotion of religion may be expected to produce many contests, and bitter feelings. 2nd. That the heart of man must be exceedingly wicked, or it would not oppose a work like the Christian religion. 3rd. That though God cannot look on evil with approbation, yet, for the sake of the benefit which may grow out of it, he is willing to permit it, and suffer it to come into the world.

CHAP. XIII.—14. Answered with indignation, because, &c. Opposition to the work of Jesus often puts on the appearance of great professed regard for religion. Many men oppose conversions, revivals, missions, Bible societies, and Sunday schools—strange as it may seem—from professed regard to the purity of religion. They, like the ruler here, have formed their notions of religion as consisting in something very different from doing good, and they oppose those who are attempting to spread the Gospel throughout the world. 16. Whom Satan hath bound. Satan is the name given to the prince or leader of evil spirits, called also the devil, Beelzebub, and the old serpent, Mat. xii. 24; Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2. By his binding her, is meant that he had inflicted this disease upon her. It was not properly a possession of the devil—for that commonly produced derangement; but God had suffered him to afflict her in this manner—similar to the way in which he was permitted to try Job, Job i. 12; ii. 6, 7. It is no more improbable that God would suffer Satan to inflict pain, than that he would suffer a wicked man to do it. Yet nothing is more common than for man to be the occasion of bringing on a disease in another, which may terminate only with the life. He that seduces a virtuous man, and leads him to intemperance, or he that wounds him, or strikes him, may disable him as much as Satan did this woman. If God permits it in one case, he may, for the same reason, in another.

CHAP. XIV.—1. To eat bread. To dine; to partake of the hospitalities of his house. On the sabbath day. It may seem strange that our Saviour should have gone to dine with a man of influence, and wickedness, and a stranger, on the sabbath. But we are to remember, 1st. That he was travelling, having no home of his own, and that it was no more improper to go there than to any other place. 2nd. That he did not go there for the purpose of feasting and amusement, but to do good. 3rd. That as several of them were together, it gave him an opportunity to address them on the subject of religion, and to reprove their vices. If therefore the example of Jesus should be pleaded to authorize accepting an invitation to dine on the sabbath, it should be pleaded just as it was. If we can go just as he did, it is right. If when away from home, if we go to do good, if we make it an occasion to discourse on the subject of religion, and to persuade men to repent, then it is not improper. Farther than this we cannot plead the example of Christ. And surely this should be the last instance in the world to be adduced to justify dinner parties, and scenes of riot and gluttony, on the sabbath. 7. Chief rooms. The word rooms here does not at all express the meaning of the original. It does not mean apartments, but the higher places at the table, those which were nearest the head of the table, and to him who had invited them. See Note, Mat. xxiii. 6. That this was the common character of the Pharisees appears from Mat. xxiii. 6. 22. Yet there is room. He went out and invited all he found in the lanes, and yet the table was not full. This he also reported unto his master. There is room! What a glorious declaration is this in regard to the Gospel! Millions have been saved, but there yet is room. Millions have been invited, and have come, and have gone to heaven; but heaven is not yet full. There is a banquet there which no number can exhaust; there are fountains which no number can drink dry; there are harps there which other hands may strike; and there are seats there which others may occupy. Heaven is not full, and yet there is room. The sabbath school teacher may say to his class, Yet there is room; the parent may say to his children, Yet there is room; the minister of the Gospel may go and say to the wide world, Yet there is room. The mercy of God is not exhausted; the blood of the atonement has not lost its efficacy; heaven is not full. What a sad message it would be if we were compelled to go and say, 'There is no more room; heaven is full. No other one can be saved. No matter what their prayers, or tears, or sighs, they cannot be saved. Every place is filled; every seat is occupied!' But, thanks be to God! this is not the message which we are to bear; and if there yet is room, Come sinners, young and old, and enter into heaven. Fill up that room, that heaven may be full of the happy and the blessed. If any part of the universe is to be vacant, O let it be the dark world of woe! 24. For I say unto you. These may be considered as the words of Jesus, making an application of the parable to the Pharisees before him. None of those men. This cannot be understood as meaning that no Jews should be saved, but none of those who had treated him in that manner—none who had so decidedly rejected the offer of the Gospel—should be saved. We may here see how dangerous it is once to reject the Gospel; how dangerous to grieve away the Holy Spirit. How often God forsakes for ever the sinner who has been once awakened and invited, and who grieves the Spirit and rejects him. The invitation is full and free; but when it is rejected, and men turn wilfully away from it, God leaves them to their chosen way, and they are drowned in destruction and perdition. How important, then, is it to embrace the Gospel at once; to accept the gracious invitation, and enter without delay the path that conducts to the heaven above! 35. He that hath ears to hear, &c. See Mat. xi. 15. You are to understand that he that has not grace in his heart, who merely makes a profession of religion, and who sustains the same relation to true piety that this insipid and useless mass does to good salt, is useless in the church, and will be rejected. Real piety, true religion, is of vast value in the world. It keeps it pure, it saves it from corruption, as salt does meat. But a mere profession of religion is fit for nothing. It does no good. It is a mere encumbrance, and all such professors are fit only to be cast out and rejected. All such must be rejected by the Son of God, and cast into a world of wretchedness and despair. Compare Mat. vii. 22, 23; viii. 12, xlii. 33; xxv. 30; Rev. iii. 16; Job viii. 13; xxxvi. 13.

CHAP. XV.—7. Just persons. The word persons is not in the original. It means, simply, just ones, or those who have not sinned. It may refer to angels as well as to men. There are no just men on earth who need no repentance. There have been none, and there will be none. Eccl. vii. 20; Ps. xiv. 2, 3; Rom. iii. 10–18. Our Saviour did not mean to imply that there were any such. He was speaking of what took place in heaven, in the view of the angels, and of their emotions when they contemplate the creatures of God. And he says that they rejoiced in the repentance of one sinner more than in the holiness of many who had not fallen. We are not to suppose that our Saviour meant to teach that there were just ninety-nine holy angels to one sinner. He means merely that they rejoice more over the repentance of one sinner than they do over many who have not fallen. By this our Saviour vindicated his own conduct. The Jews did not deny the existence of angels. They would not deny that their feelings were proper. If they rejoiced in this manner, it was not improper for him to shew similar joy, and especially to seek their conversion and salvation. If they rejoice also, it shews how desirable is the repentance of a sinner. They know of how much value is an immortal soul. They see what is meant by eternal death; and they do not feel too much, or have too much anxiety about the soul, that can never die. O that men saw it as they see it; and O that they would make an effort, such as angels see to be proper, to save the souls from eternal death! 25. Music and dancing. Dancing was not uncommon among the Hebrews, and was used on various occasions. Thus Miriam celebrated the deliverance of the children of Israel from Egypt in dances as well as songs, Ex. xv. 20. David danced before the ark, 2 Sam. vi. 14. It was common at Jewish feasts, (Jud. xxi. 19–21,) and in public triumphs, (Jud. xi. 34,) and at all seasons of mirth and rejoicings, Ps. xxx. 11; Jer. xxxi. 4, 13. It was also used in religious services by the idolaters, (Ex. xxxii. 19,) and also by the Jews at times in their religious services, Ps. cxlix. 3; cl. 4. In this case, it was an expression of rejoicing. Our Lord expresses no opinion about its propriety; he simply states the fact; nor was there occasion for comment on it. His mentioning it cannot be pleaded for its lawfulness or propriety, any more than his mentioning the vice of the younger son, or the wickedness of the Pharisees, can be pleaded to justify their conduct. It is an expressive image used in accordance with the known customs of the country to express joy. It is farther to be remarked, that if the example of persons in Scripture be pleaded for dancing, it can be only for just such dances as they practised—for sacred or triumphal occasions.

CHAP. XVI.—8. The lord commended. Praised, or expressed admiration at his wisdom. These are not the words of Jesus, as commending him, but a part of the narrative or parable. His master commended him—saw that he was wise and considerate, though he was dishonest. The unjust steward. It is not said that his master commended him because he was unjust, but because he was wise. This is the only thing in his conduct of which there is any approbation expressed, and this approbation was expressed by his master. This passage cannot be brought therefore to prove that Jesus meant to commend his dishonesty. It was the commendation expressed of his cunning or forethought; and the master could no more approve this conduct than he could the first act of cheating him. The children of this world. Those who are devoted to this world, who live for this world only, and who are careful only to obtain property, and to provide for their temporal necessities. It does not mean that they are peculiarly wicked and profligate, but only that they are worldly, and anxious about earthly things: see Mat. xiii. 22; 2 Tim. iv. 10. Children of light. Those who have been enlightened from above, who are Christians. Those who, once spiritually blind, have been made to see—who have been enlightened not only by the Word, but by the Spirit of God, who opens their eyes, and enables them to understand and receive the message which the Word conveys. 9. They may receive you. This is a form of expression denoting merely, that you may be received. The plural form is used, because it was used in the corresponding place in the parable, ver. 4. The direction is, so to use our worldly goods that we may be received into heaven when we die. God will receive us there, and we are to employ our property so that he will not cast us off for abusing it. 22. Abraham's bosom. This is a phrase taken from the practice of reclining at meals, where the head of one lay on the bosom of another, and it denoted, therefore, intimacy and friendship: see Jno. xiii. 23; xxi. 20. The Jews had no doubt that Abraham was in paradise. To say that Lazarus was in his bosom was, therefore, the same as to say that he was admitted to heaven, and made happy there. The Jews, moreover, boasted very much of being the friends of Abraham and his descendants, Mat. iii. 9. To be

ix. 55, 56. The Sinaitic, Vatican, and Alexandrian MSS. omit the words "and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them." The Sinaitic and Vatican MSS. also omit the reference to Elias in verse 54. In consequence of these omissions in manuscripts of great authority, the passages have been left out of several modern editions.

ix. 58. The peculiar force of these words appears by a reference to the circumstances in which they were spoken. The Saviour had been refused a lodging by the inhabitants of one Samaritan village, and was now with his disciples on the way to another village, seeking for hospitality there. At that time, therefore, Jesus could say with literal truth that he had not where to lay his head.

ix. 62. Our Lord's words here are in the form of a proverb. To "put the hand to the plough" is to enter upon an undertaking. To "look back" is in heart to abandon an undertaking, to lose faith. For his friend, was a their view the highest honour and happiness. Our Saviour therefore shewed them that this poor and afflicted man might be raised to the highest happiness; while the rich, who prided themselves on their being descended from Abraham, might be cast away, and lost for ever.

CHAP. XVII.—6. See Mat. xvii. 20. Sycamine tree. This name, as well as sycamore, is given among us to the large tree commonly called the buttonwood. But the tree here mentioned is different. The Latin Vulgate and the Syriac versions translate it mulberry tree. It is said to have been a tree that commonly grew in Egypt, of the size and appearance of a mulberry tree, but bearing a species of figs. This tree was common in Palestine also. It is probable that our Lord was standing by one as he addressed these words to his disciples. 17, 18. Where are the nine? Jesus had commanded them to go to the priest; and they were probably literally obeying the commandment. They were impatient to be healed, and selfish in wishing it, and had no gratitude to God, or their benefactors. Jesus did not forbid their expressing gratitude to him for his mercy. He rather seems to reprove them for not doing it. One of the first feelings of the sinner cleansed from sin is a desire to praise his great benefactor. And a real willingness to obey his commandments is not inconsistent with a wish to render thanks to him for his mercy. With what singular propriety may this question now be asked—Where are the nine? And what a striking illustration is this of human nature, and of the ingratitude of men! One had come back to give thanks for the favour bestowed on him; the others were heard of no more. So now. When men are restored from dangerous sickness, here and there one comes to give thanks to God; but “where are the nine?” When men are defended from danger; when they are recovered from the perils of the sea; when a steam-boat is destroyed and a large part of the crew and passengers perish, here and there one of those who are saved acknowledges the goodness of God, and renders him praise. But where are the mass of them? They give no thanks; they offer no praise. They go about their usual employments, to mingle in the scenes of pleasure and of sin, as if nothing had occurred. Few, few of all who have been rescued from “threatening graves,” feel their obligation to God, or ever express it. They forget their Great Benefactor; perhaps the mention of his name is unpleasant, and they scorn the idea that they are under any obligations to God. Such, alas, is man, ungrateful man! This stranger. This foreigner; or rather this alien, or this man of another tribe. In the Syriac version, “this one who is of a foreign people;” this man, who might have been least expected to have expressed this gratitude to God. The most unlikely characters are often found to be most consistent and grateful. Men from whom we would expect least in religion are often so entirely changed as to disappoint all our expectations, and to put to shame those who have been most highly favoured. The poor often thus put to shame the rich; the ignorant the learned; and even the young the aged. 28—30. They did eat, &c. They were busy in the affairs of this life, as if nothing were about to happen. The same day, &c. see Gen. xix. 23—25. It rained. The word might have been rendered “he rained.” In Genesis it is said that the Lord did it. Fire and brimstone. God destroyed Sodom on account of its great wickedness. He took vengeance on it for its sins; and the example of Sodom is set before men to deter them from committing great transgressions, and as a full proof that God will punish the guilty: see Jude 7; also Isa. i. 10; Jer. i. 40. Yet in overthrowing it, God used natural means. He is not to be supposed to have created fire and brimstone for the occasion, but to have directed the natural means at his disposal for their overthrow;—as he did not create the waters to drown the world, but merely broke up the fountains of the great deep, and opened the windows of heaven. Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboim, (Deu. xxix. 23), were four great cities on a plain where is now the Dead sea, at the south-east of Palestine, and into which the river Jordan flows. They were built on a plain which abounded, doubtless, as all that region now does, in bitumen, or naphtha, which is easily kindled, and which burns with great intensity. The phrase “fire and brimstone” is a Hebrew form of expression, denoting sulphureous fire, or fire having the smell of sulphur; and may denote a volcanic eruption, or any burning like that of naphtha. There is no improbability in supposing that this destruction was accomplished by lightning, which ignited the naphtha; or that it was a volcanic eruption, which by direction of God overthrew the wicked cities. From heaven. By command of God, or from the sky. To the people of Sodom it had the appearance of coming from heaven, as all volcanic eruptions would have. Hundreds of towns have been overthrown in this way; and all by the agency of God. He rules the elements, and makes them his instruments, at his pleasure, in accomplishing the destruction of the wicked.

CHAP. XVIII.—7. His own elect. People of God, saints, Christians; so called, because God has chosen them to be his. The term is usually given to the true followers of God in the Scriptures, and is a term of affection, denoting his great and peculiar love in choosing them out of a world of sinners, and conferring on them grace, and mercy, and eternal life: see 1 Ths. i. 4; Col. iii. 12; 1 Pet. i. 2; Eph. i. 4. It signifies here that they are peculiarly dear to him; that he feels a deep interest in their welfare, and that he will therefore be ready to come forth to our aid. The judge felt no special interest in that widow, yet he heard her. God feels a particular regard, a tender love, for his elect, and therefore he will hear and save. Which cry day and night. This expresses one striking characteristic of the elect of God; they pray, and pray constantly. None can have evidence that he is chosen of God who is not a man of prayer. One of the best marks by which the electing love of God is known is, that it disposes us to prayer. This passage supposes that when the elect of God are in trouble, and pressed down with calamities, they will cry unto him; and it affirms that, if they do, he will hear their cries, and answer their requests. 12. I fast twice in the week. The religion of the Pharisee consisted, 1st. In abstaining from injustice to others, in pretending to live a harmless, innocent, and upright life; and, 2nd. In a regular observance of all the external duties of religion. His fault consisted in relying on this kind of righteousness; in not feeling and acknowledging that he was a sinner; in not seeking a religion that should dwell in the heart and regulate the feelings; and in making public and ostentatious professions of his own goodness. Most of all was this abominable in the sight of God, who looks into the heart, and who sees wickedness there when the external actions may be blameless. And we may learn from the case of the Pharisee, 1st. That it is not the man who has the most orthodox belief that has of course the most piety. 2nd. That men may be externally moral, and not be righteous in the sight of God. 3rd. That they may be very exact in the external duties of religion, and even go beyond the strict letter of the law; that they may assume a great appearance of sanctity, and still be strangers to true piety; and 4th. That ostentation in religion, or a boasting before God of what we are, and of what we have done, is abominable in his sight. This spoils every thing, even if the life should be tolerably blameless, and if there should be real piety.

CHAP. XIX.—12. A certain nobleman. A prince; a man descended from kings, and having a title therefore to succeed in the kingdom. Went into a far country, &c. This expression is derived from the state of things in Judaea in the time of our Saviour. Judaea was subject to the Romans, having been conquered by Pompey about sixty years before Christ. It was, however, governed by Jews, who held the government under the Romans. It was necessary that the prince or king should receive a recognition of his right to the kingdom by the Roman emperor, and in order to this that he should go to Rome; or, as it is said here, “that he might receive to himself a kingdom.” This actually occurred several times. Archelaus, a son of Herod the Great, about the time of the birth of Jesus, went to Rome to obtain a confirmation of the title which his father had left him, and succeeded in doing it. Herod the Great, his father, had done the same thing before to implore the aid and countenance of Antony. Agrippa the younger, grandson of Herod the Great, went to Rome also to obtain the favour of Tiberius, and to be confirmed in his government. Such instances, having frequently occurred, would make this parable perfectly intelligible to those to whom it was addressed. By the nobleman here is undoubtedly represented the Messiah, the Lord Jesus Christ: by his going into a far country, is denoted his going to heaven, to the right hand of his Father, before he should fully set up his kingdom and establish his reign among men. 14. Sent a message, saying, &c. His discontented subjects, fearing what would be the character of his reign, sent an embassy to remonstrate against his being appointed as the ruler. This actually took place. Archelaus went to Rome to obtain from Augustus a confirmation of his title to reign over that part of Judaea which had been left him by his father, Herod the Great. The Jews, knowing his character, (compare Mat. ii. 22), sent an embassy of fifty men to Rome to prevail on Augustus not to confer the title on him; but they could not succeed. He received the kingdom, and reigned in Judaea in the place of his father. As this fact was fresh in the memory of the Jews, it makes this parable much more striking. By this part of it, Christ designed to denote that the Jews would reject him—the Messiah—and would say that they did not desire him to reign over them: see Jno. i. 11. So it is true of all sinners that they do not wish Jesus to reign over them; they reject him; and, if it were possible, would cast him off, and never submit to his reign. 41—44. He wept over it. Shewing his compassion for the guilty city, and his strong sense of the evils that were about to come upon it: see Mat. xxiii. 37—39. As he entered the city, he passed over the mount of Olives. From that mountain there was a full and magnificent view of the city: see Supp. Notes on Mat. xxi. 1. For the days shall come, &c. This took place under Titus, the Roman general, A.D. 70, about thirty years after this was spoken. Cast a trench about thee. The word trench now means commonly a pit or ditch. When the Bible was translated, it meant also earth thrown up to defend a camp.—Johnson’s Dictionary. This is the meaning of the original here. It is not a pit, or large ditch, but a pile of earth, stones, or wood, thrown up to guard a camp, and to defend it from the approach of an enemy. This was done at Jerusalem. Josephus informs us that Titus, in order that he might compel the city to surrender by famine, built a wall around the whole circumference of the city. This wall was nearly five miles in length, and furnished with thirteen castles or towers. This work was completed with incredible labour in ten days. The professed design of this wall was to keep the city in on every side. Never was a prophecy more strikingly accomplished. Shall lay thee even with the ground. This was literally done. Titus caused a plough to pass over the place where the temple stood.

CHAP. XXI.—37, 38. See Mat. xxi. 17. Came early in the morning. He returned early from the mount of Olives, and taught in the temple. Our Saviour did not waste his mornings in idleness or sleep. He rose early and repaired to the temple. The people also flocked to the sanctuary to hear him. This example is at once an encouragement to early rising, and to the early worship of God. It is a reproof of those who spend the part of the day best fitted for devotion in unnecessary sleep. And it shews the propriety, where it can be done, of assembling early in the morning for prayer and the worship of God. Early prayer meetings have the countenance of the Saviour, and will be found to be eminently conducive to the promotion of religion. The whole example of Jesus goes to shew the importance of beginning the day with God, and of lifting up the heart to him for direction and for the supply of our wants, and for preservation from temptation, before the mind is engrossed by the cares, and distracted by the perplexities, and led away by the temptations of this life. Commencing the day with God is like arresting evil at the fountain: prayer at any other time, without this, is an attempt to arrest it when it has swollen to a stream, and rolls on like a torrent.

CHAP. XXII.—24. A strife. A contention, or debate. Which of them should be the greatest. The apostles, in common with the Jews generally, had supposed that the Messiah would come as a temporal prince, and in the manner of other princes of the earth; of course, that he would have officers of his government, ministers of state, &c. Their contention was founded on this expectation, and they were disputing which of them should be raised to the highest office; they had before had a similar contention: see Mat. xviii. 1; xx. 20—28. Nothing can be more humiliating than that the disciples should have had such contentions, and in such a time and place. That just as Jesus was contemplating his own death, and labouring to prepare them for it, they should strive and contend about offices and rank, shews how deeply seated is the love of power how ambition will find its way into the most secret and sacred places; and how even the disciples of the meek and lowly Jesus are sometimes actuated by this most base and wicked feeling. 38. Are two swords. The Galileans, it is said, often went armed. The Essenes did so also. The reason was, that the country was full of robbers and wild beasts, and it was necessary to carry in their travels some means of defence. It seems that the disciples followed the customs of the country, and had with them some means of defence, though they had but two swords among the twelve. It is enough. It is to be observed that he did not say “the two swords are enough,” but “it is enough;” perhaps meaning simply, enough has been said. Other matters press on, and you will yet understand what I mean. 43. Strengthening him—his human nature, to sustain the great burden that was upon his soul. Some have supposed from this that he was not Divine as well as human; for if he was God, how could an angel give any strength and comfort, and why did not the Divine nature alone sustain the human? But the fact that he was Divine does not affect the case at all. It might be asked with the same propriety, if he was, as all admit, the friend of God, and beloved of God, and holy, why, if he was a mere man, did not God sustain him alone, without an angel’s intervening? But the objection in neither case would have any force. The man, Christ Jesus, was suffering. His human nature was in agony; and it is the manner of God to sustain the afflicted by the intervention of others. Nor was there any more unfitness in sustaining the human nature of his Son in this manner than any other sufferer. 48. Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? By the Son of man was evidently meant there the Messiah. Judas had had the most satisfactory evidence of that, and did not doubt it. A kiss was the sign of affection. By that slight artifice Judas thought to conceal his base purpose. Jesus, with severity, reproaches him for it. Every word is emphatic. Betrayest thou—dost thou violate all thy obligations of fidelity, and deliver thy Master up to death? Betrayest thou—thou, so long with him, so much favoured, so sure that this is the Messiah? Betrayest thou the Son of man—the Messiah, the hope of th a fine illustration of the opposite virtue, see St. Paul’s words in Phil. iii. 13, 14.

x. 4. “Salute no man by the way” is supposed to refer to the fact that Oriental salutations were prolix and complicated, involving delay. As their mission required haste, they were not to consume their time over the formalities implied by such salutations.

x. 18. When did our Lord behold Satan fall from heaven? Some think the reference is to the original fall of Satan; others understand the words of the sudden humiliation to which Satan was subjected by the miraculous powers conferred on the seventy disciples; others, again, regard the expression as pointing to the final and complete victory over Satan which Jesus will gain at the end of the world.

x. 19. We need not understand serpents and scorpions here literally, but such enemies as may be compared to venomous and deadly reptiles. It is victory over spiritual and moral evil, and such like, that is promised, and a complete triumph over the enemy.

nations, the desire of all people, the world's Redeemer? Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss—the sign of friendship and affection, employed in a base and wicked purpose, intended to add deceit, disguise, and a prostitution of a mark of affection to the crime of treason? Every word of this must have gone to the very soul of Judas! Perhaps few reproofs of crime more resemble the awful searchings of the souls of the wicked in the day of judgment.

CHAP. XXIII.—2. This fellow. The word fellow is not in the original. It conveys a notion of contempt, which no doubt they felt, but which is not expressed in the Greek, and which it is not proper should be expressed in the translation. It might be translated, "We found this man." 4. I find no fault. I see no evidence that he is guilty of what you charge him with. This was after Pilate had taken Jesus into the judgment-hall by himself, and examined him privately, and been satisfied in regard to the nature of his kingdom: see Jno. xviii. 33—38. He was then satisfied that, though he claimed to be a king, yet his kingdom was not of this world, and that his claims did not interfere with those of Cæsar. 12. Made friends together, &c. What had been the cause of the quarrel is unknown. It is commonly supposed that it was Pilate's slaying the Galileans in Jerusalem, as related in ch. xiii. 1, 2. The occasion of their reconciliation seems to have been the civility and respect which Pilate shewed to Herod in this case. It was not because they were united in hating Jesus, as is often the case with wicked men, for Pilate was certainly desirous of releasing him, and both considered him merely as an object of ridicule and sport. It is true, however, that wicked men, at variance in other things, are often united in opposing and ridiculing Christ and his followers; and that enmities of long standing are sometimes made up, and the most opposite characters brought together, simply to oppose religion. Compare Ps. lxxviii. 5—7. 31. For if they do these things in a green tree, &c. This seems to be a proverbial expression. A green tree is one that is not easily set on fire. A dry one is easily kindled, and burns rapidly. By a green tree is represented evidently a man of truth and purity. And the meaning of the passage is: 'If they, the Romans, do these things to me, who am innocent and blameless, if they punish me in this manner in the face of justice, what will they not do in relation to this guilty nation? What security have they that heavier judgments will not come upon them? What desolations and woes may not be expected when injustice and oppression have taken the place of justice, and have set up a rule over this wicked people?' Our Lord alludes evidently to the calamities that would come upon them by the Romans in the destruction of their city and temple. The passage may be applied, however, without impropriety, and with great beauty and force, to the punishment of the wicked in the future world. Thus applied, it means that the sufferings of the Saviour, compared with the sufferings of the guilty, were like the burning of a green tree compared with the burning of one that is dry. A green tree is not adapted to burn; a dry one is. So the Saviour—innocent, pure, and holy—stood in relation to suffering. There were sufferings which an innocent being could not endure. There was remorse of conscience, the sense of guilt, punishment properly so called, and the eternity of woes. He had the consciousness of innocence, and he would not suffer for ever. He had no passions to enkindle that would rage and ruin the soul. The sinner is adapted to sufferings, like a dry tree to the fire. He is guilty, and will suffer all the horrors of remorse of conscience. He will be punished literally. He has raging and impetuous passions, and they will be enkindled in hell, and will rage for ever and ever. The meaning is, that if the innocent Saviour suffered so much, the sufferings of the sinner for ever in hell must be more unspeakably dreadful. Yet who could endure the sufferings of the Redeemer on the cross for a single day? Who could bear them for ever and ever—aggravated by all the horrors of a guilty conscience, and all the terrors of unrestrained anger, and hate, and fear, and wrath?—Why will the wicked die? 43. Paradise. This is a word of Persian origin, and means a garden, and particularly a garden of pleasure, filled with trees, and shrubs, and fountains, and flowers. In hot climates, such gardens were peculiarly pleasant, and hence they were attached to the mansions of the rich, and to the palaces of princes. They came thence to denote any place of happiness, and particularly the word was used to denote the abodes of the blessed in another world. The Romans spoke of their Elysium, and the Greeks of the gardens of Hesperides, where the trees bore golden fruit. The garden of Eden means also the garden of pleasure; and in Gen. ii. 8, the Septuagint renders the word Eden by Paradise. Hence this name in the Scriptures comes to denote the abodes of the blessed in the other world.

CHAP. XXIV.—21. Besides all this. It is to be observed that Cleopas states things just as they occurred to his own mind. There is little connexion; his mind is confused and distracted. There were so many things that were remarkable in Jesus—there was so much evidence that he was the Messiah—their hopes had been so suddenly dashed by his death, and the succeeding events had been so remarkable, that his mind was confused, and he knew not what to think. The things which he now stated, served to increase his perplexity. The expressions here are perfectly natural; they bespeak an agitated mind; they are among the simple touches of nature. To day is the third day, &c. Jesus had foretold them that he would rise on the third day. This they did not understand; but it is not improbable that they looked to this day expecting something wonderful, and that the visit to the sepulchre had called it to their recollection; and they were more and more amazed when they put all these things together. As if they had said, 'The third day is come, and we have not seen him. Yet we begin to remember his promise; the angels have informed us that he is alive; but we do not know how to put these things together, and what to make of them.' 25. O fools. The word fool sometimes is a term of reproach denoting wickedness. In this sense we are forbidden to employ it in addressing another, Mat. v. 22. That, however, is a different word in the Greek from this here. The one there used implies contempt, but that in this place denotes weakness or dullness. He reproached them for not seeing what he had himself so clearly predicted, and what had been foretold by the prophets. It does not in the original imply as much reproach as the word fool does among us. It was not an expression of contempt, it was an expression denoting merely that they were thoughtless, and that they did not properly attend to the evidence that he must die, and rise again. 27. The things concerning himself. Concerning the Messiah. It does not appear that he applied them to himself, but left them, probably, to make the application. He shewed what the Scriptures foretold; and they saw that these things applied to Jesus of Nazareth; and began to be satisfied that he was the Messiah. The most striking passages foretelling the character and sufferings of Christ are the following, which we may suppose it possible our Saviour dwelt upon, to convince them that though he was crucified, yet he was the Christ, Gen. iii. 15; Deu. xviii. 15; Gen. xlix. 10. Nam. xxi. 8, 9; compare Jno. iii. 14; Isa. liii.; Dan. ix. 25—27; Isa. ix. 6, 7; Ps. cx. xvi. xxii. 3; Mat. iv. 2—6. 31. And their eyes were opened. Here was convincing evidence that Jesus was the Messiah. This was but one of many instances where Jesus convinced his disciples contrary to their previous belief. In this case the evidence was abundant. He first satisfied them from the Old Testament that the very things which had happened were foretold; he then dissipated every doubt, by shewing himself to them, and convincing them that he was truly the Christ. There was no chance here for deception and juggling. Who would have met them, and talked with them, in this way, but the real Saviour? Who would have thought of writing this narrative to help an imposture? What impostor would have recorded the dullness of the disciples as to the plain declarations of the Old Testament, and then have thought of this device to prop up the narrative? Every thing about this narrative—its simplicity—its tenderness—its particularity—its perfect nature—and its freedom from all appearance of trick—shews that it was taken from real life; and if so, then the Christian religion is true; for here is evidence that Jesus rose from the dead. 44. Which were written in the law of Moses, &c. This division of the Old Testament was in use long before the time of Christ, and was what he referred to here. And he meant to say that in each of these divisions of the Old Testament there were prophecies respecting himself. The particular subject before them was, his resurrection from the dead. A most striking prediction of this is contained in Ps. xvi. 9—11; compare it with Acts ii. 24—32; xiii. 35—37. 45. Opened he their understanding. Enabled them fully to comprehend the meaning of the prophecies that foretold his death and resurrection. They had seen him die; they now saw him risen. Their prejudices, by his instructions, and by the facts which they could no longer call in question, were removed, and they no longer doubted that he was the Messiah, and that all the facts in the case, which had before confounded them, could be easily accounted for. Here we may learn, 1st. That facts or truths will yet remove the mysteries that we now see in religion. 2nd. That our prejudices and our preconceived opinions are one cause of our seeing so many mysteries in the Bible. If a man is willing to take the plain declarations of the Bible, he will be little perplexed with mysteries. 3rd. That God only can open the mind so as fully to comprehend the Scriptures. He only can overcome our prejudices—open our hearts—and dispose us to receive the engrafted word with meekness, and with the simplicity of a child: see Acts xvi. 14; Jas. i. 21; Mar. x. 15. 4th. The design of God's opening the understanding is, that we may be acquainted with the Scriptures. It is not that we may be made wise above what is written, but that we may submit ourselves wholly to the Word of God. 48. Are witnesses of these things. Of my life, my sufferings, my death, and my resurrection. How solemn was their office, to testify these things to the world, and in the face of sufferings and death to go and proclaim them to all nations! In like manner, all Christians are witnesses for Christ; they are the evidences of his mercy and his love; and they should live so that others might also be brought to see and love the Saviour. 50. To Bethany. Bethany was on the eastern declivity of the mount of Olives, from which our Lord was taken up to heaven, Acts i. 12. Bethany was a favoured place. It was the abode of Martha, and Mary, and Lazarus, and our Saviour delighted to be there. From this place also he ascended to his Father and our Father, and to his God and our God. 52. They worshipped him. The word worship does not always denote religious homage. But here it is to be remarked, 1st. That they offered this worship to an absent Saviour. It was after he had left them, and had vanished out of their sight. It was therefore an act of religion; and was the first religious homage that was paid to Jesus after he had left the world. 2nd. If they worshipped an absent Saviour—a Saviour unseen by the bodily eye—it is right for us to do it; it was an example which we may and should follow. If worship may be rendered to Jesus, he is divine: see Ex. xx. 4, 5. 53. Were continually in the temple. Until the day of pentecost; that is, about ten days after: see Acts ii. Praising and blessing God. Chiefly for the full proof that the Messiah had come, had redeemed them, and had ascended to heaven. 'Thus the days of their mourning were ended: they were filled with happiness at the assurance of redemption; and expressed, what every Christian should feel, fulness of joy at the glad tidings that a Saviour has died, and risen, and ascended to God; and an earnest desire to pour forth in the sanctuary prayers and thanksgivings to the God of grace for his mercy to a lost and ruined world.'

RUINS OF THE CITIES OF THE COASTS OF TYRE AND SIDON.—Ch. vi. 17.

x. 29. The lawyer wished to justify himself—i.e., he wished to make it appear that he had not asked a trivial or captious question. He may also have desired, by putting a second question, to induce Jesus to give an interpretation of the word "neighbour" which was not in accordance with rabbinical explanations. These, it is said, were so limited as to exclude both Samaritans and Gentiles from the list of neighbours.

xxi. 18. We do not infer from this that Christians would not suffer even unto death, because it is expressly said they would (verse 16). The disciples were "in deaths often," but they never "perished." Christ, the Saviour of his people, will save them completely and eternally.

xxiii. 5. "Jewry" is Judea, where our Lord concluded the earthly ministry which he had commenced in Galilee.

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. JOHN,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is not material to inquire when and where this Gospel was written; we are sure it was given by inspiration of God, to John the brother of James, one of the twelve apostles, distinguished by the honourable character of "that disciple whom Jesus loved;" one of the first three of the worthies of the Son of David, whom he took to be the witnesses of his retirements, particularly of his transfiguration and agony. The ancients tell us that John lived longest of all the twelve apostles, and was the only one of them that died a natural death,—all the rest suffering martyrdom; and some of them say he wrote this Gospel at Ephesus, at the request of the ministers of the several churches of Asia, in opposition to the heresy of Cerinthus, and the Ebionites, who held that our Lord was a mere man. It seems most probable that he wrote it before his banishment into the isle of Patmos, for there he wrote his Apocalypse, the close of which seems designed for the closing up of the Canon of Scripture; and if so, this Gospel was not written after. I cannot therefore give credit to those latter fathers who say he wrote it in his banishment, or after his return from it, many years after the destruction of Jerusalem; when he was ninety years old, saith one of them; when he was an hundred, saith another of them. However, it is clear he wrote last of the four evangelists; and comparing his Gospel with theirs, we may observe— I. That he relates what they had omitted; he brings up the rear, and his Gospel is as the rearward, or gathering host; it gleans up what they had passed by. Thus there was a later collection of Solomon's wise sayings, Pr. xxv. 1; and yet far short of what he delivered, 1 Kin. iv. 32. II. That he gives us more of the mystery of that which the other evangelists gave us only the history of. It was necessary that the matters of fact should be first settled, which was done in their declarations of those things which Jesus began both to do and teach, Lu. i. 1; Acts i. 1; but that being done out of the mouth of two or three witnesses, John goes on to perfection, Heb. vi. 1; not laying again the foundation, but building upon it; leading us more within the veil. Some of the ancients observe that the other evangelists wrote more of the τα σωματικά,—"the bodily things of Christ;" but John writes of the τα πνευματικά,—"the spiritual things of the Gospel,"—the life and soul of it: therefore some have called this Gospel the key of the evangelists. Here it is that a door is opened in heaven, and the first voice we hear is, "Come up hither; come up higher;" some of the ancients, that supposed the four living creatures in John's vision to represent the four evangelists, make John himself to be the flying eagle; so high doth he soar, and so clearly doth he see into divine and heavenly things.

A.D. 30.

CHAPTER I.

The scope and design of this chapter is to confirm our faith in Christ as the eternal Son of God, and the true Messiah and Saviour of the world, that we may be brought to receive him, and rely upon him, as our prophet, priest, and king, and to give up ourselves to be ruled, and taught, and saved by him. In order to this, we have here, I. An account given of him by the inspired penman himself, fairly laying down in the beginning what he designed his whole book should be the proof of, ver. 1—5; and again, ver. 10—14; and again, ver. 16—18. II. The testimony of John Baptist concerning him, ver. 6—9; and again, ver. 15; but most fully and particularly, ver. 19—37. III. His own manifestation of himself to Andrew and Peter, ver. 38—42, to Philip and Nathanael, ver. 43—51.

IN the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. 2 The same was in the beginning with God. 3 All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made. 4 In him was life; and the life was the light of men. 5 And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not.

Austin saith (De Civ. Dei, lib. x. c. 29.) that his friend Simplicianus told him he had heard a Platonic philosopher say that these first verses of St. John's Gospel were worthy to be written in letters of gold. The learned Francis Junius, in the account he gives of his own life, tells how he was in his youth infected with loose notions in religion, and, by the grace of God, was wonderfully recovered by reading accidentally these verses in a Bible which his father had designedly laid in his way. He saith that he observed such a Divinity in the argument, such an authority and majesty in the style, that his flesh trembled, and he was struck with such an amazement, that for a whole day he scarce knew where he was, or what he did; and from thence he dates the beginning of his being religious. Let us inquire what there is in those strong lines. The evangelist here lays down the great truth he is to prove, that Jesus Christ is God, one with the Father. Observe,

A.D. 30.

First. Who he speaks of. "The Word," ὁ Λόγος. This is an idiom peculiar to John's writings; see 1 Jno. i. 1; v. 7; Rev. xix. 13; yet some think Christ is meant by "the Word," Acts xx. 32; Heb. iv. 12; Lu. i. 2. The Chaldee paraphrase very frequently calls the Messiah (Memra) the Word of Jehovah, and speaks of many things in the Old Testament, said to be done by the Lord, as done by that Word of the Lord; even the vulgar Jews were taught that the Word of God was the same with God. The evangelist, in the close of his discourse, ver. 18, plainly tells us why he calls Christ the Word, because he is "the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, and has declared him." Word is twofold: λόγος ἐνδιδάκτωρ, word conceived; and λόγος προφορικός, word uttered. The λόγος ὁ ἔσω and ὁ ἔξω, ratio and oratio,—"intelligence" and "utterance."

1. There is the word conceived, that is, thought, which is the first and only immediate product and conception of the soul, all the operations of which are performed by thought, and it is one with the soul. And thus the second person in the Trinity is fitly called the Word; for he is "the first begotten of the Father;" that eternal and essential Wisdom which "the Lord possessed," as the soul doth its thought, "in the beginning of his way," Pr. viii. 22. There is nothing we are more sure of than that we think, yet nothing we are more in the dark about than how we think. Who can declare the generation of thought in the soul? Surely then the generations and births of the eternal Mind may well be allowed to be great mysteries of godliness, the bottom of which we cannot fathom, while yet we adore the depth.

2. There is the word uttered, and that is speech, the chief and most natural indication of the mind. And thus Christ is the Word, for by him God has in these last days spoken to us, Heb. i. 1, and has directed us to hear him, Mat. xvii. 5. He has made known God's mind to us, as a man's word or speech makes known his thoughts, as far as he pleaseth, and no farther. Christ is called that wonderful Speaker, Dan. viii. 13; the speaker of things hidden and strange. He is the Word speaking from God to us, and to God for us. John Baptist was the voice, but Christ the Word; being the Word, he is the Truth, the Amen, the faithful Witness of the mind of God.

Secondly. What he saith of him, enough to prove beyond contradiction that he is God. He asserts,

1. His existence in the beginning: "In the beginning was the Word." This speaks his existence, not only before his incarnation, but before all time. The beginning of time, in which all creatures were produced and brought into being, found this eternal Word in being. The world was from the beginning, but the Word was in the beginning. Eternity is usually expressed by being "before the foundation of the world." The eternity of God is so described, Ps. xc. 2. "Before the mountains were brought forth;" so Pr. viii. 23. The Word had a being before the world had a beginning. He that was in the beginning never begun, and therefore ever was, ἀρχόντος. So Nonnus.

2. His co-existence with the Father: "the Word was with God, and the Word was God." Let none say, that when we invite them to Christ, we would draw them from God; for Christ is with God, and is God. It is repeated again, ver. 2: the same, the very same, that we believe in and preach, was in the beginning with God, that is, he was so from eternity. In the beginning the world was from God, as it was created by him; but the Word was with God, as ever

Introductory Note.—The authorship of this Gospel has never been seriously questioned till recent times, and the preponderance of authorities is still largely in favour of its having been written by St. John. It was probably written at Ephesus, about the year A.D. 78, i.e., a few years after the destruction of Jerusalem, and some time before the apostle's banishment to Patmos. This exile is supposed to have taken place in the reign of Domitian, who condemned him to labour in the mines, for the word of the Lord and the testimony of Jesus Christ (Rev. i. 9). He is believed to have returned from Patmos in the reign of Nerva, and to have taken up his residence at Ephesus, where he died at an advanced age. In early life he was distinguished, with James his brother, for energy, zeal, and even impetuosity of character, hence the name "Boanerges" given them by Christ (Mark iii. 17). For examples of this feature of their character see Luke ix. 49, 54; Matt. xx. 20—23. The gospels represent him as sharing in a special manner the friendship and confidence of our Lord. He with him. "The Word was with God," 1st. In respect of essence and substance; for "the Word was God;" a distinct person or subsistence, for he was with God; and yet the same in substance, for he was God, Heb. i. 3. 2nd. In respect of complacency and felicity; there was a glory and happiness which Christ had with God before the world was, Jno. xvii. 5; the Son infinitely happy in the enjoyment of his Father's bosom, and no less the Father's delight, the Son of his love, Pr. viii. 30. 3rd. In respect of counsel and design. The mystery of man's redemption, by this Word incarnate, was hid in God (1 Pet. iii. 18) was himself from eternity with God; so that this grand affair of man's reconciliation to God was concerted between the Father and Son from eternity, and they understand one another perfectly well in it, Zec. vi. 13; Mat. xi. 27. He was by him as one brought up with him for this service, Pr. viii. 30. He was with God, and therefore is said to come forth from the Father.

3. His agency in making the world, ver. 3. This is here, 1st. Expressly asserted, "all things were made by him." He was with God, not only so as to be acquainted with the Divine counsels from eternity, but to be active in the Divine operations in the beginning of time; "then was I by him," Pr. viii. 30. God made the world by a word, Ps. xxxiii. 6, and as a co-ordinate agent, God made him, not as a subordinate instrument, but as a co-ordinate agent, God made the world, Heb. i. 2; not as the workman cuts by his axe, but as the body sees by the eye. 2nd. The contrary is denied: "without him was not any thing made that was made," from the highest angel to the meanest worm; God the Father did nothing without him in that work. Now, First, This proves that he is God; for he that built all things is God, Heb. iii. 4. The God of Israel often proved himself to be God with this, that he made all things, Isa. xl. 12, 28; xlii. 5; and see Jer. x. 11, 12. Secondly, This proves the excellency of the Christian religion; the author and founder of it is the same who was the author and founder of the world. How excellent must that constitution needs be, which derives its institution from him who is the Fountain of all excellency. When we worship Christ we worship him to whom the patriarchs gave honour, as the Creator of the world, and on whom all creatures depend. Thirdly, This shews how well qualified he was for the work of our redemption and salvation; help was laid upon one that was mighty indeed, for it was laid upon him that made all things; and he is appointed the author of our bliss that was the author of our being.

4. The original of life and light that is in him, ver. 4. "In him was life." This farther proves that he is God, and every way qualified for his undertaking; for, 1st. He has "life in himself," not only the true God, but the living God. God is life; he swears by himself, when he saith, "As I live." 2nd. All living creatures have their life in him; not only all the matter of the creation was made by him, but all the life too that is in the creation is derived from him, and supported by him. It was the Word of God that produced the moving creatures having life, Gen. i. 20; Acts xvii. 25. He is that Word by which man lives more than by bread, Mat. iv. 4. 3rd. Reasonable creatures have their light from him; that life, which is "the light of men," comes from him. Life in man is something greater and nobler than it is in other creatures; it is rational, and not merely animal; when man became a living soul, his life was light, his capacities such as distinguished him from, and dignified him above, the beasts that perish. The "spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord," and it was the eternal Word that lighted this candle. The light of reason, as well as the life of sense, is derived from him, and depends upon him. This proves him fit to undertake our salvation; for life and light, spiritual and eternal life and light, are the two great things that fallen man, who lies so much under the power of death and darkness, has need of. From whom may we better expect the light of Divine revelation than from Him who gave us the light of human reason? And if, when God gave us natural life, that life was in his Son, how readily should we receive the gospel record, that he hath given us eternal life, and that life too is in his Son.

5. The manifestation of him to the children of men. It might be objected if this eternal Word was all in all thus in the creation of the world, whence is it that he has been so little taken notice of and regarded? To this he answers, ver. 5, "The Light shines, but the darkness comprehends it not." Observe,

1st. The discovery of the eternal Word to the lapsed world, even before he was manifested in the flesh; "the Light shineth in darkness." Light is self-evidencing, and will make itself known: this Light, from whence the light of men comes, hath shined, and doth shine. First, The eternal Word, as God, shines in the darkness of natural conscience. Though men, by the fall, are become darkness, yet that which may be known of God is manifested in them; see Rom. i. 19. The light of nature is this Light shining in darkness. Something of the power of the Divine Word, both as creating and as commanding, all mankind has an innate sense of; were it not for that, this earth would be a hell, a place of utter darkness; blessed be God, it is not so yet. Secondly, The eternal Word, as Mediator, shone in the darkness of the Old Testament types and figures, and the prophecies and promises which were of the Messiah, from the beginning. He that had commanded the light of this world to shine out of darkness, was himself long a light shining in darkness; there was a veil upon this light, 2 Cor. iii. 13.

2nd. The disability of the degenerate world to receive this discovery: "the darkness comprehended it not;" the most of men received the grace of God in these discoveries in vain. First, The world of mankind comprehended not the natural light that was in their understandings, "but became vain in their imaginations" concerning the eternal God, and the eternal Word, Rom. i. 21, 27. The darkness of error and sin overpowered and quite eclipsed this light. God spoke once, yea twice, but man perceived it not, Job xxxiii. 14. Secondly, The Jews, that had the light of the Old Testament, yet comprehended not Christ in his heart. As there was a veil upon Moses' face, so there was upon the people's hearts. In the darkness of the types and shadows the Light shone; but such was the darkness of their understandings that they could not see it. It was therefore requisite that Christ should come, both to rectify the errors of the Gentile world, and to improve the truths of the Jewish church.

6 There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. 7 The same came for a witness, to bear witness of the Light, that all men through him might believe. 8 He was not that Light, but was sent to bear witness of that Light. 9 That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. 10 He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not. 11 He came unto his own, and his own received him not. 12 But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name: 13 Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. 14 And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth.

The evangelist designs to bring in John Baptist, bearing an honourable testimony to Jesus Christ. Now in these verses, before he doth that,

First. He gives us some account of this witness he is about to produce. His name is John, which signifies gracious; his conversation was austere, but he was not the less gracious. Now,

1. We are here told concerning him, in general, that he was a man sent of God. The evangelist had said concerning Jesus Christ, that he was with God, and that he was God; but here concerning John, that he was a man, a mere man. God is pleased to speak to us by men like ourselves. John was a great man, but he was a man, a son of man; he was sent from God, he was God's messenger; so he is called, Mal. iii. 1. God gave him both his mission and his message, both his credentials and his instructions. John wrought no miracle, nor do we find that he had visions and revelations; but the strictness and purity of his life and doctrine, and the direct tendency of both to reform the world, and to revive the interests of God's kingdom among men, were plain indications that he was sent of God.

2. We are here told what his office and business was; ver. 7, "the same came for a witness," an eye-witness, a leading witness. He came εὐαγγελιστὴς,—"for a testimony." The legal institutions had been long a testimony for God in the Jewish church; by them revealed religion was kept up; hence we read of the "tabernacle of the testimony," "the ark of the testimony," "the law and the testimony;" but now Divine revelation is to be turned into another channel; now the testimony of Christ is the testimony of God, 1 Cor. i. 6; and ii. 1. Among the Gentiles God indeed had "not left himself without witness," Acts xv. 17; but the Redeemer had no testimonies borne him among them. There was a profound silence concerning him till John Baptist came for a witness to him. Now observe,

1st. The matter of his testimony; he came "to bear witness of the Light." Light is a thing which witnesseth for itself, and carries its own evidence along with it. But to those who shut their eyes against the light, it is necessary there should be those that bear witness to it. Christ's light needs not man's testimony; but the world's darkness doth. John was like the night watchman that goes round the town proclaiming the approach of the morning light to those that have closed their eyes, and are not willing themselves to observe it; or like that watchman that was set to tell those who asked, "What of the night?" "The morning comes; and if ye will enquire, enquire ye," Isa. xxi. 11, 12. He was sent of God to tell the world that the long-looked-for Messiah was now come, who should be "a Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel;" and that dispensation at hand which would bring life and immortality to light.

2nd. The design of his testimony; "that all men through him might believe;" not in him, but in Christ; whose way he was sent to prepare. He taught men to look through him, and pass through him, to Christ; through the doctrine of repentance for sin, to that of faith in Christ. He prepared men for the reception and entertainment of Christ and his Gospel, by awakening them to a sight and sense of sin; and their eyes being thereby opened, they might be ready to admit those beams of Divine light which in the person and doctrine of the Messiah were now ready to shine in their faces. If they would but receive this witness of man, they would soon find that the witness of God was greater, 1 Jno. v. 9; see ch. x. 41. Observe, It was designed that all men through him might believe, excluding none from the kind and beneficial influences of his ministry that did not exclude themselves, as multitudes did, who rejected the counsel of God against themselves, and so received the grace of God in vain.

3. We are here cautioned not to mistake him for the Light, who only came to bear witness to it; ver. 8, "he was not that Light," that was expected and promised, but only was sent to bear witness of that great and ruling Light. He was a star, like that which guided the wise men to Christ; a morning star, but he was not the sun; not the bridegroom, but a friend of the bridegroom; not the prince, but his harbinger. There were those who rested in John's baptism, and looked no farther, as those Ephesians, Acts xix. 3; to rectify whose mistake, the evangelist here, when he speaks very honourably of him, yet shews that he must veil to Christ. He was great, as the prophet of the Highest, but not the Highest himself. Note, We must take heed of overvaluing ministers, as well as of undervaluing them; they are not our lords, nor have they dominion over our faith; but ministers, by whom we believe; stewards of our Lord's house. We must not give up ourselves by an implicit faith to their conduct, for they are not that Light; but we must attend to, and receive their testimony, for they are sent "to bear witness of that Light;" so then let us esteem of them, and not otherwise. Had John pretended to be that Light, he had not been so much as a faithful witness of that Light. Those who usurp the honour of Christ, forfeit the honour of being the servants of Christ: yet John was very serviceable as a witness to the Light, though he was not that Light. Those may be of great use to us who yet shine with a borrowed light.

Secondly. Before he goes on with John's testimony, he returns to give us a farther account of this Jesus, to whom John bore record. Having shewed in the beginning of the chapter the glories of his Godhead, he here comes to shew the graces of his incarnation, and his favours to man as Mediator.

1. Christ was the true Light, ver. 9; not as if John Baptist were a false light, but in comparison with Christ he was a very small light; Christ is that great Light, that deserves to be called so. Other lights are but figuratively and equivocally called so; Christ is the true Light. The fountain of all knowledge and of all comfort must needs be the true Light. He is the true Light, and for the proof of it he doth not refer us to the emanations of his glory in the invisible world, the beams with which he enlightens that, but to those rays of his light which are darted downwards, and with which this dark world of ours is enlightened. But how doth Christ "lighten every man that comes into the world?"

1st. By his creating power, he lightens every man with the light of reason; that life which is the light of men is from him; all the discoveries and directions of reason, all the comfort it gives us, and all the beauty it puts upon us, is from Christ.

is styled the disciple whom Jesus loved; and, together with Peter and James, was admitted to witness the higher manifestations of Christ's glory and suffering (Mark ix. 2; Matt. xxvi. 37); and to him the dying Saviour entrusted the care of his mother (John xix. 25-27). His constant association with Peter appears to indicate a warm friendship between them (Luke v. 10, xxii. 8; John xviii. 16, xxi. 20; Acts iii. 1, viii. 14).

i. 1. This opening may be compared with that of Genesis. The "Word;" this name for Christ is characteristic of St. John. The term is used in the Old Testament (Psa. xxxiii. 6), a kindred expression is found in Prov. viii., and is truly applicable to Him in whom God has revealed himself to us (John i. 18, xiv. 9), and through whom he has spoken to us (Heb. i. 2). "Was with God"—observe distinctness of person (John i. 18, xvii. 5); "was God"—unity of substance (John x. 30).

i. 4. "Life," "light;" perhaps directed against errors of those

2nd. By the publication of his Gospel to all nations, he doth in effect lighten every man. John Baptist was a light, but he enlightened only Jerusalem and Judaea; and the region round about Jordan like a candle that enlightens one room; but Christ is the true Light, for he is "a Light to lighten the Gentiles." His everlasting Gospel is to be preached to every nation and language, Rev. xiv. 6; like the sun which lightens every man that will open his eyes and receive its light, Ps. xix. 6; to which the preaching of the Gospel is compared, Rom. x. 18. Divine revelation is not now to be confined, as it had been, to one people, but to be diffused to all people, Mat. v. 15.

3rd. By the operation of his Spirit and grace he lighteth all those that are enlightened to salvation; and those that are not enlightened by him perish in darkness. "The light of the knowledge of the glory of God" is said to be "in the face of Jesus Christ;" and is compared with that light which was at the beginning commanded to shine out of darkness, and which lighteth every man that comes into the world. Whatever light any man has, he is indebted to Christ for it, whether it be natural or supernatural.

II. Christ was in the world, ver. 10. He was in the world as the essential Word before his incarnation, upholding all things; but this speaks of his being in the world when he took our nature upon him, and dwelt among us; see ch. xvi. 28, "I am come into the world." The Son of the Highest was here in this lower world; that Light in this dark world; that Holy Thing in this sinful, polluted world. He left a world of bliss and glory, and was here in this melancholy, miserable world. He undertook to reconcile the world to God, and therefore was in the world to treat about it, and settle that affair; to satisfy God's justice for the world, and discover God's favour to the world. He was in the world, but not of it, and speaks with an air of triumph, when he can say, Now I am no more in it, ch. xvii. 11. The greatest honour that ever was put upon this world, which is so mean and inconsiderable a part of the universe, was, that the Son of God was once in the world; and as it should engage our affections to things above, that there Christ is, so it should reconcile us to our present abode in this world, that once Christ was here. He was in the world for a while, but it is spoken of as a thing past; and so it will be said of us shortly, we were in the world. Oh, that when we are here no more, we may be where Christ is. Now observe here,

1st. What reason Christ had to expect the most affectionate and respectful welcome possible into this world, for "the world was made by him;" therefore he came to save a lost world, because it was a world of his own making. Why should not he concern himself to revive the light that was of his own kindling, to restore a life of his own infusing, and to renew the image that was originally of his own impressing? The world was made by him, and therefore ought to do him homage.

2nd. What cold entertainment he met with notwithstanding; "the world knew him not." The great Maker, Ruler, and Redeemer of the world was in it, and few or none of the inhabitants of the world were aware of it: "the ox knows his owner," but the more brutish world did not; they did not own him, did not bid him welcome, because they did not know him; and they did not know him, because he did not make himself known in that way that they expected, in external glory and majesty. His kingdom came not with observation, because it was to be a kingdom of trial and probation. When he shall come as a judge the world shall know him.

III. "He came unto his own," ver. 11; not only to the world, which was his own, but to the people of Israel, that were peculiarly his own above all people; of them he came, among them he lived, and to them he was first sent. The Jews were at this time a mean, despicable people; the crown was fallen from their head; yet in remembrance of the ancient covenant, as bad as they were, and as poor as they were, Christ was not ashamed to look upon them as his own: αὐτοῦ, "his own things," not τοῦ ἰδίου, "his own persons," as true believers are called, ch. xiii. 1. The Jews were his, as a man's house, and lands, and goods are his, which he useth and possesseth; but believers are his, as a man's wife and children are his own, which he loves and enjoys. He came to his own, to seek and save them, because they were his own. He was sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; for it was he whose own the sheep were. Now observe,

1st. That the generality rejected him; "his own received him not." He had reason to expect that those who were his own should have bidden him welcome, considering how great the obligations were which they lay under to him; and how fair the opportunities were which they had of coming to the knowledge of him. They had the oracles of God, which told them beforehand when and where to expect him, and of what tribe and family he should arise. He came among them himself, introduced with signs and wonders, and himself the greatest; and therefore it is not said of them, as it was of the world, ver. 10, that "they knew him not;" but his own, though they could not but know him yet "they received him not;" did not receive his doctrine, did not welcome him as the Messiah, but fortified themselves against him. The chief priests, that were in a particular manner his own, for the Levites were God's tribe, were ring-leaders in this contempt put upon him. Now this was very unjust, because they were his own, and therefore he might command their respects; and it was very unkind and ungrateful, because he came to them to seek and save them, and so court their respects. Note, Many who in profession are Christ's own, yet do not receive him, because they will not part with their sins, nor have him to reign over them.

2nd. That yet there was a remnant who owned him, and were faithful to him. Though his own received him not, yet there were those that received him; ver. 12, "but as many as received him;" though Israel were not gathered, yet Christ was glorious. Though the body of that nation persisted and perished in unbelief, yet there were many of them that were wrought upon to submit to Christ, and many more that were not of that fold. Observe here,

First. The true Christian's description and property: and that is, that he receives Christ, and believes on his name; the latter explains the former. Note, 1st. To be a Christian indeed, is to believe on Christ's name; it is to assent to the Gospel discovery, and consent to the Gospel proposal concerning him. His name is the Word of God; the King of kings; the Lord our Righteousness; Jesus, a Saviour. Now, to believe on his name, is to acknowledge that he is what these great names speak him, and to acquiesce in it that he be so to us. 2nd. Believing in Christ's name, is receiving him as a gift from God. We must receive his doctrine as true and good; receive his law as just and holy; receive his offers as kind and advantageous; and we must receive the image of his grace, and impressions of his love, as the governing principle of our affections and actions.

Secondly. The true Christian's dignity and privilege are twofold: 1st. The privilege of adoption, which takes them into the number of God's children; "to them gave he power to become the sons of God." Hitherto the adoption pertained to the Jews only, "Israel is my son, my firstborn;" but now, by faith in Christ, Gentiles are the children of God, Gal. iii. 26; they have power, ἐξουσίαν, "authority;" for no man taketh this power to himself, but who is authorized by the Gospel charter: to them gave he a right; to them gave he this pre-eminence; this power have all the saints. Note, First. It is the unspeakable privilege of all good Christians that they are become the children of God. They were by nature children of wrath; children of this world. If they be the children of God, they become so, are made so, Fiunt non nascuntur Christiani.—"Persons are not born Christians, but made so."—Tertullian. "Behold, what manner of love" is this, 1 Jno. iii. 1. God calls them his children, they call him Father, and are entitled to all the privileges of children; those of their way, and those of their home. Secondly. The privilege of adoption is entirely owing to Jesus Christ; he gave this power to them that believe on his name. God is his Father, and so ours; and it is by virtue of our espousals to him, and union with him, that we stand related to God as a Father. It was in Christ that we were predestinated to the adoption; from him we receive both the character and the spirit of adoption, and he is "the firstborn among many brethren." The Son of God became a son of man, that the sons and daughters of men might become the sons and daughters of God Almighty.

2nd. The privilege of regeneration; ver. 13, "which were born." Note, All the children of God are born again; all that are adopted are regenerated: this real change evermore attends that relative one. Wherever God confers the dignity of children, he creates the nature and disposition of children; men cannot do so when they adopt. Now here we have an account of the original of this new birth. First. Negatively: 1. It is not propagated by natural generation from our parents; it is "not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh," nor "of corruptible seed." 1 Pet. i. 23. Man, is called flesh and blood, because thence he has his original; but we do not become the children of God, as we become the children of our natural parents. Note, Grace doth not run in a blood, as corruption doth. Man, polluted, "begat a son in his own likeness," Gen. v. 3; but man, sanctified and renewed, doth not beget a son in that likeness. The Jews gloried much in their parentage, and the noble blood that ran in their veins; "we are Abraham's seed," and therefore to them "pertained the adoption," because they were born of that blood; but this New Testament adoption is not founded in any such natural relation. 2. It is not produced by the natural power of our own will. As it is "not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh," so neither is it of the will of man, that labours under a moral impotency of determining itself to that which is good; so that the principles of the Divine life are not of our own planting, it is the grace of God that makes us willing to be his. Nor can human laws or writings prevail to sanctify and regenerate a soul; if they could, the new birth would be by the will of man. But, Secondly. Positively: It is of God. This new birth is owing to the Word of God, as the means, 1 Pet. i. 23, and to the Spirit of God, as the great and sole author. True believers are born of God, 1 Jno. iii. 9; and v. 1: and this is necessary to their adoption; for we cannot expect the love of God if we have not something of his likeness, nor claim the privileges of adoption if we be not under the power of regeneration.

IV. "The Word was made flesh," ver. 14. This expresseth Christ's incarnation more closely than those before. By his Divine presence he always was in the world, and by his prophets he came to his own; but now the fullness of time was come, he was sent forth after another manner, "made of a woman," Gal. iv. 4; God manifested in the flesh, according to the faith and hope of holy Job, Job xix. 26; "yet in my flesh shall I see God." Observe here,

1st. The human nature of Christ with which he was veiled; and that expressed two ways:

First. "The Word was made flesh;" "Forasmuch as the children" who were to become the sons of God, "were partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same," Heb. ii. 14. The Socinians agree that Christ is both God and man; but they say he was man, and was made God, as Moses, Ex. vii. 1; directly contrary to John here, who saith, ὁ λόγος ἦν, "he was God" but, καὶ ἐγένετο, "he was made flesh;" compare ver. 1 with this. This speaks not only that he was really and truly man, but that he subjected himself to the miseries and calamities of the human nature. He was made flesh, the meanest part of man; flesh speaks man weak, and he was crucified through weakness, 2 Cor. xiii. 4; flesh speaks man mortal and dying, Ps. lxxviii. 39; and Christ was put to death in the flesh, 1 Pet. iii. 18. Nay, flesh speaks man tainted with sin, Gen. vi. 3; and Christ, though he was perfectly holy and harmless, yet appeared "in the likeness of sinful flesh," Rom. viii. 3, "and was made sin for us," 2 Cor. v. 6. When Adam had sinned, God said to him, "Dust thou art," not only because made out of the dust, but because by sin he was sunk into dust: his fall did, συνμαρτυροῦν τῇ ψυχῇ, "turn him as it were all into body, made him earthy: therefore he said that was made a curse for us, was made flesh, and condemned sin in the flesh," Rom. viii. 3. Wonder at this, that the eternal Word should be made flesh, when flesh was come into such an ill name; that He who made all things should himself be made flesh, one of the meanest things, and submit to that from which he was at the greatest distance. The voice that ushered in the Gospel cried, "All flesh is grass," Isa. xl. 1, to make the Redeemer's love the more wonderful, who to redeem and save us was made flesh, and withered as grass; but the Word of the Lord, who was made flesh, endures for ever; when made flesh, he ceased not to be the Word of God.

Secondly. He "dwelt among us," here in this lower world. Having taken upon him the nature of man, he put himself into the place and condition of other men. The Word might have been made flesh, and dwelt among the angels; but having taken a body of the same mould with us, in it he came and resided in the same world with us. He "dwelt among us," us worms of the earth; us, that he had no need of; us, that he got nothing by; us, that were corrupt, and depraved, and revolted from God. The Lord God came and dwelt even among the rebellious, Ps. lxxviii. 18; he that had dwelt among angels, those noble and excellent beings, came and dwelt among us, that are a generation of vipers; us sinners, which was worse to him than David's dwelling in Mesech and Kedar, or Ezekiel's dwelling among scorpions, or the church of Pergamos dwelling where Satan's seat is. When we look upon the upper world, the world of spirits, how mean and contemptible doth this flesh, this body appear, which we carry about with us, and this world in which our lot is cast; and how hard is it to a contemplative mind to be reconciled to them. But that the eternal Word was made flesh, was clothed with a body as we are, and dwelt in this world as we do; this has put an honour upon them both, and should make us willing to abide in the flesh while God has any work for us to do; for Christ dwelt in this lower world, as bad as it is, till he had finished what he had to do there, ch. xvii. 4. He "dwelt among us," Jews, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, "He shall dwell in the tents of Shem," Gen. ix. 27; and see Zec. ii. 10. Though the Jews were unkind to him, yet he continued to dwell among them; though, as some of the ancient writers tell us, he was invited to better treatment by Abgarus, king of Edessa, yet he removed not to any other nation.

He "dwelt among us," He was in the world, not as a wayfaring man, that tarries but for a night, but he "dwelt among us," made a long residence; the original word is observable, κατασκηνώσας ἐν ἡμῖν, he dwelt among us, he dwelt "as in a tabernacle," which intimates, 1st. That he dwelt here in very mean circumstances, as shepherds that dwell in tents. He did not dwell among us as in a palace, but as in a tent; for he had not where to lay his head, and was always upon the remove. 2nd. That his state here was a military state; soldiers dwell in tents; he had long since proclaimed war with the seed of the serpent, and now he takes the field in person; sets up his standard, and who in early times made a distinction between life and light in the Godhead. On the contrary, St. John affirms both to be found in Christ. He has life (John v. 26) in himself: he imparts it to others. Connection between verses 3 and 4 is thus given by Olshausen: "All was made through him, for in him resides the all-producing, creative power." (Compare Psa. xxxvi. 9, where the same words are used with reference to God.) Thus the words, besides indicating the divinity of our Lord, are appropriately applied to him in his capacities of Creator, Sustainer, Teacher, and Saviour. (See John xv. 4, 5; Heb. i. 3; Eph. v. 13, 14; 1 John i. 1-5, v. 11, 12.)

i. 6. "There was a man," &c.: observe the contrast. John the Baptist is designated "man" simply; Christ, the "word," John "became" and "was sent;" Christ "was" &c., "pre-existed."

i. 10. St. John is not speaking merely of the acts of Christ during the days of his flesh, but, as Olshausen says, "He (the Light) had already been in the world, but had not been acknowledged by it."

pitcheth his tent to prosecute this war. 3rd. That his stay among us was not to be perpetual. He dwelt here as in a tent, not as at home. The patriarchs, by dwelling in tabernacles, "confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on earth," and sought the better country; and so did Christ, leaving us an example, Heb. xiii. 13, 14. 4th. That as of old God dwelt in the tabernacle of Moses, by the Shechinah between the cherubim, so now he dwells in the human nature of Christ; that is now the true Shechinah, the symbol of God's peculiar presence. And we are to make all our addresses to God through Christ, and from him to receive Divine oracles.

2nd. The beams of his Divine glory, that darted through this veil of flesh: "we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." The sun is still the fountain of light, though eclipsed or clouded; so Christ was still the brightness of his Father's glory, even then when he "dwelt among us," in this lower world. And how slightly soever the Jews thought of him, there were those that saw through the veil. Observe,

First. Who were the witnesses of this glory. We, his disciples and followers, that conversed most freely and familiarly with him; we among whom he dwelt. Other men discover their weaknesses to those that are most familiar with them, but it was not so with Christ; those that were most intimate with him saw most of his glory. As it was with his doctrine, the disciples knew the mysteries of it, while others had it under the veil of parables, so it was with his person, they saw the glory of his divinity, while others saw only the veil of his human nature. He manifested himself to them, and not unto the world. These witnesses were a competent number,—twelve of them,—a whole jury of witnesses: men of plainness and integrity, and far from any thing of design or intrigue.

Secondly. What evidence they had of it: We saw it. They had not their evidence by report, at second hand, but were themselves eye-witnesses of those proofs on which they built their testimony, that he was the Son of the living God. We saw it. The word signifies a fixed, abiding sight, such as gave them an opportunity of making their observations. This apostle himself explains this; what we declare unto you of the Word of life is what we have seen with our eyes, and what we have looked upon, 1 Jno. i. 1.

Thirdly. What the glory was; "the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father." The glory of the Word made flesh was such a glory as became the only begotten Son of God, and could not be the glory of any other. Note, 1st. Jesus Christ is the only begotten of the Father; believers are the children of God by the special favour of adoption, and the special grace of regeneration; they are in a sense ὑιοὶ θεοῦ, 'of a like nature,' 2 Pet. i. 4. and have the image of his perfections; but Christ is ὑιόμορφος, 'of the same nature,' and is the express image of his person, and the Son of God by an eternal generation. Angels are sons of God, but he never said to any of them, "This day have I begotten thee," Heb. i. 5. 2nd. He was evidently declared to be the only begotten of the Father, by that which was seen of his glory, when he dwelt among us. Though he was in the form of a servant in respect of outward circumstances, yet in respect of graces his form was as that of the fourth in the fiery furnace, like the Son of God. His Divine glory appeared in the holiness and heavenliness of his doctrine; in his miracles, which extorted from many this acknowledgment, that he was the Son of God; it appeared in the purity, and goodness, and beneficence of his whole conversation. God's goodness is his glory, and he went about doing good; he spoke and acted in every thing as an incarnate Deity. Perhaps the evangelist has a particular regard to the glory of his transfiguration, which he was an eye-witness of; see 2 Pet. i. 16-18. God's calling him his beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased, spoke him "the only begotten of the Father;" but the full proof of this was at his resurrection.

Fourthly. What advantage those he dwelt among had from this. He dwelt among them "full of grace and truth." In the old tabernacle, wherein God dwelt, was the law; in this, was grace; in that were types, in this was truth. The incarnate Word was every way qualified for his undertaking as Mediator, for he was full of grace and truth, the two great things that fallen man stands in need of; and this proved him to be the Son of God, as much as the Divine power and majesty that appeared in him. 1st. He has a fulness of grace and truth for himself; he had the Spirit without measure. He was full of grace, that is, fully acceptable to his Father, and therefore qualified to intercede for us; and full of truth, that is, fully apprised of those things he was to reveal, and therefore fit to instruct us. He had a fulness of knowledge and a fulness of compassion. 2nd. He has a fulness of grace and truth for us. He received that he might give; and God was well pleased in him, that he might be well pleased with us in him; and this was the truth of the legal types.

15 John bare witness of him, and cried, saying, This was he of whom I spake, He that cometh after me is preferred before me: for he was before me. 16 And of his fulness have all we received, and grace for grace. 17 For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. 18 No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him.

In these verses. First. The evangelist begins again to give us John Baptist's testimony concerning Christ, ver. 15. He had said, ver. 7, that he "came for a witness;" now here he tells us that he did accordingly bear witness. Here observe.

1. How he expressed his testimony; he cried, according to the prediction, that he should be "the voice of one crying." The Old Testament prophets cried aloud to shew people their sins, this New Testament prophet cried aloud to shew people their Saviour. This intimates, 1st. That it was an open, public testimony, proclaimed, that all manner of persons might take notice of it, for all are concerned in it. False teachers entice secretly, but wisdom publisheth her dictates in the chief places of concourse. 2nd. That he was free and hearty in bearing this testimony. He cried as one that was both well assured of, and well affected to, the truth he witnessed of. He that had leaped in his mother's womb for joy of Christ's approach, when newly conceived, doth now, with a like exultation of spirit, welcome his public appearance.

2. What his testimony was. He appeals to what he had said at the beginning of his ministry, when he had directed them to expect one that should come after him, whose forerunner he was, and never intended any other but to lead them to him, and to prepare his way. This he had given them notice of from the first. Note. It is very comfortable to a minister to have the testimony of his conscience for him, that he set out in his ministry with honest principles and sincere intentions, with a single eye to the glory and honour of Christ. Now what he had then said he applies to this Jesus whom he had lately baptized, and who was so remarkably owned from heaven: "This was he of whom I spake." John did not tell them there would shortly appear such a one among them, and then leave them to find him out; but in this he went beyond all the Old Testament prophets, that he particularly specified the person—"this was he;" that is the very man I told you of, and to him all I said is to be accommodated. Now what was it he said?

1st. He had given the preference to this Jesus: "He that comes after me," in the time of his birth and public appearance, that succeeds me in preaching and making disciples, yet "is preferred before me," is a more excellent person upon all accounts; as the prince or peer that comes after is preferred before the harbinger or gentleman-usher that makes way for him. Note, Jesus Christ, who was to be called "the Son of the Highest," Lu. i. 31. was preferred before John Baptist, who was to be called only "the prophet of the Highest," Lu. i. 76. John was a minister of the New Testament, but Christ was the Mediator of the New Testament. And observe, Though John was a great man, and had a great name and interest, yet he was forward to give the preference to Him to whom it belonged. Note, All the ministers of Christ must prefer him and his interest before themselves and all their own interests. They will make an ill account that seek their own things, not the things of Christ, Phil. ii. 21. He comes after me, and yet is preferred before me. Note, God dispenseth his gifts according to his good pleasure, and many times crosseth hands, as Jacob did, preferring the younger before the elder. Paul far outstripped those that were in Christ before him.

2nd. He here gives a good reason for it; "for he was before me;" ἡμεῖς ἔμελλεν ἔμελλεν, 'he was my first,' or, 'first to me;' he was my first cause, my original. The First is one of God's names, Isa. xlv. 6. He is before me, is my first. First, in respect of seniority; "he was before me," for he was before Abraham, Jno. viii. 58. Nay, he was before all things, Col. i. 17. I but of yesterday, he from eternity. It was but in those days that John Baptist came, Mat. iii. 1; but the goings forth of our Lord Jesus were of old, from everlasting, Mic. v. 2. This proves two natures in Christ; Christ, as man, came after John, as to his public appearance; Christ, as God, was before him; and how could he otherwise be before him but by an eternal existence? Secondly. In respect of supremacy, for he was my Prince; so some princes are called the first, παῖς αὐτοῦ: It is He for whose sake and service I am sent; he is my Master, I am his minister and messenger.

Secondly. He presently returns again to speak of Jesus Christ, and cannot go on with John Baptist's testimony till ver. 19. The 16th verse has a manifest connexion with ver. 14, where the incarnate Word was said to be "full of grace and truth." Now here he makes this not only the matter of our adoration, but of our thankfulness; because from that fulness of his "we all have received." He received gifts for men, Ps. lxxviii. 18. that he might give gifts to men, Eph. iv. 8. He was filled, that he might fill all in all, Eph. i. 23; might fill our treasures, Pr. vii. 21. He has a fountain of fulness overflowing. "We all have received;" all we apostles, so some; we have received the favour of this apostleship, that is grace; and a fitness for it, that is truth. Or rather, all we believers; many as received him, ver. 17, received from him. Note, All true believers receive from Christ's fulness; the best and greatest saints cannot live without him, the meanest and weakest may live by him. This excludes proud boasting; that we have nothing but we have received it; and silenceth perplexing fears, that we want nothing but we may receive it. Let us see what it is that we have received.

1. We have received "grace for grace." Our receivings by Christ are all summed up in this one word, grace; we have received καὶ χάριν, 'even grace,' so great a gift, so rich, so invaluable; we have received no less than grace; that is a gift to be spoken of with an emphasis. It is repeated, "grace for grace;" for to every stone in this building, as well as to the topstone, we must cry, Grace, grace. Observe.

1st. The blessing received: it is grace; the good will of God towards us, and the good work of God in us. God's good will works the good work, and then the good work qualifies us for farther tokens of his good will. As the cistern receives water from the fulness of the fountain, the branches sap from the fulness of the root, and the air light from the fulness of the sun, so we receive grace from the fulness of Christ.

2nd. The manner of its reception; "grace for grace," χάριν ὑπὲρ χάριτος. The phrase is singular, and interpreters put different senses upon it, each of which will be of use to illustrate the unsearchable riches of the grace of Christ. "Grace for grace" speaks,

First. The freeness of this grace; it is grace for grace' sake; so Grotius. We receive grace, not for our sakes, he it known to us, but "even so, Father, because it seemed good in thy sight." It is a "gift according to grace," Rom. xii. 6. It is grace to us for the sake of grace to Jesus Christ. God was well pleased in him, and is therefore well pleased with us in him, Eph. i. 6.

Secondly. The fulness of this grace. "Grace for grace" is abundance of grace; "grace upon grace," so Camero; "one grace heaped upon another;" as "skin for skin" is skin after skin, even all that a man has, Job ii. 4. It is a blessing poured out that there shall not be room to receive it, plenteous redemption. One grace a pledge of more grace. "Joseph, he will add." It is such a fulness as is called the fulness of God which we are filled with. We are not straitened in the grace of Christ if we be not straitened in our own bosoms.

Thirdly. The serviceableness of this grace. "Grace for grace" is grace for the promoting and advancing of grace; grace to be exercised by ourselves, gracious habits for gracious acts; grace to be ministered to others, gracious vouchers for gracious performances: grace is a talent to be traded with. The apostles received grace, Rom. i. 5, Eph. iii. 8. that they might communicate it, 1 Pet. iv. 16.

Fourthly. The substitution of New Testament grace in the room and stead of Old Testament grace; so Beza. And this sense is confirmed by what follows, ver. 17; for the Old Testament had grace in type, the New Testament has grace in truth. There was a grace under the Old Testament; the Gospel was preached then, Gal. iii. 8; but that grace is superseded, and we have gospel grace instead of it, a "glory which excelleth," 2 Cor. iii. 10. Discoveries of grace are now more clear, distributions of grace far more plentiful; this is grace instead of grace.

Fifthly. It speaks the augmentation and continuance of grace. "Grace for grace" is one grace to improve, confirm, and perfect another grace. We are changed into the Divine image, "from glory to glory," from one degree of glorious grace to another, 2 Cor. iii. 18. Those that have true grace have that for more grace, Jas. iv. 6; when God gives grace, he saith, Take this in part, for he which hath promised will perform.

Sixthly. It speaks the agreeableness and conformity of grace in the saints to the grace that is in Jesus Christ; so Mr. Clerk. "Grace for grace" is grace in us answering to grace in him, as the impression upon the wax answers the seal, line for line. The grace we receive from Christ "changeth us into the same

i. 11. "His own . . . his own:" the first is in the neuter, and signifies his own things, his own peculiar property—his own lands, city, temple, Messianic rights and possessions, even his own world. The second "his own" is in the masculine, and signifies his own people. We may thus see one difference between man and the rest of creation, viz., that he has the awful power of accepting or rejecting the light. Along with his higher capacity and intelligence is linked a greater responsibility. (Compare John xv. 4, where, after drawing a comparison between himself and the vine, he adds, "Abide in me.") See John viii. 40-47 for some of the causes of his rejection.

i. 12. "Power:" right, or authority (see Rev. xxii. 14). "To become:" observe the words. Jesus is the Son of God, he is never said to have become such (see Note on verse 6). "His name:" Hengstenberg remarks, "That Christ has a name indicates that he, like the Jehovah of the Old Testament, in distinction from the nameless gods of the heathen, has not come with empty pretenimage," 2 Cor. iii. 18, the image of the Son, Rom. viii. 29, "the image of the heavenly," 1 Cor. xv. 49.

2. We have received "grace and truth," ver. 17. He had said, ver. 14, that Christ was "full of grace and truth;" now here he saith, that by him grace and truth come to us. From Christ we receive grace; this is a string he delights to harp upon, he cannot go off from it. Two things he farther observes in this verse concerning this grace:

1st. Its preference above the law of Moses. "The law was given by Moses," and it was a glorious discovery, both of God's will concerning man and his good will to man; but the Gospel of Christ is a much clearer discovery, both of duty and happiness. That which was given by Moses was purely terrifying and threatening, and bound with penalties, a law which could not give life, which was given with abundance of terror, Heb. xii. 18. But that which is given by Jesus Christ is of another nature; it has all the beneficial uses of the law, but not the terror, for it is grace; grace teaching, Tit. ii. 11; grace reigning, Rom. v. 21. It is a law, but a remedial law. The endearments of love are the genius of the Gospel, not the affrightments of law and the curse.

2nd. Its connexion with truth; "grace and truth." In the Gospel we have the discovery of the greatest truths to be embraced by the understanding, as well as of the richest grace to be embraced by the will and affections. It is "a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation," that is, it is grace and truth. The offers of grace are sincere, and what we may venture our souls upon; they are made in earnest, for it is "grace and truth." It is "grace and truth" with reference to the law that was given by Moses; for it is, First. The performance of all the Old Testament promises. In the Old Testament we often find mercy and truth put together; that is, mercy according to promise; see Lu. i. 72; 1 Kin. viii. 56. Secondly. It is the substance of all the Old Testament types and shadows. Something of grace there was both in the ordinances that were instituted for Israel, and the providences that were concerning Israel; but they were only shadows of good things to come, even of that grace that is to be brought to us by "the revelation of Jesus Christ." He is the true paschal Lamb, the true scapegoat, the true manna, &c. They had grace in the picture, we have grace in the person, that is "grace and truth." "Grace and truth came," ἐγένετο, 'was made;' the same word that was used, ver. 3, concerning Christ's making all things. The law was only made known by Moses, but the being of this grace and truth, as well as the discovery of it, is owing to Jesus Christ; this was made by him, as the world at first was; and by him this "grace and truth" do consist.

3. Another thing we receive from Christ, is a clear revelation of God to us, ver. 18. He hath declared God to us, whom no man hath seen at any time. This was the grace and truth which came by Christ, the knowledge of God, and an acquaintance with him. Observe,

1st. The insufficiency of all other discoveries; "no man hath seen God at any time." This speaks, First. That the nature of God being spiritual, he is invisible to bodily eyes; he is a being "whom no man hath seen or can see," 1 Tim. vi. 16; we have therefore need to live by faith, by which we see Him that is invisible, Heb. xi. 27. Secondly. That the revelation which God made of himself in the Old Testament was very short and imperfect, in comparison with that which he has made by Christ; "no man hath seen God at any time," that is, what was seen and known of God before the incarnation of Christ was nothing to that which is now seen and known; life and immortality are now brought to a much clearer light than they were then. Thirdly. That none of the Old Testament prophets were so well qualified to make known the mind and will of God to the children of men as our Lord Jesus was, for none of them had "seen God at any time." Moses beheld the similitude of the Lord, Num. xii. 8, but was told he could not see his face, Ex. xxxiii. 20. But this recommends Christ's holy religion to us, that it was founded by one that had seen God, and knew more of his mind than any one else ever did; for he had seen him, which they never did.

2nd. The all-sufficiency of the gospel discovery, proved from its Author; "the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he has declared him." Observe here,

First. How fit he was to make this discovery, and every way qualified for it. He, and none but he, was "worthy to take the book and open the seals," Rev. v. 9. For, 1st. He is "the only begotten Son;" and who so likely to know the Father as the Son? or, in whom is the Father better known than in the Son? Mat. xi. 27. He is of the same nature with the Father; so that he who hath seen him hath seen the Father, ch. xiv. 9. The servant is not supposed to know so well what his lord doth as the son, ch. xv. 15. "Moses was faithful as a servant, but Christ as a Son." 2nd. He is "in the bosom of the Father." He had lain in his bosom from eternity; when he was here upon earth, yet still, as God, he was in the bosom of the Father, and thither he returned when he ascended. "In the bosom of the Father;" that is, First. In the bosom of his special love, dear to him, in whom he was well pleased, always his delight. All God's saints are in his hand, but his Son was in his bosom; one in nature and essence, and therefore in the highest degree one in love. Secondly. In the bosom of his secret counsels. As there was a mutual complacency, so there was a mutual consciousness between the Father and Son, Mat. xi. 27; none so fit as he to make known God, for none knew his mind so as he did. Our most secret counsels we are said to hide "in our bosom," — in petto; Christ was privy to the bosom counsels of the Father. The prophets sat down at his feet as scholars, Christ lay in his bosom as a friend: see Eph. iii. 11.

Secondly. How free he was in making this discovery; "he hath declared;" "him" is not in the original. He has declared that of God which no man had at any time seen or known; not only that which was hid of God, but that which was hid in God, Eph. iii. 9; ἐκκεκρυμμενο: it signifies a plain, clear, and full discovery; not by general and doubtful hints, but by particular explications. He that runs may now read the will of God, and the way of salvation. This is the grace, this the truth, that came by Jesus Christ.

19 And this is the record of John, when the Jews sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him, Who art thou? 20 And he confessed, and denied not; but confessed, I am not the Christ. 21 And they asked him, What then? Art thou Elias? And he saith, I am not. Art thou that prophet? And he answered, No. 22 Then said they unto him, Who art thou? that we may give an answer to them that sent us. What sayest thou of thyself? 23 He said, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esaias. 24 And they which were sent were of the Pharisees. 25 And they asked him, and said unto him, Why baptizest thou then, if thou be not that Christ, nor Elias, neither that prophet? 26 John answered them, saying, I baptize with water: but there standeth one among you, whom ye know not; 27 He it is, who coming after me is preferred before me, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose. 28 These things were done in Beth-abara beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing.

We have here the testimony of John, which he delivered to the messengers which were sent from Jerusalem to examine him. Observe here,

First. Who they were that sent to him, and who they were that were sent. 1. They that sent to him were the Jews at Jerusalem; the great Sanhedrim, or high commission court, which sat at Jerusalem, and was the representative of the Jewish church, who took cognizance of all matters relating to religion. One would think they that were the fountains of learning, and the guides of the church, should have by books understood the times so well as to know that the Messiah was at hand, and therefore should presently have known him that was his forerunner, and readily embraced him; but instead of that, they sent messengers to cross questions with him. Secular learning, honour, and power seldom dispose men's minds to the reception of Divine light.

2. They that were sent were, 1st. Priests and Levites, probably members of the council, men of learning, gravity, and authority. John Baptist was himself a priest of the seed of Aaron, and therefore it was not fit he should be examined by any but priests. It was prophesied concerning John's ministry, that it should purify the sons of Levi, Mal. iii. 3; and therefore they were jealous of him and his reformation. 2nd. They were of the Pharisees; proud self-judicialists, that thought they needed no repentance; and therefore could not bear one that made it his business to preach repentance.

Secondly. On what errand they were sent. It was to inquire concerning John and his baptism. They did not send for John up to them, probably because they feared the people; lest the people, where John was, should be provoked to rise; or, lest the people, where they were, should be brought acquainted with him; they thought it was good keeping him at a distance. They inquire concerning him, 1. To satisfy their curiosity; as the Athenians inquired concerning Paul's doctrine for the novelty of it, Acts xvii. 19, 20. Such a proud conceit they had of themselves, that the doctrine of repentance was to them strange doctrine. 2. It was to shew their authority; they thought they looked great, when they called him to account whom all men counted as a prophet, and arraigned him at their bar. 3. It was with a design to suppress him, and silence him, if they could find any colour of it, for they were jealous of his growing interest; and his ministry agreed neither with the Mosaic dispensation, which they had been long under, nor with the notions they had formed of the Messiah's kingdom.

Thirdly. What was the answer he gave them; and his account, both concerning himself and concerning his baptism, in both which he witnessed to Christ.

1. Concerning himself, and what he professed himself to be. They asked him, ὅτι εἶ, 'Thou, who art thou?' John's appearing in the world was surprising; he "was in the wilderness till the day of his shewing unto Israel." His spirit, his converse, his doctrine had something in them which commanded and gained respect; but he did not, as seducers do, give out himself to be some great one. He was more industrious to do good than to appear great; and therefore waived saying any thing of himself till he was legally interrogated. Those speak best for Christ that say least of themselves; whose own works praise them, not their own lips. He answers their interrogatory, 1st. Negatively. He was not that great one whom some took him to be. God's faithful witnesses stand more upon their guard against undue respects, than against unjust contempts. Paul writes as warmly against those that overvalued him, and said, "I am of Paul," as against those that undervalued him, and said his bodily presence was weak; and rent his clothes when he was called a god.

First. John disowns himself to be the Christ; ver. 20, he said, "I am not the Christ," who was now expected and waited for. Note. The ministers of Christ must remember that they are not Christ; and therefore must not usurp his powers and prerogatives, nor assume the praises due to him only. They are not Christ, and therefore must not lord it over God's heritage, nor pretend to a dominion over the faith of Christians. They cannot create grace and peace; they cannot enlighten, convert, quicken, comfort, for they are not Christ. Observe how emphatically this is here expressed concerning John; "he confessed, and denied not, but confessed," it notes his vehemence and constancy, in making this protestation. Note. Temptations to pride, and assuming that honour to ourselves which doth not belong to us, ought to be resisted with a great deal of vigour and earnestness. When John was taken to be the Messiah, he did not connive at it with a Si populus vult decipi, decipitur; — If the people will be deceived, let them; but openly, and solemnly, without any ambiguities, confessed, "I am not the Christ;" ὅτι οὐκ εἰμι ὁ Χριστός; "I am not the Christ, not I;" another is at hand who is he, but I am not. His disowning himself to be the Christ, is called his confessing, and not denying, Christ. Note. Those that humble and abase themselves, thereby confess Christ, and give honour to him; but those that will not deny themselves do in effect deny Christ.

Secondly. He disowns himself to be Elias, ver. 21. The Jews expected the person of Elias to return from heaven, and to live among them, and promised themselves great matters from it; and hearing of John's character, doctrine, and baptism, and observing that he appeared as one dropped from heaven, in the same part of the country from which Elijah was carried to heaven, it is no wonder that they were ready to take him for this Elijah; but he disowned this honour too. He was indeed prophesied of, under the name of Elijah, Mal. iv. 5; and he came in the spirit and power of Elias, Lu. i. 17; and was the Elias that was to come, Mat. xi. 14; but he was not the person of Elias; not that Elias that went to heaven in the fiery chariot, as he was that met Christ in his transfiguration. He was the Elias that God had promised, not the Elias they foolishly dreamed of. Elias did come, and they knew him not, Mat. xvii. 12; nor did he make himself known to them as the Elias, because they had promised themselves such an Elias as God never promised them.

sions, but has made known his nature in deeds of power and love, and has in this way erected a banner around which his church may rally."

i. 14. "Was made flesh;" i.e., became man. The phrase may be compared with the word "was," used (verse 1) with reference to his divinity (see Note on verse 6). These words may have been directed against those who held that Christ was not really man, but only apparently such. "Dwelt;" tabernacled. The word means to dwell in a tent, and probably reference is here made to the Shekinah dwelling in the tabernacle. This verse may be regarded as the text of the narrative following; the Gospel of St. John being a record of the words and acts whereby the Word made flesh showed forth the glory of the only-begotten of the Father.

i. 15. "Cried;" i.e., made loud and bold proclamation. "He that cometh after me," &c.: Webster and Wilkinson render the passage, "He that succeeds me takes precedence of me." "For he was before me:" explaining the former sentence, by showing that he was not Thirdly. He disowns himself to be that prophet, or the prophet. 1st. He was not that prophet which Moses said the Lord would raise up to them of their brethren, like unto him. If they meant that, they needed not ask that question, for that prophet was no other than the Messiah, and he had said already, "I am not the Christ." 2nd. He was not such a prophet as they expected and wished for; who, like Samuel and Elijah, and some other of the prophets, would interpose in public affairs, and rescue them from under the Roman yoke. 3rd. He was not one of the old prophets raised from the dead, as they expected one to come before Elias, as Elias before the Messiah. 4th. Though John was a prophet, yea, more than a prophet, yet he had his revelation not by dreams and visions, as the Old Testament prophets had theirs; his commission and work was of another nature, and belonged to another dispensation. If John had said that he was Elias, and was a prophet, he might have made his words good; but ministers must upon all occasions express themselves with the utmost caution, both that they do not confirm people in any mistakes, and particularly that they give not occasion to any to think of them above what is meet.

2nd. Affirmatively. The committee that was sent to examine him pressed for a positive answer, ver. 22; urging the authority of them that sent them, which they expected he should pay a deference to. "Tell us," what art thou?" Not that we may believe thee, and be baptized by thee, but that we may give an answer to them that sent us, and it may not be said that we were sent on a fool's errand! John was looked upon as a man of sincerity, and therefore they believed he would not give an evasive, ambiguous answer, but would be fair and aboveboard, and give a plain answer to a plain question; "What sayest thou of thyself?" and he did so, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness," Observe.

First. He gives his answer in the words of Scripture, to shew that the Scripture was fulfilled in him; and that his office was supported by a Divine authority. What the Scripture saith of the office of the ministry should be often thought of by those of that high calling, who must look upon themselves as that, and that only, which the Word of God makes them.

Secondly. He gives in his answer a very humble, modest, self-denying expressions; he chooseth to apply that Scripture to himself, which spoke not his dignity, but his duty and dependence, which speaks him little: "I am the voice," as if he were, vox, et præterea nihil, — a voice, and nothing more.

Thirdly. He gives such an account of himself as might be profitable to them, and might excite and awaken them to hearken to him, for he was "the voice," see Isa. xl. 3; a voice to alarm, an articulate voice, to instruct. Ministers are but the voice, the vehicle, by which God is pleased to communicate his mind; what are Paul and Apollos, but messengers? Observe, 1st. He was a human voice; the people were prepared to receive the law by the voice of thunder, and a trumpet exceeding loud, such as made them tremble; but they were prepared for the Gospel by the voice of a man like ourselves; a still small voice, such as that in which God came to Elijah, 1 Kin. xix. 12. 2nd. He was "the voice of one crying," which notes, First. His earnestness and importunity in calling people to repentance; he cried aloud, and did not spare. Ministers must preach as those that are in earnest, and are themselves affected with those things which they desire to affect others with. Those words are not likely to thaw the hearers' hearts that freeze between the speaker's lips. Secondly. His open publication of the doctrine he preached; he was "the voice of one crying," that all manner of persons might hear and take notice: "Doth not wisdom cry?" Ps. viii. 3. 3rd. It was in the wilderness that this voice was crying; in a place of silence and solitude, out of the noise of the world, and the hurry of its business; the more retired we are from the tumult of secular affairs, the better prepared we are to hear from God. 4th. That which he cried was, "Make straight the way of the Lord;" that is, First. He came to rectify the mistakes of people concerning the ways of God. It is certain they are right as yet; but the scribes and Pharisees with their corrupt glosses upon the law, had made them crooked. Now John Baptist calls people to return to the original rule. Secondly. He came to prepare and dispose people for the reception and entertainment of Christ and his Gospel. It is an allusion to the harbingers of a prince, or great man, that cry, Make room. Note. When God is coming towards us, we must prepare to meet him; and let the Word of the Lord have a free course; see Ps. xxiv. 7.

II. Here is his testimony concerning his baptism.

1st. The inquiry which the committee made about it; ver. 25, "Why baptizest thou, then, if thou be not the Christ, nor Elias, nor that prophet?"

First. They readily apprehended baptism to be fitly and properly used as a sacred rite or ceremony; for the Jewish church had used it, with circumcision, in the admission of proselytes, to signify the cleansing of them from the pollutions of their former state. That sign was made use of in the Christian church, that it might be the more passable. Christ did not affect novelty, nor should his ministers.

Secondly. They expected it would be used in the days of the Messiah, because it was promised that then there should be a fountain opened, Zec. xiii. 1, and clean water sprinkled, Eze. xxxvi. 25. It is taken for granted that Christ and Elias, and that prophet, would baptize, for they come to purify a polluted world. Divine justice drowned the old world in its filth, but Divine grace has provided for the cleansing of this new world from its filth.

Thirdly. They would therefore know by what authority John baptized. His denying himself to be Elias, or that prophet, subjected him to this farther question, "Why baptizest thou?" Note. It is no new thing for a man's modesty to be turned against him, and improved to his prejudice; but it is better men should take advantage of our low thoughts of ourselves, to trample upon us, than the devil take advantage of our high thoughts of ourselves, to tempt us to pride, and draw us into his condemnation.

2nd. The account he gave of it, ver. 26, 27.

First. He owned himself to be only the minister of the outward sign; "I baptize with water," and that is all; I am no more, and do no more than what you see; I have no other title but John the Baptist. I cannot confer the spiritual grace signified by it. Paul was in care that none should think of him above what they saw him to be, 2 Cor. xii. 6; so was John Baptist. Ministers must not set up for masters.

Secondly. He directed them to one that was greater than himself, and would do that for them, if they pleased, which he could not do. "I baptize with water," and that is the utmost of my commission; I have nothing to do, but by this to lead you to one that comes after me, and consign you to him. Note. The great business of Christ's ministers is to direct all people to him; "we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord." John gave the same account to this committee that he had given to the people; ver. 15, "This was he of whom I spake." John was constant and uniform in his testimony, not as a reed shaken with the wind. The Sanhedrim were jealous of his interest in the people; but he is not afraid to tell them that there is one at the door that will go beyond him.

1st. He tells them of Christ's presence among them, now at this time; "there standeth one among you," at this time, "whom you know not." Christ stood among the common people, and was as one of them. Note, First. There is much true worth lies hid in this world; obscurity is often the lot of real excellency. Saints are God's hidden ones, therefore the world knows them not. Secondly. God himself is often nearer us than we are aware of; "The Lord is in this place, and I knew it not." They were gazing in expectation of the Messiah, "Lo he is here, or he is there," when the kingdom of God was abroad, and already among them, Lu. xvii. 21.

2nd. He tells them of his preference above himself; he comes after me, and yet is preferred before me. This he had said before; he adds here, "whose shoe latchet I am not worthy to unloose," I am not fit to be named the same day with him; it is an honour too great for me to pretend to be in the meanest office about him; alluded to, 1 Sam. xxv. 41. Those to whom Christ is precious, reckon his service, even the most despised instances of it, an honour to them; see Ps. lxxxiv. 10. If so great a man as John accounted himself unworthy of the honour of being near Christ, how unworthy then should we account ourselves! Now one would think these chief priests and Pharisees, upon this intimation given concerning the approach of the Messiah, should presently have asked who and where this excellent person was; and who more likely to tell them than he who had given them this general notice? No, they did not think that was any part of their business or concern; they came to molest John, not to receive any instructions from him; so that their ignorance was wilful; they might have known Christ, and would not.

Lastly. Notice is taken of the place where all this was done; ver. 28, "in Bethabara, beyond Jordan." Bethabara signifies the house of passage; some think it was the very place where Israel passed over Jordan into the land of promise, under the conduct of Joshua; there was opened the way into the gospel state by Jesus Christ. It was a great distance from Jerusalem, beyond Jordan; probably because what he did there would be least offensive to the government. Amos must go prophesy in the country, not near the court; but it was sad that Jerusalem should put so far from her the things that belonged to her peace. He made this confession in the same place where he was baptizing, that all those who attended his baptism might be witnesses of it, and none might say they knew not what to make of him.

29 The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. 30 This is he of whom I said, After me cometh a man which is preferred before me: for he was before me. 31 And I knew him not: but that he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water. 32 And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him. 33 And I knew him not: but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost. 34 And I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God. 35 Again the next day after John stood, and two of his disciples; 36 And looking upon Jesus as he walked, he saith, Behold the Lamb of God!

We have in these verses an account of John's testimony concerning Jesus Christ, which he witnessed to his own disciples that followed him. As soon as ever Christ was baptized, he was immediately hurried into the wilderness to be tempted; there he was forty days; during his absence, John had continued to bear testimony to him, and to tell the people of him; but now at last he sees Jesus coming to him, returning from the wilderness of temptation. As soon as that conflict was over, Christ presently returned to John, who was preaching and baptizing. Now Christ was tempted, for example and encouragement to us; and this teacheth us 1. That the hardships of a tempted state should engage us to keep close to ordinances, to go into the sanctuary of God, Ps. lxxiii. 17. Our combats with Satan should oblige us to keep close to the communion of saints: two is better than one. 2. That the honours of a victorious state must not set us above ordinances; Christ had triumphed over Satan, and been attended by angels; and yet, after all, he returns to the place where John was preaching and baptizing. As long as we are on this side heaven, whatever extraordinary visits of Divine grace we may have here at any time, we must still keep close to the ordinary means of grace and comfort, and walk with God in them.

Now here are two testimonies borne by John to Christ, but those two agree in one.

First. Here is his testimony to Christ on the first day that he saw him coming from the wilderness; and here four things are witnessed by him concerning Christ, when he had him before his eyes.

1. That he is "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world," ver. 29. Let us learn here,

1st. That Jesus Christ is "the Lamb of God," which speaks him the great sacrifice by whom atonement is made for sin, and man reconciled to God. Of all the legal sacrifices, he chooseth to allude to the lambs that were offered, not only because a lamb is an emblem of meekness, and Christ must be "led as a lamb to the slaughter," Isa. liii. 7; but with a special reference. First. To the daily sacrifice which was offered every morning and evening continually, and that was always a lamb, Ex. xxix. 38; which was a type of Christ, as the everlasting propitiation, whose blood continually speaks. Secondly. To the paschal lamb, the blood of whose destroying angel. Christ is our passover, 1 Cor. v. 7. He is the lamb of God; he is appointed by him, Rom. iii. 25; he was devoted to him, ch. xvii. 19; and he was accepted with him; in him he was well pleased. The lot which fell on the goat that was to be offered for a sin offering, is called the Lord's lot, Lev. xvi. 8, 9. So Christ, who was to make atonement for sin, is called the Lamb of God.

2nd. That Jesus Christ, as the Lamb of God, takes away the sin of the world. This was his undertaking, he appeared to "put away sin by the sacri-the Baptist's successor, but predecessor, and that by pre-existence. This may be taken as elucidating the Notes on verses 6, 14, showing how he who "was," i.e., pre-existed, also "became," i.e., was incarnate.

i. 16. These are the words of the Evangelist, and a continuation and expansion of ver. 14. "Grace for grace:" i.e., grace in the room of, instead of, grace. "A greater for less, higher for lower, as when a man attains successive degrees of rank" (see 1 Peter i. 5—8). Olshausen says, "The more we receive from the streams of grace, the more we may yet receive; as it is inexhaustible in the giver, the believer may take it without measure."

i. 17. The statement in verse 16 is supported by the contrast here drawn between Moses, as the mediator of the law, and Jesus Christ, the Mediator of the new covenant, the impartor of grace and truth.

i. 18. "No man hath seen," &c.: passages asserting that God is invisible to man are frequent in Scripture (see Ex. xxxiii. 20; 1 Tim. vi. 16; 1 John iv. 12). Those places in the Old Testament (Gen. xvi. 13, face of himself," Ileb. ix. 26: John Baptist had called people to repent of their sins, in order to the remission of them. Now here he shews how and by whom that remission was to be expected; what ground of hope have we that our sins shall be pardoned upon our repentance, though our repentance makes no satisfaction for them? This ground of hope we have, Jesus Christ is the Lamb of God.

First. He takes away sin. He being Mediator between God and man takes away that which is above any thing offensive to the holiness of God, and destructive to the happiness of man. He came, 1st. To take away the guilt of sin by the merit of his death, to vacate the judgment, and reverse the attainder which mankind lay under, by an act of indemnity, which all penitent, obedient believers may claim the benefit of. 2nd. To take away the power of sin by the Spirit of his grace, so that it shall not have dominion, Rom. vi. 14. Christ, as the Lamb of God, washeth us from our sins in his own blood, that is, he both justifies and sanctifies us; he taketh away sin; he is ὁ αἰσων, he is 'taking away' the sin of the world, which speaks it not a single, but a continued act; it is his constant work and office to take away sin, which is such a work of time that it will never be completed till time shall be no more. He is always taking away sin by the continual intercession of his blood in heaven, and the continual influence of his grace on earth.

Secondly. He takes away the sin of the world; purchased pardon for all those that repent and believe the Gospel, of what country, nation, or language soever they be. The legal sacrifices had reference only to the sins of Israel, to make atonement for them; but the Lamb of God was offered to be a propitiation "for the sin of the whole world;" see 1 Jno. ii. 1, 2. This is encouraging to our faith; if Christ takes away the sin of the world, then why not my sin? Christ levelled his force at the main body of sin's army; struck at the root, and aimed at the overthrow of that wickedness which the whole world lay in. God was in him reconciling the world to himself.

Thirdly. He doth this by taking it upon himself. He is the Lamb of God that 'bears the sin of the world,' so the margin reads it. He bore sin for us, and so bears it from us; he bore the sin of many, as the scape goat had the sins of Israel put upon his head, Lev. xvi. 21. God would have taken away the sin, by taking away the sinner, as he took away the sin of the old world; but he has found out a way of abolishing the sin, and yet sparing the sinner, by making his Son sin for us.

3rd. That it is our duty with an eye of faith to behold the Lamb of God thus taking away the sin of the world. See him taking away sin, and let that increase our hatred of sin, and resolutions against it; let not us hold that fast which the Lamb of God came to take away; for Christ will either take our sins away, or take us away. Let it increase our love to Christ, 'who loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood,' Rev. i. 5. Whatever God is pleased to take away from us, if withal he take away our sins, we have reason to be thankful, and no reason to complain.

II. That this was he of whom he had spoken before, ver. 30, 31: "This is he"—this person whom I now point at; you see where he stands—"this is he of whom I said, After me cometh a man." Observe,

1st. This honour John had above all the prophets, that whereas they spoke of him as one that should come, he saw him already come: "This is he;" he sees him now, he sees him nigh, Num. xxiv. 17. Such a difference there is between present faith and future vision. Now we love one whom we have not seen, then we shall see Him whom our souls love; shall see him and say, This is he of whom I said, My Christ, and my all; my beloved, and my friend.

2nd. John calls Christ a man; "after me comes a man," ὄντις, 'a strong man;' like the man, the branch, or the man of God's right hand.

3rd. He refers himself to what he had said of him before, "This is he of whom I said." Note, Those who have said the most honourable things of Christ will never see cause to unsay them; but the more they know him, the more they are confirmed in their esteem of him. John still thinks as meanly of himself, and as highly of Christ, as ever. Though Christ appeared not in any external pomp or grandeur, yet John is not ashamed to own, This is he I meant, that is preferred before me. And it was necessary that John should thus shew them the person, otherwise they could not have believed that one who made so mean a figure should be he of whom John had spoken such great things.

4th. He protests against any confederacy or combination with this Jesus; "And I knew him not." Though there was some relation between them, Elizabeth was cousin to the Virgin Mary, yet there was no acquaintance at all between them; John had no personal knowledge of Jesus till he saw him come to his baptism. Their manner of life had been different; John had spent his time in the wilderness, in solitude, Jesus at Nazareth, in conversation. There was no correspondence, no interviews between them, that the matter might appear to be wholly carried on by the direction and disposal of Heaven, and not by any design or concert of the persons themselves. And as he hereby disowns all collusion, so also all partiality and sinister regard in it; he could not be supposed to favour him as a friend, for there was no friendship or familiarity between them. Nay, as he could not be biassed to speak honourably of him, because he was a stranger to him; so, really being such a stranger to him, he was not able to say any thing of him but what he received from above, to which he appeals, ch. iii. 27. Note, They who are taught, believe and confess One whom they have not seen; and blessed are they who yet have believed.

5th. That the great intention of John's ministry and baptism was to introduce Jesus Christ; "that he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water." Observe, First. Though John did not know Jesus by face, yet he knew that he should be made manifest. Note, We may know the certainty of that which yet we do not fully know the nature and intention of. We know that the happiness of heaven shall be made manifest to Israel, but cannot describe it. Secondly. The general assurance John had that Christ should be made manifest, served to carry him with diligence and resolution through his work, though he was kept in the dark concerning particulars; "therefore am I come." Our assurance of the reality of things, though they are unseen, is enough to quicken us to our duty. Thirdly. God reveals himself to his people by degrees. At first John knew no more concerning Christ but that he should be made manifest; in confidence of that he came baptizing, and now he is favoured with a sight of him. They that, upon God's word, believe what they do not see, shall shortly see what they now believe. Fourthly. The ministry of the word and sacraments is designed for no other end but to lead people to Christ, and to make him more and more manifest. Fifthly. Baptism with water made way for the manifesting of Christ, as it supposed our corruption and filthiness, and signified our cleansing by him who is the Fountain opened.

III. That this was he upon whom the Spirit descended from heaven like a dove. For the confirming of his testimony concerning Christ, he here voucheth the extraordinary appearance at his baptism, in which God himself bore witness to him. This was a considerable proof of Christ's mission. Now to assure us of the truth of it, we are here told, ver. 32, 33.

1st. That John Baptist saw it; he bare record; did not relate it as a story, but solemnly attested it, with all the seriousness and solemnity of witness-bearing. He made affidavit of it; "I saw the Spirit descending from heaven;" John could not see the Spirit, but he saw the dove, which was a sign and representation of the Spirit. The Spirit came now upon Christ, both to make him fit for his work, and to make him known to the world. Christ was notified not by the descent of a crown upon him, or by a transfiguration, but by the descent of the Spirit, as a dove, upon him, to qualify him for his undertaking. Thus the first testimony given to the apostles was by the descent of the Spirit upon them. God's children are made manifest by their graces, their glories are reserved for their future state. Observe, First. The Spirit descended from heaven; "for every good and perfect gift is from above." Secondly. He descended like a dove, an emblem of meekness, and mildness, and gentleness, which makes him fit to teach. The dove brought the olive branch of peace, Gen. viii. 11. Thirdly. The Spirit that descended upon Christ "abode upon him," as was foretold, Isa. xi. 2. The Spirit did not move him at times, as Samson, Jud. xiii. 25, but at all times. The Spirit was given to him without measure; it was his prerogative to have the Spirit always upon him; so that he could at no time be found either unqualified for his work, or unfurnished for the supply of those that seek to him for his grace.

2nd. That he was bidden to expect it, which very much corroborates the proof. It was not John's bare conjecture, that surely he on whom he saw the Spirit descending was the Son of God; but it was an instituted sign given him before, by which he might know it for certain; ver. 33, "I knew him not." This he insists much upon, that he knew no more of him than other people did, otherwise than by revelation; "but he that sent me to baptize" gave me this sign, "Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, the same is he."

First. See here what sure grounds John went upon in his ministry and baptism, that he might proceed with all imaginable satisfaction. 1st. He did not run without sending; God sent him to baptize; he had a warrant from heaven for what he did. When a minister's call is clear, his comfort is sure, though his success is not always so. 2nd. He did not run without speeding; for when he was sent to baptize with water, he was directed to one that should baptize with the Holy Ghost; under that notion John Baptist was taught to expect Christ, as one who would give that repentance and faith which he called people to, and would carry on and complete that blessed structure which he was now laying the foundation of. Note, It is a great comfort to Christ's ministers, in their administration of the outward signs, that he whose ministers they are, can confer the grace signified thereby, and so put life, and soul, and power into their ministrations; can speak to the heart what they speak to the ear, and breathe upon the dry bones on which they prophesy.

Secondly. See what sure grounds he went upon in his designation of the person of the Messiah. God had before given him a sign, as he did to Samuel concerning Saul, On whom thou shalt see the Spirit descend, "that same is he." This not only prevented any mistakes, but gave him boldness in his testimony; when he had such assurance as this given him, he could speak with assurance.

When John was told this before, his expectations could not but be very much raised; and when the event exactly answered the prediction, his faith could not but be much confirmed. And these things are written that we may believe.

IV. That he is the Son of God. This is the conclusion of John's testimony, that in which all the particulars centre, as the quod erat demonstrandum, "the fact to be demonstrated;" ver. 34, "I saw and bare record, that this is the Son of God."

1st. The truth asserted is, "that this is the Son of God." The voice from heaven proclaimed him, and John subscribed to it; not only that he should baptize with the Holy Ghost, by a Divine authority, but that he has a Divine nature. This was the peculiar Christian creed, that Jesus is the Son of God, Mat. xvi. 16, and here is the first framing of it. 2nd. John's testimony to it, "I saw and bare record." Not only I now bear record of it, but I did so as soon as I had seen it. Observe, First. What he saw he was forward to bear record of, as they, Acts iv. 20, "We cannot but speak the things which we have seen." Secondly. What he bare record of, was what he saw. Christ's witnesses were eye-witnesses, and therefore the more to be credited; they did not speak by hearsay and report, 2 Pet. i. 16.

Secondly. Here is John's testimony to Christ the next day after, ver. 35, 36; where observe,

1. He took every opportunity that offered itself to lead people to Christ. John stood looking upon Jesus as he walked." It should seem John was now retired from the multitude, and was in close conversation with two of his disciples. Note, Ministers should not only in their public preaching, but in their private converse, witness to Christ, and serve his interests. He saw Jesus walking at some distance, yet did not go to him himself, because he would shun every thing that might give the least colour to suspect a combination. He was "looking upon Jesus," εμβλεψας, he looked stedfastly, and fixed his eyes upon him. Those that would lead others to Christ must be diligent and frequent in the contemplation of him themselves. John had seen Christ before, but now looked upon him, 1 Jno. i. 1.

2. He repeated the same testimony which he had given to Christ the day before, though he could have delivered some other great truth concerning him; but thus he would shew that he was uniform and constant in his testimony, and consistent with himself. His doctrine was the same in private that it was in public, as Paul's was, Acts xx. 21. It is good to have that repeated which we have heard, Phil. iii. 1. The doctrine of Christ's sacrifice, for the taking away of the sin of the world, ought especially to be insisted upon by all good ministers. Christ the Lamb of God, "Christ, and him crucified."

3. He intended this especially for his two disciples that stood with him; he was willing to turn them over to Christ; for to this end he bore witness to Christ in their hearing, that they might leave all to follow him, even that they might leave him. He did not reckon that he lost those disciples that went over from him to Christ, any more than the schoolmaster reckons that scholar lost whom he sends to the university. John gathered disciples, not for himself, but for Christ, to prepare them for the Lord, Lu. i. 17. So far was he from being jealous of Christ's growing interest, that there was nothing he was more desirous of. Humble, generous souls will give others their due praise, without fear of diminishing themselves by it. What we have of reputation, as well as of other things, will not be the less for our giving every body their own.

37 And the two disciples heard him speak, and they followed Jesus. 38 Then Jesus turned, and saw them following, and saith unto them, What seek ye? They said unto him, Rabbi, (which is to say, being interpreted, Master,) where dwellest thou? 39 He saith unto them, Come and see. They came and saw where he dwelt, and abode with him that day: for it was about the tenth hour. 40 One of the two which heard John speak, and followed him,

This use of the words "the Jews" is characteristic of St. John, and is regarded by Hengstenberg as showing that he "is writing at a distance from Palestine, and especially for believers from among the heathen." This seems to have been a formal deputation from the Sanhedrim, which, as the highest ecclesiastical court, exercised the right of inquiring as to the office and authority of the Baptist.

i. 20. The coming of the Messiah was evidently looked for at this time (see Luke iii. 15). The answer of John shows either that other xxiii. 30; Ex. xxiv. 10) in which God is said to have been seen, must be interpreted of appearances under the form of an angel or messenger, as Num. xii. 8; Josh. v. 13—15; Judg. xiii. 22, or other manifestations of glory, as the Shekinah. "Bosom" denotes nearness, union, intimacy, love. "Declared him;" i.e., revealed.

i. 19. "The Jews . . . from Jerusalem:" these words should be connected, the verse being, "The Jews of Jerusalem sent," &c. By the term "the Jews" St. John means the chief of the Jews.

was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. 41 He first findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messiah, which is, being interpreted, the Christ. 42 And he brought him to Jesus. And when Jesus beheld him, he said, Thou art Simon the son of Jona: thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation, A stone.

We have here the turning over of two disciples from John to Jesus, and one of them fetching in a third, and these are the first fruits of Christ's disciples; see how small the church was in its beginnings, and what the dawning of the day of its great things was.

First, Andrew, and another with him, were the two that John Baptist had directed to Christ, ver. 37; who the other was we are not told; some think it was Thomas, comparing ch. xxi. 2; others, that it was John himself, the penman of this Gospel, who useth industriously to conceal his name, ch. xiii. 23; xx. 3.

1. Here is their readiness to go over to Christ; they heard John speak of Christ as the Lamb of God, "and they followed Jesus." Probably they had heard John say the same thing the day before, and then it had not the effect upon them which now it had. See the benefit of repetition, and of private, personal converse. They heard him speak of Christ as "the Lamb of God that takes away the sin of the world," and that made them follow him. Note. The strongest and most prevailing argument with a sensible, awakened soul to follow Christ is, that it is he and he only that takes away sin.

2. The kind notice Christ took of them, ver. 38; they came behind him; but though he had his back towards them, he was soon aware of them, and "turned and saw them following." Note, Christ takes early cognizance of the first motions of a soul towards him, and the first step taken in the way to heaven: see Isa. lxiv. 5; Lu. xv. 20. He did not stay till they begged leave to speak with him, but spoke first. What communion there is between a soul and Christ, it is he that begins the discourse. He saith unto them, "What seek ye?" This was not a reprimand for their boldness in intruding into his company; he that came to seek us, never checked any for seeking him; but, on the contrary, it is a kind invitation of them into his acquaintance, whom he saw bashful and modest. Come, what have you to say to me? What is your petition? What is your request? Note, They whose business it is to instruct people in the affairs of their souls, should be humble, and mild, and easy of access, and should encourage those that apply to them. The question Christ put to them is, what we should all put to ourselves, when we begin to follow Christ, and take upon us the profession of his holy religion. "What seek ye?" What do we design and desire? Those that follow Christ, and yet seek the world, or themselves, or the praise of men, deceive themselves. What seek we in seeking Christ? do we seek a teacher, ruler, and reconciler? In following Christ, do we seek the favour of God and eternal life? If our eye be single in this, we are full of light.

3. Their modest inquiry concerning the place of his abode: "Rabbi, where dwellest thou?" 1st. In calling him Rabbi, they intimate that their design in coming to him was to be taught by him. Rabbi signifies master, a teaching master. The Jews called their doctors, or learned men, rabbies. The word comes from rab, multus or magnus, a great man, and one that, as we say, hath much in him. Never was there such a rabbi as our Lord Jesus, such a great one, in whom were "hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." These came to Christ to be his scholars, so must all those that apply themselves to him. John had told them he was the Lamb of God; now this Lamb is worthy to take the book, and open the seals, as a rabbi. Rev. v. 9. And unless we give up ourselves to be ruled and taught by him, he will not take away our sins. 2nd. In asking where he dwelt, they intimate a desire to be better acquainted with him. Christ was a stranger in this country, so that they mean, where was his inn, where he lodged. For there they would attend him at some seasonable time when he should appoint, to receive instruction from him; they would not press rudely upon him when it was not proper. Civility and good manners well become those who follow Christ. And besides, they hoped to have more from him. Than they could have in a short conference now by the way. They resolved to make a business, not a by-business, of conversing with Christ. Those that have had some communion with Christ, cannot but desire, First, A farther communion with him; they follow on to know more of him. Secondly, A fixed communion with him; where they may sit down at his feet, and abide by his instructions. It is not enough to take a turn with Christ now and then, but we must lodge with him.

4. The courteous invitation, Christ gave them to his lodgings: "He saith unto them, Come and see." Thus shall good desires towards Christ, and communion with him be countenanced. First, He invites them to come to his lodgings. The nearer we approach to Christ, the more we see of his beauty and excellency. Deceivers maintain their interest in their followers by keeping them at a distance; but that which Christ desired to recommend him to the esteem and affections of his followers was, that they would come and see; come and see what a mean lodging I have, what poor accommodations I take up with, that you may not expect any worldly advantage by following me, as they did who made their court to the scribes and Pharisees, and called them rabbis. Come and see what you must come presently, and without delay. They asked where he lodged, that they might wait upon him at a more convenient season; but Christ invites them immediately to come and see; never in better time than now. Hence learn, 1st. As to others, that it is best taking people when they are in a good mind; strike while the iron is hot. 2nd. As to ourselves, that it is wisdom to embrace the present opportunities: "Now is the accepted time," 2 Cor. vi. 2.

5. Their cheerful and, no doubt, thankful acceptance of his invitation: "they came and saw where he dwelt, and abode with him that day." It had been more modesty and manners than had done them good, if they had refused this offer. 1st. They readily went along with him; "they came and saw where he dwelt." Gracious souls cheerfully accept Christ's gracious invitations; as David, Ps. xxvii. 8. They inquired not how they might be accommodated with him, but would put that to the venture, and make the best of what they found. It is good being where Christ is, wherever it be. 2nd. They were so well pleased with what they found, that they "abode with him that day." Master, it is good to be here, and he bade them welcome. "It was about the tenth hour." Some think that John reckons according to the Roman computation, and that it was about ten o'clock in the morning, and they stayed with him till night; others think that John reckons as the other evangelists did, according to the Jewish computation, and that it was four o'clock in the afternoon, and they abode with him that night, and the next day. Dr. Lightfoot conjectures that this next day that they spent with Christ was a sabbath day, and it being late, they could not get home before the sabbath. As it is our duty, wherever we are, to contrive to spend the sabbath as much as may be to our spiritual benefit and advantage, so they are blessed who, by the lively exercise of faith, love, and devotion, spend their sabbaths in communion with Christ. These are Lord's days indeed, days of the Son of man.

Secondly, Andrew brought his brother Peter to Christ. If Peter had been the firstborn of Christ's disciples, the papists would have made a noise with it: he did indeed, afterwards, come to be more eminent in gifts, but Andrew had the honour first to be acquainted with Christ, and to be the instrument of bringing Peter to him. Observe,

1. The information which Andrew gave to Peter, with an intimation to come to Christ.

1st. He found him: "He first findeth his own brother, Simon." His finding implies his seeking him. Simon came along with Andrew to attend John's ministry and baptism, and Andrew knew where to look for him. Perhaps the other disciple that was with him went out to seek some friend of his, at the same time, but Andrew sped first; he first findeth Simon, who came only to attend on John, but has his expectations outdone, he meets with Jesus.

2nd. He told him whom they had found: "We have found the Messiah." Observe, First, He speaks humbly; not, I have found, assuming the honour of the discovery to himself, but we have; rejoicing that he had shared with others in it. Secondly, He speaks exultingly, and with triumph; "We have found" that pearl of great price, that true treasure; and having found it, he proclaims it, as those lepers, 2 Kin. viii. 9, for he knows he shall never have the less in Christ for others sharing. Thirdly, He speaks intelligently: "We have found the Messiah," which was more than had yet been said. John had said he is the Lamb of God, and the Son of God, which Andrew compares with the Scriptures of the Old Testament, and comparing them together, concludes he is the Messiah promised to the fathers; for it is now that the fullness of time is come. Thus by making God's testimonies his meditation, he speaks more clearly concerning Christ than ever his teacher had done, Ps. cxix. 99.

3rd. "He brought him to Jesus;" would not undertake to instruct him himself, but brought him to the fountain head; persuaded him to come to Christ; and introduced him. Now this was, First, An instance of true love to his brother, his own brother, so he is called here, because he was very dear to him. Note, We ought, with a particular concern and application, to endeavour the spiritual welfare of those that are related to us; for their relation to us adds both to the obligation and to the opportunity of doing good to their souls. Secondly, It was an effect of his day's conversation with Christ. Note, The best evidence of our profiting by the means of grace is the piety and usefulness of our conversation afterwards. Hereby it appeared that Andrew had been with Jesus, that he was so full of him; that he had been in the mount, for his face shone. He knew there was enough in Christ for all; and having tasted that he is gracious, could not rest till those he loved had tasted it too. Note, True grace hates monopolies, and loves not to eat its morsels alone.

2. The entertainment that Jesus Christ gave to Peter, who was never the less welcome for his being influenced by his brother to come, ver. 43. Observe, 1st. Christ called him by his name: "When Jesus beheld him, he said, Thou art Simon, the son of Jona." It should seem that Peter was utterly a stranger to Christ; and if so, First, It was a proof of Christ's omniscience, that upon the first sight, without any inquiry, he could tell the name, both of him and of his father: "the Lord knows them that are his," and their whole case. However, Secondly, It was an instance of his condescending grace and favour, that he did thus freely and affably call him by his name, though he was of mean extraction, and, vir nullius in nomis, "a man of no name." It was an instance of God's favour to Moses that he knew him by name, Ex. xxxiii. 17. Some observe the signification of these names, Simon, "obedient;" Jona, "a dove." An obedient, dove-like spirit qualifies us to be the disciples of Christ.

2nd. He gave him a new name, Cephas. First, His giving him a name speaks Christ's favour to him. A new name speaks some great dignity, Rev. ii. 17; Isa. lxiii. 2. By this, Christ not only wiped off the reproach of his mean and obscure parentage, but adopted him into his family, as one of his own. Secondly, The name which he gave him speaks his fidelity to Christ; "thou shalt be called Cephas," that is Hebrew for a stone, "which is by interpretation, Peter," so it should be rendered; as Acts ix. 39, "Tabitha, which by interpretation is called Dorcas;" the former Hebrew, the latter Greek, for a young roe. Peter's natural temper was stiff, and hardy, and resolute, which I take to be the principal reason why Christ called him Cephas, "a stone." When Christ afterwards prayed for him, that his faith might not fail, that so he might be firm to Christ himself, and at the same time bade him strengthen his brethren, and lay out himself for the support of others, then he made him what he here called him, Cephas, a stone. Those that come to Christ must come with a fixed resolution to be firm and constant to him; like a stone, solid and steadfast; and it is by his grace that they are so: his saying, Be thou steady, makes them so. Now, this doth no more prove that Peter was the singular or only rock upon which this church is built, than the calling of James and John Boanerges proves them the only sons of thunder, or the calling of Jesus Barnabas proves him the only son of consolation.

43 The day following Jesus would go forth into Galilee, and findeth Philip, and saith unto him, Follow me. 44 Now Philip was of Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter. 45 Philip findeth Nathanael, and saith unto him, We have found him, of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph. 46 And Nathanael said unto him, Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth? Philip saith unto him, Come and see. 47 Jesus saw Nathanael coming to him, and saith of him, Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile! 48 Nathanael saith unto him, Whence knowest thou me? Jesus answered and said unto him, Before that Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig tree, I saw thee. 49 Nathanael questions of a more definite character followed, or that he understood the question as referring to the Christ. There is no reason to suppose that this deputation was from the first hostile to John.

i. 21. "Elias:" the Jews expected the return of Elijah himself (see Mal. iv. 5); and our Lord, in Matt. xi. 14, speaks of John as the Elias promised. Luke i. 17 gives the explanation of the apparent contradiction by speaking of John as one who should work "in the spirit and power of Elias." "That prophet?" like the Prophet (see Deut. xviii. 15); from which the Jews seem to have expected a prophet to precede the Messiah, though some seem to have regarded the prophet as the same as the Messiah. John replies that he is not the prophet, for that long-expected prophet was in reality the Christ.

i. 23. See Isa. xl. 3. The first positive answer which John gives. Note his self-abnegation. He came to bear witness to another, so he keeps himself in the background, and points his inquirers to another. It is his message which is important.

answered and saith unto him, Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art the King of Israel. 50 Jesus answered and said unto him, Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig tree, believest thou? thou shalt see greater things than these. 51 And he saith unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man.

We have here the call of Philip and Nathanael.

First. Philip was called immediately to Christ himself; not as Andrew, who was directed to Christ by John, or Peter, who was invited by his brother. God has various methods of bringing his chosen ones home to himself: but whatever means he uses, he is not tied to any.

1. Philip was called in a preventing way; Jesus "findeth Philip." Christ sought us, and found us, before we made any inquiries after him. The name Philip is of a Greek original, and much used among the Gentiles; which some make an instance of the degeneracy of the Jewish church at this time, and their conformity to the nations; yet Christ changed not his name.

2. He was called "the day following." See how closely Christ applied himself to his business. When work is to be done for God, we must not lose a day. Yet observe, Christ now called one or two a day, but after the Spirit was poured out, there were thousands a day effectually called, in which was fulfilled, ch. xiv. 12.

3. "Jesus would go forth into Galilee" to call him. Christ will find out all those that are given to him, wherever they are, and none of them shall be lost.

4. Philip was brought to be a disciple by the power of Christ going along with that word, "Follow me." See the nature of true Christianity; it is following Christ, devoting ourselves to his converse and conduct, attending his motions, and treading in his steps. See the efficacy of the grace of Christ making the call of his Word to prevail; it is the rod of his strength.

5. We are told that Philip was of Bethsaida, and Andrew and Peter were so too, ver. 44. These eminent disciples received not honour from, but reflected honour upon, the place of their nativity. Bethsaida signifies the house of nets, because inhabited mostly by fishermen; thence Christ chose disciples, who were to be furnished with extraordinary gifts, and therefore needed not the ordinary advantages of learning. Bethsaida was a wicked place, Mat. xi. 21; yet even there was a remnant according to the election of grace.

Secondly. Nathanael was invited to Christ by Philip, and much is said concerning him. In which we may observe,

1. What passed between Philip and Nathanael; in which appears an observable mixture of pious zeal with weakness, such as is usually found in beginners that are yet but "asking the way to Zion." Here is,

1st. The joyful news that Philip brought to Nathanael, ver. 45. As Andrew before, so Philip here, having got some knowledge of Christ himself, rests not till he has made manifest the saviour of that knowledge. Philip, though newly come into an acquaintance with Christ himself, yet steps aside to seek Nathanael. Note, When we have the fairest opportunities of getting good to our own souls, yet even then we must seek opportunities of doing good to the souls of others; remembering the words of Christ, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," Acts xx. 35. O, saith Philip, "we have found him of whom Moses and the prophets did write." Observe here, First, What a transport of joy Philip was in upon this new acquaintance with Christ: We have found him whom we have so often talked of, so long wished and waited for; at last he is come, he is come, and we have found him. Secondly, What an advantage it was to him that he was so well acquainted with the Scriptures of the Old Testament, which prepared his mind for the reception of evangelical light, and made the entrance of it much the more easy: "Him of whom Moses and the prophets did write." What was written entirely, and from eternity, in the book of the Divine counsels, was in part, at sundry times and in divers manners, copied out into the book of the Divine revelations. Glorious things were written there concerning the seed of the woman, the seed of Abraham, Shiloh, the prophet like Moses, the Son of David, Immanuel, the Man, the Branch, the Messiah, the Prince; Philip had studied these things, and was full of them, which made him readily welcome Christ. Thirdly, What mistakes and weaknesses he laboured under; he called Christ, Jesus of Nazareth, whereas he was of Bethlehem; and the Son of Joseph, whereas he was but his supposed son: young beginners in religion are subject to mistakes, which time and the grace of God will rectify. It was his weakness to say, "We have found him," for Christ found them, before they found Christ: he did not yet apprehend, as Paul did, how he was apprehended of Christ Jesus, Phil. iii. 12.

2nd. The objection which Nathanael made against this; ver. 46, "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Here, First, His caution was commendable, that he did not lightly assent to every thing that was said, but took it into examination; our rule is to prove all things. But, Secondly, His objection arose from ignorance. If he meant that no good thing could come out of Nazareth, it was owing to his ignorance of the Divine grace; as if that were less affected to one place than another, or tied itself to men's foolish and ill-natured observations. If he meant that the Messiah, that great, good thing, could not come out of Nazareth, so far he was right. Moses, in the law, said that he should come out of Judah, and the prophets had assigned Bethlehem for the place of the nativity; but then he was ignorant of the matter of fact that this Jesus was born at Bethlehem, so that the blunder Philip made in calling him Jesus of Nazareth, occasioned this objection. Note, The mistakes of preachers often give rise to the prejudices of hearers.

3rd. The short reply which Philip gave to this objection, "Come and see." First, It was his weakness that he could not give a satisfactory answer to it; yet it is the common case of young beginners in religion: we may know enough to satisfy ourselves, and yet not be able to say enough to silence the cavils of a subtle adversary. Secondly, It was his wisdom and zeal, that when he could not answer the objection himself, he would have him go to one that could: "Come and see." Let not us stand arguing here, and raising difficulties to ourselves, which we cannot get over; let us go and converse with Christ himself, and these difficulties will all vanish presently. Note, It is folly to spend that time in doubtful disputation, which might be better spent, and to much better purpose, in the exercises of piety and devotion. "Come and see;" not, "Go and see;" but "Come, and I will go along with thee;" as Isa. ii. 3; Jer. i. 5. From this parley between Philip and Nathanael, we may observe, 1st, That many people are kept from the ways of religion by the unreasonable prejudices they have conceived against religion, upon the account of some foreign circumstances which do not all touch the merits of the cause. 2nd, The best way to remove those prejudices they have entertained against religion is, to prove themselves, and make trial of it. Let us not answer this matter before we hear it.

2. What passed between Nathanael and our Lord Jesus. He came and saw, not in vain.

1st. Our Lord Jesus bore a very honourable testimony to Nathanael's integrity: "Jesus saw him coming," and met him with favourable encouragement; he said of him to those about him, Nathanael himself being within hearing, "Behold an Israelite indeed." Observe,

First, That he did commend him; not to flatter him, or puff him up with a good conceit of himself; but perhaps, because he knew him to be a modest man, if not a melancholy man, one that had mean and hard thoughts of himself; was read, to doubt his own sincerity; and Christ, by this testimony, put the matter out of doubt. Nathanael had, more than any of the candidates, objected against Christ; but Christ hereby shewed that he excused it, and was not extreme to mark what he said amiss, because he knew his heart was upright. He did not retort upon him, "Can any good thing come out of Cana, ch. xxi. 2, an obscure town in Galilee; but kindly gives him this character, to encourage us to hope for acceptance with Christ, notwithstanding our weakness, and to teach us to speak honourably of those who without cause have spoken slightly of us, and to give them their due praise.

Secondly, That he commended him for his integrity. 1st, "Behold an Israelite indeed." It is Christ's prerogative to know what men are indeed; we can but hope the best. The whole nation were Israelites in name, but "all are not Israel that are of Israel," Rom. ix. 6; but here was "an Israelite indeed." First, A sincere follower of the good example of Israel, whose character it was, that he was a plain man, in opposition to Esau's character of a cunning man: he was a genuine son of honest Jacob; not only of his seed, but of his spirit. Secondly, A sincere professor of the faith of Israel; he was true to the religion he professed, and lived up to it; he was really as good as he seemed, and his practice of a piece with his profession: "He is the Jew that is one inwardly," Rom. ii. 29; so he the Christian. 2nd, He is one "in whom is no guile;" that is the character of an Israelite indeed, a Christian indeed: no guile towards men; a man without trick or design; a man that one may trust: no guile towards God, that is sincere in his repentance for sin; sincere in his covenanting with God; in whose spirit is no guile, Ps. xxxii. 2; he doth not say without guilt, but without guile; though in many things he is foolish and forgetful, yet in nothing false, nor wickedly departing from God; there is no allowed, approved guilt in him; not painted, though he have his spots: "Behold this Israelite indeed." First, Take notice of him, that you may learn his way, and do like him. Secondly, Admire him; behold and wonder. The hypocrisy of the scribes and Pharisees had so leavened the Jewish church and nation, and their religion was so degenerated into formality, or state policy, that an Israelite indeed was a man wondered at; a miracle of Divine grace, like Job. i. 8.

2nd. Nathanael is much surprised at this, upon which Christ gives him a farther proof of his omniscience, and a kind memorial of his former devotion.

First, Here is Nathanael's modesty, in that he was soon put out of countenance at the kind notice Christ was pleased to take of him. "Whence knowest thou me?"

2nd. Me that am unworthy of thy cognizance, "who am I, O Lord God?" 2 Sam. vii. 28. This was an evidence of his sincerity, that he did not catch at the praise he met with, but declined it. Christ knows us better than we know ourselves; we know not what is in a man's heart by looking in his face, but all things are naked and open before Christ, Heb. iv. 12, 13. Doth Christ know us? Let us covet to know him.

Secondly, Here is Christ's farther manifestation of himself to him: "Before Philip called thee, I saw thee." 1st, He gives him to understand that he knew him, and so manifests his divinity. It is God's prerogative infallibly to know all persons and all things; by this Christ proved himself to be God upon many occasions. It was prophesied concerning the Messiah, that he should be of "quick understanding in the fear of the Lord;" that is, in judging the sincerity and degree of the fear of God in others; and that he should not judge after the sight of his eyes, Isa. xi. 2, 3. Here he answers that prediction: see 2 Tim. ii. 19. 2nd, That before Philip called him, he saw him under the fig tree. This manifests a particular kindness for him. First, His eye was towards him before Philip called him, which was the first time that ever Nathanael was acquainted with Christ. Christ has knowledge of us before we have any knowledge of him; see Isa. xlv. 4; Gal. iv. 9. Secondly, His eye was upon him when he was "under the fig tree." 1st, This was a private token, which nobody understood but Nathanael. When thou wast retired under the fig tree, in thy garden, and thought no eye saw thee, I had then mine eye upon thee, and saw that which was very acceptable. It is most probable Nathanael, under the fig tree, was employed, as Isaac in the field, in meditation, and prayer, and communion with God. Perhaps, then and there it was that he solemnly joined himself to the Lord in an inviolable covenant. Christ saw in secret, and, by this public notice of it, did in part reward him openly. Sitting under the fig tree notes quietness and composedness of spirit, which much befriends communion with God: see Mic. iv. 4; Zec. iii. 10. Nathanael herein was an Israelite indeed, that, like Israel, he wrestled with God alone, Gen. xxxii. 24: prayed, not like the hypocrites, in the corners of the streets, but under the fig tree.

3rd. Nathanael hereby obtained a full assurance of faith in Jesus Christ, expressed in that noble acknowledgment, ver. 49, "Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art the King of Israel;" that is, in short, thou art the true Messiah. Observe here,

First, How firmly he believed with the heart. Though he had lately laboured under some prejudices concerning Christ, they were now all vanished. Note, The grace of God in working faith casts down imaginations. Now he asks no more, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" for he believes Jesus of Nazareth to be the chief good, and embraceth him accordingly.

Secondly, How freely he confessed with the mouth. And his confession is made in form of an adoration, directed to our Lord Jesus himself, which is a proper way of confessing our faith. 1st, He confesseth Christ's prophetic office, in calling him Rabbi, a title which the Jews commonly gave to their teachers: Christ is the great Rabbi, at whose feet we must all be brought up. 2nd, He confesseth his Divine nature and mission, in calling him the Son of God, that Son of God spoken of, Ps. ii. 7; though he had but a human form and aspect, yet having a Divine knowledge, the knowledge of the heart, and of things distant and secret, from thence he concludes him to be the Son of God. 3rd, He confesseth, "Thou art the King of Israel;" that King of Israel whom we have been long waiting for. If he be the Son of God, he is King of the Israel of God. Nathanael hereby proves himself an Israelite indeed, that he so readily owns and submits to the King of Israel.

4th. Christ hereupon raiseth the hopes and expectations of Nathanael to something farther, and greater than all this, ver. 50, 51. Christ is very tender of young converts, and will encourage good beginnings, though weak, Mat. xii. 20.

i. 25. Lightfoot notes that the surprise indicated in this question was not at the rite of baptism, but at John's administering it; and adds, "The reason of this was that the rite and custom of baptism had been in common and ordinary practice and use among that nation many hundreds of years before John appeared among them."

i. 37. "Two disciples:" the one whose name is not mentioned is generally supposed to have been John the Evangelist, who never mentions his own name.

i. 38. "Rabbi:" "my Master." John alone gives the explanation of this word. "Where dwellest thou?" i.e., "Where art thou staying?"

i. 39. "The tenth hour:" i.e., 4 p.m. of our time. The division of the day varied in different nations—the Babylonians reckoning from sunrise to sunrise; the Romans from midnight to midnight; the Hebrews and Athenians from sunset to sunset.

i. 43. "The day following:" i.e., the day after the naming of Peter, and the fourth day after the visit of the deputation from Jerusalem.

First. He here signifies his acceptance, and, it should seem, his admiration, of the ready faith of Nathanael: "Because I said, I saw thee under the fig tree, believest thou?" He wonders that such a small indication of Christ's Divine knowledge should have such an effect; it was a sign Nathanael's heart was prepared beforehand, else the work had not been done so suddenly. Note, It is much for the honour of Christ and his grace when the heart is surrendered to him at the first summons.

Secondly. He promiseth him much greater helps for the confirmation and increase of his faith than he had had for the first production of it. 1st. In general, "thou shalt see greater things than these," stronger proofs of my being the Messiah,—the miracles of Christ and his resurrection. Note, First. To him that hath, and makes good use of what he hath, more shall be given. Secondly. Those who truly believe the Gospel will find its evidences grow upon them; and will see more and more cause to believe it. Thirdly. Whatever discoveries Christ is pleased to make of himself to his people, while they are here in this world, he hath still greater things than these to make known to them—a glory yet farther to be revealed. 2nd. In particular; not thou only, but ye, all you my disciples, whose faith this is intended for the confirmation of, "ye shall see heaven opened;" that is more than telling Nathanael of his being under the fig tree. This is introduced with a solemn preface: "Verily, verily, I say unto you;" this commands both a fixed attention to what is said, as very weighty, and a full assent to it as undoubtedly true; I say it, whose word you may rely upon, Amen, amen. None used this word at the beginning of a sentence but Christ, though the Jews often used it at the close of prayer, and sometimes doubled it. It is a solemn asseveration. Christ is called "the Amen," Rev. iii. 14; and so some take it here, "I, the Amen, the Amen, say unto you; I, the faithful witness." Note, The assurances we have of the glory to be revealed, are built upon the word of Christ.

Now see what it is that Christ assures them of: "Hereafter," or "within a while," or "ere long," or "from henceforth," "ye shall see heaven opened."

1. It is a mean title that Christ here takes to himself, "the Son of man;" a title frequently applied to him in the Gospel, but always by himself. Nathanael had called him the Son of God, and king of Israel. He calls himself Son of man. 1st. To express his humility in the midst of the honours done him. 2nd. To teach his humanity, which is to be believed as well as his divinity. 3rd. To intimate his present state of humiliation, that Nathanael might not expect this king of Israel to appear in external pomp.

2. Yet they are great things he here foretells: "ye shall see heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man."

1st. Some understand it literally, as pointing at some particular event. Either, First. There was some vision of Christ's glory, in which this was exactly fulfilled, which Nathanael was an eye-witness of, as Peter and James and John were of his transfiguration. There were many things which Christ did, and those in the presence of his disciples, which were not written, ch. xx. 30, and why not that? Or, Secondly. It was fulfilled in the many ministrations of the angels to our Lord Jesus, especially that at his ascension, when heaven was opened to receive him, and the angels ascended and descended to attend him, and to do him honour, and this in the sight of the disciples. Christ's ascension was the great proof of his mission, and much confirmed the faith of his disciples, ch. vi. 62. Or, Thirdly. It may refer to Christ's second coming to judge the world, when the heavens shall be open, and every eye shall see him, and the angels of God shall ascend and descend about him, as attendants on him, every one employed, and a busy day it will be. See 2 Thes. i. 10.

2nd. Others take it figuratively as speaking of a state, or series of things, to commence from henceforth; and so we may understand it, First. Of Christ's miracles. Nathanael believed because Christ, as the prophets of old, could tell him things secret. But what is this? Christ is now beginning a dispensation of miracles much more great and strange than this, as if heaven were opened; and such a power shall be exerted by the Son of man, as if the angels, which excel in strength, were continually attending his orders. Immediately after this, Christ began to work miracles, ch. ii. 11. Or, Secondly. Of his mediation, and that blessed intercourse which he hath settled between heaven and earth, which his disciples should by degrees be let into the mystery of. 1st. By Christ, as mediator, they shall see heaven opened, that we may enter into the holiest, by his blood, Heb. x. 19, 20. Heaven opened, that by faith we may look in, and at length may go in; may now behold the glory of the Lord, and hereafter enter into the joy of our Lord. And, 2nd. They shall "see angels ascending and descending upon the Son of man." Through Christ we have communion with, and benefit by, the holy angels; and things in heaven and things on earth are reconciled and gathered together. Christ is to us as Jacob's ladder, Gen. xxviii. 12, by whom angels continually ascend and descend for the good of the saints.

CHAPTER II.

In the close of the foregoing chapter we had an account of the first disciples whom Jesus called, Andrew and Peter, Philip and Nathanael; these were the firstfruits to God and to the Lamb, Rev. xiv. 4. Now in this chapter we have, I. The story of the first miracle which Jesus wrought, turning water into wine, at Cana of Galilee, ver. 1—11; and his appearing at Capernaum, ver. 12. II. The story of the first passover he kept at Jerusalem, after he began his public ministry. His driving the buyers and sellers out of the temple, ver. 13—17; and the sign he gave to those who quarrelled with him for it, ver. 18—22; with an account of some half-thick believers that followed him thereupon, for some time, ver. 23—25, but he knew them too well to put any confidence in them.

AND the third day there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee; and the mother of Jesus was there: 2 And both Jesus was called, and his disciples, to the marriage. 3 And when they wanted wine, the mother of Jesus saith unto him, They have no wine. 4 Jesus saith unto her, Woman, what have I to do with thee? mine hour is not yet come. 5 His mother saith unto the servants, Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it. 6 And there were set there six water-pots of stone, after the manner of the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three firkins apiece. 7 Jesus saith unto them, Fill the water-pots with water. And they filled them up to the brim. 8 And he saith unto them, Draw out now, and bear unto the governor of the feast. And they bare it. 9 When the ruler of the feast had tasted the water that was made wine, and knew not whence it was: (but the servants which drew the water knew;) the governor of the feast called the bridegroom, 10 And saith unto him, Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse: but thou hast kept the good wine until now. 11 This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth his glory; and his disciples believed on him.

We have here the story of Christ's miraculous converting of water into wine, at a marriage in Cana of Galilee. There were some few so well disposed as to believe in Christ, and to follow him, when he did no miracle; yet it was not likely many should be wrought upon till he had something wherewith to answer those that asked, "What sign shewest thou?" He could have wrought miracles before, could have made them the common actions of his life, and the common entertainments of his friends; but miracles being designed for the sacred and solemn seals of his doctrine, he began not to work any till he began to preach his doctrine. Now observe,

First. The occasion of this miracle. Maimonides observes it to be to the honour of Moses, that all the signs he did in the wilderness, he did them upon necessity; we needed food, he brought us manna, and so did Christ. Observe,

1. The time, "the third day," after he came into Galilee. The evangelist keeps a journal of occurrences, for no day passed without something extraordinary done or said. Our Master filled up his time better than his servants do, and never lay down at night complaining as the Roman emperor did, that he had lost a day.

2. The place; it was at Cana in Galilee, in the tribe of Asher, Jos. xix. 28; of which before it was said, that "he shall yield royal dainties," Gen. xlix. 20. Christ began to work miracles in an obscure corner of the country remote from Jerusalem, which was the public scene of action, to shew that he "sought not honour from men," ch. v. 41, but would put honour upon the lowly. His doctrine and miracles would not be so much opposed by the plain, honest Galileans, as they would be by the proud and prejudiced rabbins, politicians, and grandees at Jerusalem.

3. The occasion itself was a marriage: probably one or both of the parties were akin to our Lord Jesus. The mother of Jesus is said to be there, and not to be called, as Jesus and his disciples were, which intimates that she was there as one at home. Observe the honour which Christ hereby put upon the ordinance of marriage, that he graced the solemnity of it not only with his presence, but with his first miracle: because it was instituted and blessed in innocence; because by it he would still seek a godly seed; because it resembles the mystical union between him and his church; and because he foreaw that in the papal kingdom, while the marriage ceremony would be unduly dignified, and advanced into a sacrament, the married state would be unduly vilified, as inconsistent with any sacred function. There was a marriage, γάμος,—a marriage feast, to grace the solemnity. Marriages were usually celebrated with festivals, Gen. xxix. 22; Jud. xiv. 10, in token of joy and friendship, and for the disciples were principal guests at this entertainment. "The mother of Jesus" (that was her most honourable title) "was there;" no mention being made of Joseph, we conclude him dead before this. Jesus was called, and he came, accepted the invitation, and feasted with them,

i. 45. "Nathanael:" "the gift of God" (1 Sam. i. 20), usually identified with Bartholomew; Nathanael being the proper, Bartholomew the surname. "The son of Joseph:" Philip expresses the popular opinion in the ordinary language.

i. 46. The whole of Galilee, in which Nazareth was situated, was held in contempt by the Jews of Jerusalem (John vii. 52). Some notion of the character of the Nazarenes may be gathered from the violence which they showed to our Lord (Luke iv. 29)

i. 51. Allusion is here evidently made to Jacob's dream. The meaning of our Lord is simple but profound. The harmony between heaven and earth is restored in himself. He is the Mediator between man and God—the ladder set up between heaven and earth, by which the blessings of God descend to man, and man's prayer and aspirations ascend to God.

ii. 1. "Third day:" i.e., the third day after our Lord's interview with Nathanael to teach us to be respectful to our relations, and sociable with them, though they be mean. Christ was to come in a way different from that of John Baptist, who came "neither eating nor drinking," Mat. xi. 18, 19. It is the wisdom of the prudent to study how to improve conversation, rather than how to decline it.

"There was a marriage, and Jesus was called." Note, 1. It is very desirable, when there is a marriage, to have Jesus Christ at it,—to have his spiritual, gracious presence,—to have the marriage owned and blessed by him,—the marriage is then honourable indeed. And they that marry in the Lord, 1 Cor. vii. 39, do not marry without him. 2. They that would have Christ with them at their marriage, must invite him by prayer; that is the messenger that must be sent to heaven for him, and he will come; "thou shalt call, and I will answer;" and he will turn the water into wine.

The disciples also were invited; those five whom he had called, ch. i., for as yet he had no more; they were his family, and were invited with him. They had thrown themselves upon his care; and they soon find, though he had no wealth he had good friends. Note, 1. Those that follow Christ shall feast with him; they shall fare as he fares, so he has bespoken for them, ch. xii. 26, "Where I am, there shall my servant be." 2. Love to Christ is testified by a love to those that are his for his sake; our goodness extendeth not to him, but to the saints. Calvin observes, how generous the maker of the feast was, though he seems to be but of small substance to invite four or five strangers more than he thought of, because they were followers of Christ; which shews, saith he, there is more of freedom and liberality, and true friendship, in the conversation of some meaner persons than among many of higher rank.

Secondly, The miracle itself. In which observe, 1. They wanted wine, ver. 3. 1st. There was want at a feast; though much provided, yet all spent. While we are in this world we sometimes find ourselves in straits, even then when we think ourselves in the fulness of our sufficiency. If always spending, perhaps all is spent ere we are aware. 2nd. There was want at a marriage feast. Note, They that, being married, are come to care for the things of the world, must expect trouble in the flesh, and count upon disappointment. 3rd. It should seem the occasion of this want was, Christ and his disciples being there were more company than they expected when the provision was made; but they who straiten themselves for Christ shall not lose by him.

2. The mother of Jesus solicited him to assist her friends in this strait. We are told, ver. 3–5, what passed between Christ and his mother upon this occasion.

1st. She acquaints him with the plunge they were at, ver. 3; "she saith unto him, They have no wine." Some think she did not expect from him any miraculous supply, he having as yet wrought no miracle, but that she would have him make some decent excuse to the company, and make the best of it, to save the bridegroom's reputation, and keep him in countenance. Or, as Calvin suggests, would have him make up the want of wine with some holy, profitable discourse. But most probably she looked for a miracle; for she knew he was now appearing as the great prophet, like unto Moses, who so often seasonably supplied the wants of Israel; and though this was his first public miracle, perhaps he had sometimes relieved her and her husband in their low estate. The bridegroom might have sent out for more wine, but she was for going to the fountain head. Note, First. We ought to be concerned for the wants and straits of our friends, and not seek our own things only. Secondly. In our own and our friends' straits, it is our wisdom and duty to apply ourselves to Christ by prayer. Thirdly. In our addresses to Christ, we must not prescribe to him, but humbly spread our case before him, and then refer ourselves to him, to do as he pleaseth.

2nd. He gave her a reprimand for it; for he saw more amiss in it than we do, else he had not treated it thus.

Here is, First. The rebuke itself: "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" As many as Christ loves, he rebukes and chastens. He calls her woman, not mother; when we begin to be assuming, we should be minded what we are,—men and women, frail, foolish, and corrupt. The question, τι εστις και σοι; might be read, "what is that to me and thee?" what is it to us if they do want; but it is always used as we render it, "What have I to do with thee?" as Jud. xi. 12; 2 Sam. xvi. 10; Ezr. iv. 3; Mat. viii. 29. And therefore speaks a resentment, yet not at all inconsistent with that reverence and subjection which he paid to his mother, according to the fifth commandment, Lu. ii. 51; for there was a time when it was Levi's praise that he said to his father, "I have not known him," Deut. xxxii. 9. Now this was intended to be, 1st. A check to his mother, for interposing in a matter which was the act of his Godhead, which had no dependence on her, and which she was not the mother of. Though, as man, he was David's son and hers; yet as God, he was David's Lord and hers, and he would have her know it. The greatest advancements must not make us forget ourselves and our place; nor the familiarity to which the covenant of grace admits us breed contempt, irreverence, or any kind or degree of presumption. 2nd. It was an instruction to others of his relations, many of whom were present here, that they must never expect him to have any regard to his kindred according to the flesh, in his working miracles, or that therein he should gratify them who, in this matter, were no more to him than other people. In the things of God we must not know faces. 3rd. It is a standing testimony against that idolatry which he foresaw his church would in after ages sink into, in giving undue honours to the Virgin Mary; a crime which the Roman Catholics, as they call themselves, are notoriously guilty of, when they call her the queen of heaven, the salvation of the world, their mediatrix, their life and hope; not only depending upon her merit and intercession, but beseeching her to command her Son to do them good; monstra te est matrem.—"shew that thou art his mother;" jussu matris impera Salvatori.—"lay thy maternal commands on the Saviour." Doth he not here expressly say, when a miracle was to be wrought, even in the days of his humiliation, and his mother did but tacitly hint an intercession, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" which was plainly designed either to prevent or aggravate such gross idolatry, such horrid blasphemy. The Son of God is appointed our advocate with the Father, but the mother of our Lord was never designed to be our advocate with the Son.

Secondly. The reason of this rebuke; "mine hour is not yet come;" for every thing Christ did and that was done to him, he had his hour, the fixed time, and the fittest time, which was punctually observed. 1st. Mine hour for working miracles is not yet come; yet afterwards he wrought this, before the hour, because he foresaw it would confirm the faith of his infant disciples, ver. 11, which was the end of all his miracles; so that this was an earnest of the many miracles he would work when his hour was come. 2nd. Mine hour for working miracles openly is not yet come; therefore do not talk of it thus publicly. 3rd. Is not the hour of my exemption from thine authority yet come, now I have begun to act as a prophet? So Gregory Nyssen. 4th. Mine hour for working this miracle is not yet come. His mother moved him to help them "when the wine began to fail," so it may be read, ver. 2; but his hour was not come till it was quite spent, and there was a total want, not only to prevent any suspicion of mixing some of the wine that was left with the water, but to teach us that man's extremity is God's opportunity to appear for the help and relief of his people. Then his hour is come when we are reduced to the utmost strait, and know not what to do. This encouraged those that waited for him to believe, that though his hour was not yet come, it would come. Note, The delays of mercy are not to be construed the denials of prayer: "at the end it shall speak."

3. Notwithstanding this, she encouraged herself with expectation that he would help her friends in this strait, for she bade the servants observe his orders, ver. 5.

1st. She took the reproof very submissively, and did not reply to it. It is best not to deserve reproof from Christ, but next best to be meek and quiet under it, and to count it a kindness, Ps. cxli. 5.

2nd. She kept her hope in Christ's mercy, that he would yet grant her desire. When we come to God in Christ for any mercy, two things discourage us. First. Sense of our own follies and infirmities; Surely such imperfect prayers as ours cannot speed. Secondly. Sense of our Lord's frowns and rebukes; afflictions are continued, deliverances delayed, and God seems angry at our prayers. This was the case of the mother of our Lord here, and yet she encouraged herself with hope that he will at length give in an answer of peace; to teach us to wrestle with God by faith and fervency in prayer, even then when he seems in his providence to walk contrary to us. We must, "against hope, believe in hope," Rom. iv. 18.

3rd. She directed the servants to have an eye to him immediately, and not to make their applications to her, as it is probable they had done. She quits all pretensions to an influence upon him, or intercession with him; let their souls wait only on him, Ps. lxii. 5.

4th. She directed them punctually to observe his orders, without disputing or asking questions. Being conscious to herself of a fault in prescribing to him, she cautions the servants to take heed of the same fault, and to attend both his time and his way for supply; "whatsoever he saith unto you, do it," though you may think it never so improper. If he saith, Give the guests water when they call for wine, do it; if he saith, Pour out from the bottoms of the vessels that are spent, do it; he can make a few drops of wine multiply to so many draughts. Note, Those that expect Christ's favours must with an implicit obedience observe his orders. The way of duty is the way to mercy; and Christ's methods must not be objected against.

4. Christ did at length miraculously supply them, for he is often better than his word, but never worse.

1st. The miracle itself was turning water into wine. The substance of water acquiring a new form, and having all the accidents and qualities of wine. Such a transformation is a miracle; but the popish transubstantiation, the substance changed but the accidents remaining the same, is a monster. By this Christ shewed himself to be the God of nature, who maketh the earth to bring forth wine, Ps. civ. 14, 15. The extracting the blood of the grape every year from the moisture of the earth is no less a work of power, though, being according to the common law of nature, it is not such a work of wonder as this. The beginning of Moses' miracles was turning water into blood, Ex. iv. 9; vi. 20; the beginning of Christ's miracles was turning water into wine, which intimates the difference between the law of Moses and the Gospel of Christ. The curse of the law turns water into blood, common comforts into bitterness and terror, the blessing of the Gospel turns water into wine. Christ hereby shewed that his errand into the world was to lighten and improve creature comforts to all believers, and make them comforts indeed. Shiloh is said to wash his garments in wine, Gen. xlix. 11; the water for washing being turned into wine. And the Gospel call is, "Come ye to the waters, and buy wine," Isa. lv. 1.

2nd. The circumstances of it magnified it, and freed it from all suspicion of cheat or collusion; for,

First. It was done in water-pots; ver. 6, "There were set there six water-pots of stone." Observe, 1st. For what use these water-pots were intended, namely, for their legal purifications from ceremonial pollutions, enjoined by the law of God, and many more by the tradition of the elders. The Jews eat not except they wash oft," Mar. vii. 3; and they used much water in their washing, for which reason here were six large water-pots provided. It was a saying among them, Qui multa utitur aqua in lavando, multus consequetur in hoc mundo divitias.—He who uses much water in washing will gain much wealth in this world. 2nd. To what use Christ put them; quite different from what they were intended; to be the receptacles of the miraculous wine. Thus Christ came to bring in the grace of the Gospel, which is as wine, that cheereth God and man, Jud. ix. 13; instead of the shadows of the law, which were as water, weak and beggarly elements. These were water-pots that had never been used to have wine in them; and of stone, which is not apt to retain the scent of former liquors, if ever they had had wine in them. They contained "two or three firkins apiece;" two or three measures, baths, or ephahs; the quantity is uncertain, but very considerable. We may be sure it was not intended to be all drunk at this feast, but for a farther kindness to the new-married couple, as the multiplied oil was to the poor widow, out of which she might pay her debt, and live of the rest, 2 Kin. iv. 7. Christ gives like himself; gives abundantly, according to his riches in glory. It is the penman's language to say they contained two or three firkins, for the Holy Spirit could have ascertained just how much; thus, ch. vi. 19, to teach us to speak cautiously, and not confidently, of those things whereof we have not good assurance.

Secondly. The water-pots were filled up to the brim by the servants, at Christ's word, ver. 7. As Moses the servant of the Lord, when God bade him, went to the rock to draw water, so these servants, when Christ bade them, went to the water to fetch wine. Note, Since no difficulties can be opposed to the arm of God's power, no improbabilities are to be objected against the word of his command.

Thirdly. The miracle was wrought suddenly, and in such a manner as greatly magnified it. As soon as they had filled the water-pots, presently he said, "Draw out now," ver. 8. It was done, 1st. Without any ceremony in the eye of the spectators. One would have thought, as Naaman, he should have come out and stood, and called on the name of God, 2 Kin. v. 11; no, he sits still in his place, saith not a word, but wills the thing, and so works it. Note, Christ doth great things and marvellous without noise, works manifest changes in a hidden way. Sometimes Christ, in working miracles, used words and signs, but it was for their sakes that stood by, ch. xi. 47. 2nd. Without any hesitation or uncertainty in his own breast. He did not say, "Draw out now," and let me taste it, questioning whether the thing were done as he willed it, or no; but with the greatest assurance imaginable, though it was his first miracle, he recommends it to the master of the feast first. As he knew what he would do, so he knew what he could do, and made no essays in his work; but all was good, very good, even in the beginning.

Our Lord Jesus directed the servants, First. To draw it out; not let it alone in the vessel to be admired, but draw it out to be drunk. Note, 1. Christ's works are all for use; he gives no man a talent to be buried, but to be traded with. Has he turned thy water into wine, given thee knowledge and grace? It is to profit withal, and therefore draw out now. 2. Those that would know Christ must make trial of him; must attend upon him in the use of ordinary means, and then may expect extraordinary influences. That which is laid up for all that fear God, is wrought for those that trust in him, Ps. xxxi. 19, that, by the

ii. 6. A "firkin" is equal to the Hebrew "bath" (2 Chron. iv. 5), containing, according to Jewish measure, 7½ gallons; according to Attic measure, 9. Each of these jars, therefore, held about 20 gallons, and were used for washings at such feasts. The number of guests usually invited and the length of the festivities may well account for the quantity of wine thus supplied.

ii. 9. "Governor of the feast:" probably a friend of the bridegroom.

ii. 12. "Not many days:" mentioned to show that Christ lost no time in publicly exercising his ministry.

ii. 13. "Jews' Passover:" this was the first Passover during our Lord's ministry.

ii. 22. "When therefore he was risen from the dead:" observe that the full depths of a prediction are not understood till the fulfilment; not till the predicted event has germinated can the full meaning of the prophecy be fathomed. Hence the mistake of those exercise of faith, draw out what is laid up. Secondly. To present it to the governor of the feast. Some think this governor of the feast was only the chief guest, that sat at the upper end of the table; and if so, surely our Lord Jesus should have had that place, for he was upon all accounts the principal guest; but it seems another had the uppermost room, probably one that loved it, Mat. xxiii. 6, and chose it, Lu. xiv. 7; and Christ, according to his own rule, sat down in the lowest room. But though he was not treated as the master of the feast, he kindly approved himself a friend to the feast; and if not its founder, yet its best benefactor. Others think this governor was the inspector and monitor of the feast: the same with Plutarch's symposiarcha, whose office it was to see that each had enough, and none did exceed, and that there were no indecencies or disorders. Note, Feasts have need of governors, because too many, when they are at feasts, have not the government of themselves. Some think this governor was the chaplain, some priest or Levite, that craved a blessing, and gave thanks; and Christ would have the cup brought to him, that he might bless it, and bless God for it; for the extraordinary tokens of Christ's presence and power were not to supersede or jostle out the ordinary rules and methods of piety and devotion.

Fourthly. The wine which was thus miraculously provided was of the best and richest wine, which was acknowledged by the governor of the feast; and that it was really so, and not his fancy, is certain, because he knew not whence it was, ver. 9, 10. 1st. It was certain this was wine. The governor knew that when he drank it, though he knew not whence it was; the servants knew whence it was, but had not yet tasted it. If the taster had seen the drawing of it, or the drawers had had the tasting of it, something might have been imputed to fancy; but now no room is left for suspicion. 2nd. That it was the best wine. Note, Christ's works commend themselves even to those that know not their author. The products of miracles were always the best in their kind. This wine had a stronger body, and better flavour, than ordinary. This the governor of the feast takes notice of to the bridegroom, with an air of easiness, as uncommon. First. The common method was otherwise. Good wine is brought out to the best advantage at the beginning of a feast, when the guests have their heads clear, and their appetites fresh, and can relish it, and will commend it; but when they have well drunk, when their heads are muddy and their appetites palled, good wine is but thrown away upon them, worse will serve them. See the vanity of all the pleasures of sense, they soon surfeit, but never satisfy; the longer they are enjoyed, the less pleasant they grow. Secondly. This bridegroom obliged his friends with a reserve of the best wine for the grace-cup: "Thou hast kept the good wine till now;" not knowing whom they were indebted to for this good wine, he returns the thanks of the table to the bridegroom. "She did not know that I gave her corn and wine," Hab. ii. 8. Now,

1. Christ, in providing thus plentifully for the guests, though he hereby allows a sober, cheerful use of wine, especially in times of rejoicing, Neh. viii. 10, yet he doth not invalidate his own caution, nor invade it in the least, which is, that our hearts be not "at any time," no, not at a marriage feast, "overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness," Lu. xxi. 34. When Christ provided so much good wine for them that had well drunk, he intended to try their sobriety, and to teach them how to abound, as well as how to want. Temperance perforce is a thankless virtue; but if Divine providence give us abundance of the delights of sense, and Divine grace enable us to use them moderately, this is self-denial that is praiseworthy. He also intended that some should be left for the confirmation of the truth of the miracle to the faith of others. And we have reason to think that the guests at this table were so well taught, or at least were now so well awed by the presence of Christ, that none of them abused this wine to excess. And those two considerations drawn from this story may be sufficient at any time to fortify us against temptations to intemperance: 1st. That our meat and drink are the gifts of God's bounty to us, and we owe our liberty to use them, and our comfort in the use of them, to the mediation of Christ: it is therefore ungrateful and impious to abuse them. 2nd. That, wherever we are, Christ has his eye upon us; we should eat bread before God, Ex. xviii. 12, and then we should not feed ourselves without fear.

2. He hath given us a specimen of the method he takes in dealing with those that deal with him, which is to reserve the best for the last; and therefore they must deal upon trust. The recompence of their services and sufferings is reserved for the other world; it is a glory to be revealed. The pleasures of sin give their colour in the cup, but at the last bite; but the pleasures of religion will be pleasures for evermore.

In the conclusion of this story, ver. 11, we are told, 1st. That this was "the beginning of miracles" which Jesus did. Many miracles had been wrought concerning him at his birth and baptism, and he himself was the greatest miracle of all; but this was the first that was wrought by him. He could have wrought miracles when he disputed with the doctors, but his hour was not come. He had power, but there was a time of the hiding of his power. 2nd. That herein he manifested his glory; hereby he proved himself to be the Son of God, and his glory to be that of the only begotten of the Father. He also discovered the nature and end of his office; the power of a God, and the grace of a Saviour appearing in all his miracles, and particularly in this, manifested the glory of the long-expected Messiah. 3rd. That "his disciples believed on him." Those whom he had called, ch. i., who had seen no miracle, and yet followed him, now saw this, shared in it, and had their faith strengthened by it. Note, First. Even the faith that is true, at first is but weak. The strongest men were once babes, so were the strongest Christians. Secondly. The manifesting of the glory of Christ is the great confirmation of the faith of Christians.

12 After this he went down to Capernaum, he, and his mother, and his brethren, and his disciples: and they continued there not many days. 13 And the Jews' passover was at hand, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem, 14 And found in the temple those that sold oxen and sheep and doves, and the changers of money sitting: 15 And when he had made a scourge of small cords, he drove them all out of the temple, and the sheep, and the oxen; and poured out the changers' money, and overthrew the tables; 16 And said unto them that sold doves, Take these things hence; make not my Father's house an house of merchandise. 17 And his disciples remembered that it was written, The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up. 18 Then answered the Jews and said unto him, What sign shewest thou unto us, seeing that thou doest these things? 19 Jesus answered and said unto them, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. 20 Then said the Jews, Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days? 21 But he spake of the temple of his body. 22 When therefore he was risen from the dead, his disciples remembered that he had said this unto them; and they believed the scripture, and the word which Jesus had said.

Here we have,

First. The short visit Christ made to Capernaum, ver. 12. It was a large and populous city, about a day's journey from Cana; it is called his own city, Mat. ix. 1, because he made it his head-quarters in Galilee, and what little rest he had was there. It was a place of concourse, and therefore Christ chose it, that the fame of his doctrine and miracles might from thence spread the further. Observe,

1. The company that attended him thither; "his mother, his brethren, and his disciples." Wherever Christ went, 1st. He would not go alone, but would take those with him who had put themselves under his conduct, that he might instruct them, and they might attest his miracles. 2nd. He should not go alone, but they would follow him, because they liked the sweetness either of his doctrine or of his wine, ch. vi. 26. His mother, though he had lately given her to understand that, in the works of his ministry, he should pay no more respect to her than to any other person, yet followed him; not to intercede with him, but to learn of him. His brethren also, and relations, that were at the marriage, and were wrought upon by the miracle there; and his disciples, who attended him wherever he went. It should seem people were more affected with Christ's miracles at first than they were afterwards, when custom made them seem less strange.

2. His continuance there, which was at this time "not many days," designing now only to begin the acquaintance he would afterwards improve there. Christ was still upon the remove, would not confine his usefulness to one place, because many needed him; and he would teach his followers to look upon themselves but as sojourners in this world, and his ministers to follow their opportunities, and go where their work led them. We do not now find Christ in the synagogues, but he privately instructed his friends, and thus entered upon his work by degrees. It is good for young ministers to accustom themselves to pious and edifying discourse in private, that they may with the better preparation and greater awe approach their public work. He did not stay long at Capernaum, because the passover was at hand, and he must attend it at Jerusalem, for every thing is beautiful in its season. The less good must give way to the greater; and all the dwellings of Jacob must veil to the gates of Zion.

Secondly. The passover he kept at Jerusalem; it is the first after his baptism; and the evangelist takes notice of all the passovers he kept henceforward, which were four in all; the fourth, that at which he suffered, (three years after this,) and half a year was now past since his baptism. Christ, being made under the law, observed the passover at Jerusalem: see Ex. xxiii. 17. Thus he taught us by his example a strict observance of Divine institutions, and a diligent attendance on religious assemblies. He went up to Jerusalem when the passover was at hand, that he might be there with the first. It is called the Jews' passover, because it was peculiar to them; Christ is our passover; now shortly God will no longer own it for his. Christ kept the passover at Jerusalem yearly, ever since he was twelve years old, in obedience to the law; but, now he is entered upon his public ministry, we may expect something more from him than before; and two things we are here told he did there:

1. He purged the temple, ver. 14-17. Observe here,

1. The first place we find him in at Jerusalem was the temple, and it shod ld seem he did not make any public appearance till he came thither; for his presence and preaching there was that glory of the latter house which was to exceed the glory of the former, Hag. ii. 9. It was foretold, Mal. iii. 1, "I will send my messenger," John Baptist; he never preached in the temple, but "the Lord, whom ye seek," he "shall suddenly come to his temple," suddenly after the appearing of John Baptist; so that this was the time, and the temple the place, when and where the Messiah was to be expected.

2. The first work that we find him at in the temple was the purging of it, for so it was foretold there, Mal. iii. 2, 3, "He shall sit as a refiner, and purify the sons of Levi." Now was come the time of reformation, Christ came to be the great reformer; and according to the method of the reforming kings of Judah, he first purged out what was amiss, (and that used to be passover work too, as in Hezekiah's time, 2 Chr. xxx. 14, 15, and Josiah's, 2 Kin. xxiii. 4, &c.) and then taught them to do well; first purge out the old leaven, and then keep the feast. Christ's design in coming into the world was to reform the world, and he expects that all who come to him should reform their hearts and lives, Gen. xxxv. 2. And this he has taught us by purging the temple. See here, who anticipate too minutely by human interpretations the unfolding of the Divine purposes.

1st. What were the corruptions that were to be purged out. He found a market in one of the courts of the temple, that which was called the court of the Gentiles, within the mountain of that house. There, First. They sold oxen, and sheep, and doves for sacrifice, we will suppose, not for common use, but for the convenience of those who came out of the country, and could not bring their sacrifices in specie along with them: see Deu. xiv. 24-26. This market perhaps had been kept by the pool of Bethesda, ch. v. 2, but was admitted into the temple by the chief priests for filthy lucre; for no doubt the rents for standing there, and fees for searching the beasts sold there, and certifying that they were without blemish, would be a considerable revenue to them. Great corruptions in the church owe their rise to the love of money, 1 Tim. vi. 5, 10. Secondly. They changed money for the convenience of those that were to pay a half shekel in specie every year, by way of poll, for the service of the tabernacle, Ex. xxx. 12; and no doubt they got by it.

ii. 24. "Did not commit himself," &c.: did not trust himself to them; i.e., did not regard them as sincere disciples.

ii. 25. "What was in man:" i.e., man in the abstract—man universally.

iii. 1. "Nicodemus:" a Greek name. He is mentioned three times (John vii. 50, xix. 39). "In these three notices a noble candour and a simple love of truth shine out in the midst of hesitation and the fear of man. We can, therefore, easily believe the tradition that after the resurrection . . . he became a professed disciple of Christ, and received baptism at the hands of Peter and John." "Ruler of the Jews:" a member of the Sanhedrim. He was also a teacher (verse 10).

iii. 2. "We know:" with regard to the plural here used, two opinions are held—1, That Nicodemus expresses the opinion which

2nd. What course our Lord took to purge out those corruptions. He had seen these in the temple formerly, when he was in a private station, but never went about to drive them out till now, when he had taken upon him the public character of a prophet. He did not complain to the chief priests, for he knew they countenanced those corruptions; but he himself.

First. Drove out the sheep and oxen, and those that sold them, out of the temple. He never used force to drive any into the temple, but only to drive those out that profaned it. He did not seize the sheep and oxen for himself, did not restrain and impound them, though he found them damage faisant,—“actual trespassers,” upon his Father’s ground; but only drove them out, and their owners with them. “He made a scourge of small cords,” which probably they had left their sheep and oxen with, and thrown them away upon the ground, thence Christ gathered them. Sinners prepare the scourges with which they themselves will be driven out from the temple of the Lord. He did not make a scourge to chastise the offenders, his punishments are of another nature, but only to drive out the cattle; he aimed no farther than at reformation: see Rom. xiii. 3, 4. 2 Cor. x. 8.

Secondly. He “poured out the changers’ money,” τὸ σέμα,—“the small money,”—the nummorum famulus. In pouring out the money, he shewed his contempt of it; he threw it to the ground, to the earth, as it was. In overthrowing the tables he shewed his displeasure against those that make religion a matter of worldly gain. Money-changers in the temple are the scandal of it. Note, In reformation it is good to make thorough work. He drove them all out; and not only threw out the money, but in overturning the tables, threw out the trade too.

Thirdly. He “said to them that sold doves,” (sacrifices for the poor,) “Take these things hence.” The doves, though they took up less room, and were a less nuisance, than the oxen and sheep, yet must not be allowed there. The sparrows and swallows were welcome, but were left to God’s providence, Ps. lxxxiv. 3, but not the doves that were appropriated to man’s profit. God’s temple must not be made a pigeon-house. But see Christ’s prudence in his zeal. When he drove out the sheep and oxen, the owners might follow them; when he poured out the money, they might gather it up again; but if he had turned the doves flying, perhaps they could not have been retrieved: therefore to them that sold doves he said, “Take these things hence.” Note, Discretion must always guide and govern our zeal, that we do nothing unbecoming ourselves, or mischievous to others.

Fourthly. He gave them a good reason for what he did: “Make not my Father’s house a house of merchandise.” Reason for conviction should accompany force for correction.

1st. Here is a reason why they should not profane the temple; because it was the house of God, and not to be made a house of merchandise. Merchandise is a good thing in the exchange, but not in the temple. This was, First. To alienate that which was dedicated to the honour of God; it was sacrilege; it was robbing God. Secondly. It was to debase that which was solemn and awful, and to make it mean. Thirdly. It was to disturb and distract those services in which men ought to be most solemn, serious, and intent. It was particularly an affront to the sons of the stranger in their worship to be forced to herd themselves with the sheep and oxen, and to be distracted in their worship by the noise of a market, for this market was kept in the court of the Gentiles. Fourthly. It was to make the business of religion subservient to a secular interest; for the holiness of the place must advance the market, and promote the sale of their commodities. Those make God’s house a house of merchandise, 1. Whose minds are filled with cares about worldly business when they are attending on religious exercises, as those, Am. vii. 5; Eze. xxxiii. 31. 2. Who perform Divine offices for filthy lucre, and sell the gifts of the Holy Ghost, Acts viii. 18.

2nd. Here is a reason why he was concerned to purge it; because it is my Father’s house. And, First. Therefore he had authority to purge it, for he was faithful as a Son over his own house, Heb. iii. 5, 6. In calling God his Father, he intimates that he was the Messiah, of whom it was said, “he shall build a house for my name, and I will be his father,” 2 Sam. vii. 12, 13. Secondly. Therefore he had a zeal for the purging of it. It is my Father’s house, and therefore I cannot bear to see it profaned, and him dishonoured. Note, If God be our Father in heaven, and it be therefore our desire that his name may be sanctified, it cannot but be our grief to see it polluted.

Christ’s purging the temple thus may justly be reckoned among his wonderful works: Inter omnia signa quæ fecit Dominus, hoc mihi videtur esse mirabilissimum.—Of all Christ’s wonderful works, this appears to me the most wonderful.—Jerome. Considering, 1. That he did it without the assistance of any of his friends. Probably it had been no hard matter to have raised the mob, who had a great veneration for the temple, against the profaners of it; but Christ never countenanced any thing that was tumultuous or disorderly. There was none to uphold, but his own arm did it. 2. That he did it without the resistance of any of his enemies, either the market people themselves, or the chief priests, that gave them their licences, and had the posse templi,—“the temple force,” at their command. But the corruption was too plain to be justified. Sinners’ own consciences are reformers’ best friends. Yet that was not all; there was a Divine power put forth herein, a power over the spirits of men; and in this non-resistance of theirs, that Scripture was fulfilled, Mal. iii. 2, 3, “who shall stand when he appeareth?”

3. Here is the remark which his disciples made upon it; ver. 17, “they remembered that it was written, The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up.” They were somewhat surprised at first to see him whom they were directed to as the Lamb of God in such a heat; and him whom they believed to be the King of Israel take so little state upon him as to do this himself; but one Scripture came to their thoughts, which taught them to reconcile this action both with the meekness of the Lamb of God, and with the majesty of the King of Israel; for David, speaking of the Messiah, takes notice of his zeal for God’s house, as so great, that it even ate him up; it made him forget himself, Ps. lxxix. 9. Observe,

1st. The disciples came to understand the meaning of what Christ did, by remembering the Scriptures; “they remembered” now “that it was written.” Note, The word of God, and the works of God, do mutually explain and illustrate each other. Dark Scriptures are expounded by their accomplishment in Providence, and difficult providences are made easy by comparing them with the Scriptures. See of what great use it is to the disciples of Christ to be ready and mighty in the Scriptures, and to have their memories well stored with Scripture truths, by which they will be furnished for every good work.

2nd. The Scripture they remembered was very apposite; “the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up.” David was in this a type of Christ, that he was zealous for God’s house, Ps. cxxii. 2, 3; what he did for it was with all his might; see 1 Chr. xxix. 2; the latter part of that verse, Ps. lxxix. 9, is applied to Christ, Rom. xv. 3, as the former part of it here. All the graces that were to be found among the Old Testament saints were eminently in Christ, and particularly this of zeal for the house of God; and in them, as they were patterns to us, so they were types of him. Observe, First. Jesus Christ was zealously affected to the house of God; his church loved it, and was always jealous for its honour and welfare. Secondly. This zeal did even eat him up; it made him humble himself, and spend himself, and expose himself: “My zeal has consumed me,” Ps. cxix. 139. Zeal for the house of God forbids us to consult our own credit, ease, and safety, when they come in competition with our duty and Christ’s service, and sometimes carries on our souls in our duty so far, and so fast, that our bodies cannot keep pace with them, and makes us as deaf as our Master was to those who suggest, “spare thyself.” The grievances here redressed might seem but small, and such as should have been connived at; but such was Christ’s zeal, that he could not bear even them that sold and bought in the temple: Si ibi ebrios inveniret quid faceret Dominus! saith St. Austin,—“If he had found drunkards in the temple, how much more would he have been displeased!”

11. Christ, having thus purged the temple, gave a sign to those who demanded it to prove his authority for so doing. Observe here,

1. Their demand of a sign. “Then answered the Jews,” that is, the multitude of the people, with their leaders. Being Jews, they should rather have stood by him, and assisted him to vindicate the honour of their temple; but instead of that, they objected against it. Note, They who apply themselves in good earnest to the work of reformation, must expect to meet with opposition. And when they could object nothing against the thing itself, they questioned his authority to do it; “What sign shewest thou unto us,” to prove thyself authorized and commissioned to do these things? It was indeed a good work to purge the temple; but what had he to do to undertake it, who was in no office there? They looked upon it as an act of jurisdiction, and that he must prove himself “a prophet, yea, more than a prophet.” But was not the thing itself sign enough? His ability to drive so many from their posts without opposition, was a proof of his authority: he that was armed with such a Divine power, sure was armed with a Divine commission. What alleged these buyers and sellers that they fled, that they were driven back? Surely it was at the presence of the Lord, Ps. cxiv. 5, 7; no less a presence.

2. Christ’s answer to this demand, ver. 19. He did not immediately work a miracle to convince them, but gives them a sign in something to come, the truth of which must appear by the event, according to Deu. xviii. 21. Now,

1st. The sign that he gives them is his own death and resurrection. He refers them to that which would be, First. His last sign. If they would not be convinced by what they saw and heard, let them wait. Secondly. The great sign to prove him to be the Messiah; for concerning him, it was foretold that he should be bruised, Isa. liii. 5; cut off, Dan. ix. 6; and yet that he should not see corruption, Ps. xvi. 10. These things were fulfilled in the blessed Jesus; and therefore, “truly he was the Son of God,” and had authority in the temple, his Father’s house.

2nd. He foretells his death and resurrection, not in plain terms, as he often did to his disciples, but in figurative expressions, as afterwards, when he gave this for a sign, he called it the sign of the prophet Jonas; so here, “Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up.” Thus spake he to them who were willingly ignorant, in parables, that they might not perceive, Mat. xiii. 13. They that will not see, shall not see. Nay, this figurative speech used here proved such a stumblingblock to them, that it was produced in evidence against him at his trial, to prove him a blasphemer, Mat. xxvi. 60, 61. Had they humbly asked him the meaning of what he said, he would have told them, and it had been a savour of life unto life to them; but they were resolved to cavil, and it proved a savour of death unto death. They that would not be convinced were hardened; and the manner of the expression of this prediction occasioned the accomplishment of the prediction itself. First. He foretells his death by the Jews’ malice, in these words, “Destroy ye this temple;” that is, ye will destroy it, I know ye will; I will permit you to destroy it. Note, Christ, even at the beginning of his ministry, had a clear foresight of all his sufferings at the end of it, and yet went on cheerfully in it. It is good at setting out to expect the worst. Secondly. He foretells his resurrection by his own power: “in three days I will raise it up.” There were others that were raised, but Christ raised himself, resumed his own life.

Now he chose to express this by destroying and re-edifying the temple, 1st. Because he was now to justify himself in purging the temple which they had profaned; as if he should say, You that defile one temple will destroy another, and I will prove my authority to purge what you have defiled, by raising what you will destroy. The profaning of the temple is the destroying of it, and its reformation its resurrection. 2nd. Because the death of Christ was indeed the destruction of the Jewish temple, the procuring cause of it; and his resurrection was the raising up of another temple, the gospel church, Zec. vi. 12. The ruin of their place and nation, ch. xi. 48, were the riches of the world: see Am. ix. 11; Acts xv. 16.

3. Their cavil at this answer; ver. 20, “Forty and six years was this temple in building,”—“temple work was always slow work,”—and canst thou make such quick work of it? Now here, 1st. They shew some knowledge; they could tell how long the temple was in building. Dr. Lightfoot computes that it was just forty-six years from the founding of Zerubbabel’s temple, in the second year of Cyrus, to the complete settlement of the temple service, in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes; and also, that from Herod’s beginning to build this temple, in the eighteenth year of his reign, to this very time, when the Jews said this, was just forty-six years. “Forty and six years,” ῥηκοδονία, hath this temple been built.” 2nd. They shew more ignorance, First. Of the meaning of Christ’s words. Note, Men often run into gross mistakes by understanding literally what the Scripture speaks figuratively. What abundance of mischief has been done by interpreting “This is my body,” after a corporal and carnal manner. Secondly. Of the almighty power of Christ, as if he could do no more than another man. Had they known that this was he who built all things in six days, they would not have made it such an absurdity that he should build a temple in three days.

4. A vindication of Christ’s answer from their cavil. The difficulty is soon solved by explaining the terms; “he spake of the temple of his body,” ver. 21. Though Christ had discovered a great respect for the temple, in purging it, yet he will have us know that the holiness of it, which he was so jealous for, was but typical, and leads us to the consideration of another temple, which that was but a shadow of, the substance being Christ, Heb. ix. 9; Col. ii. 17. Some think, when he said, Destroy this temple, he pointed to his own body, or laid his hand upon it; however, it is certain “he spake of the temple of his body.” Note, The body of Christ is the true temple, of which that at Jerusalem was a type. 1st. Like the temple, it was built by immediate Divine direction, 1 Chr. xxviii. 19; “a body hast thou prepared me.” 2nd. Like the temple, it was a holy house; it is called “that holy thing.” 3rd. It was like the temple, the habitation of God’s glory; there the eternal Word dwelt, the true Shechinah. He is Emmanuel, “God with us.” 4th. The temple was the place and medium of intercourse between God and Israel; there God revealed himself to them, there they presented themselves and their services to him. Thus by Christ God speaks to us, and we speak to him. Worshipers looked towards that house, 1 Kin. viii. 30, 35; so we must worship God with an eye to Christ.

5. A reflection which the disciples made upon this long after, inserted here to illustrate the story; ver. 22, “when he was risen from the dead,” some years after, “his disciples remembered that he had said this.” We found them, ver. 17, remembering what had been written before of him, and here remem-was gaining currency among the rulers, that Jesus was divinely sent; 2, That he uses the plural in order to avoid committing himself to an expression of his own personal convictions. “These miracles,” i.e., those mentioned in chap. ii. 23. “Teacher,” Alfred notices the cautiousness which pervades the whole of this passage, both in his addressing our Lord only as a “teacher,” whereas the Jews looked for the Messiah as a king and prophet, and also in the words, “No man can do, &c., except God be with him,” which form a disappointing explanation of the former expression, “come from God.”

iii. 3. “Born again,” or anew, afresh—from the very beginning. The Rabbins designated the proselyte “a new creature.” Christ’s answer is not to be considered irrelevant. It bears directly upon the question of Nicodemus, and notably the weakness it manifested; and shows that life, not knowledge, is the requisite of Christ’s kingdom. As Luther says, “My teaching is not of doing, leaving undone, but bering what they had heard from him. Note, The memories of Christ's disciples should be like the treasure of the good householder, furnished with things both new and old, Mat. xiii. 52. Now observe,

1st. When they remembered that saying: "when he was risen from the dead." It seems they did not at this time fully understand Christ's meaning, for they were as yet but babes in knowledge, but they laid it up in their hearts, and afterwards it became both intelligible and useful. Note, It is good to hear for the time to come, Isa. xlii. 23. The juniors in years and profession should treasure up those truths which at present they do not well understand either the meaning or use of, for they will be serviceable to them hereafter, when they come to greater proficiency. It was said of the scholars of Pythagoras that his precepts seemed to freeze in them till they were forty years old, and then they began to thaw; so this saying of Christ revived in the memories of his disciples "when he was risen from the dead;" and why then? First, Because then the Spirit was poured out to bring things to their remembrance which Christ had said to them, and to make them both easy and ready to them, ch. xiv. 26. That very day that Christ rose from the dead, he opened their understandings, Lu. xxiv. 45. Secondly, Because then this saying of Christ was fulfilled when the temple of his body had been destroyed and was raised again, and that upon the third day, then they remembered this among other words Christ had said to this purpose. Note, It contributes much to the understanding of the Scripture to observe the fulfilling of the Scripture. The event will expound the prophecy.

2nd. What use they made of it; "they believed the Scripture, and the word that Jesus had said;" that is, their belief of these was confirmed, and received fresh support and vigour. They were slow of heart to believe, Lu. xxiv. 25, but they were sure. The Scripture and the word of Christ are here put together, not because they concur, and exactly agree together, but because they mutually illustrate and strengthen each other. When the disciples saw both what they had read in the Old Testament, and what they had heard from Christ's own mouth, fulfilled in his death and resurrection, they were the more confirmed in their belief of both.

23 Now when he was in Jerusalem at the passover, in the feast day, many believed in his name, when they saw the miracles which he did. 24 But Jesus did not commit himself unto them, because he knew all men, 25 And needed not that any should testify of man: for he knew what was in man.

We have here an account of the success, the poor success, of Christ's preaching and miracles at Jerusalem, while he kept the passover there. Observe,

First. That our Lord Jesus, when he was at Jerusalem, at the passover, did preach and work miracles. People's believing on him implied that he preached; and it is expressly said, they saw the miracles he did. He was now in Jerusalem, the holy city, whence the Word of the Lord was to go forth; his residence was mostly in Galilee, and therefore when he was in Jerusalem he was very busy. The time was holy time, the feast day, time appointed for the service of God; at the passover the Levites taught the good knowledge of the Lord, 2 Chr. xxx. 22, and Christ took that opportunity of preaching, when the concourse of people was great, and thus he would own and honour the Divine institution of the passover.

Secondly. That hereby many were brought to believe in his name, to acknowledge him a teacher come from God, as Nicodemus did, ch. iii. 2, a great prophet; and probably some of those who looked for redemption in Jerusalem, believed him to be the Messiah promised; so ready were they to welcome the first appearance of that bright and morning star.

Thirdly. That yet "Jesus did not commit himself unto them," ver. 24; οὐκ ἐπιτίθειν ἑαυτὸν αὐτοῖς;—he did not trust himself with them. It is the same word that is used for believing in him. So that to believe in Christ, is to commit ourselves to him, and to his conduct. Christ did not see cause to repose any confidence in these new converts at Jerusalem, where he had many enemies that sought to destroy him, either, 1. Because they were false, at least some of them, and would betray him if they had an opportunity, or were strongly tempted to it. He had more disciples that he could trust among the Galileans, than among the dwellers at Jerusalem. In dangerous times and places, it is wisdom to take heed who you confide in; μὴ μένῃς ἀμαρτεῖν;—learn to distrust. Or, 2. Because they were weak, and I would hope that this was the worst of it; not that they were treacherous, and designed him a mischief; but, 1st. They were timorous, and wanted zeal and courage, and might perhaps be frightened to do an ill thing. In times of difficulty and danger, cowards are not fit to be trusted. Or, 2nd. They were tumultuous, and wanted discretion and conduct. These in Jerusalem perhaps had their expectations more raised than others of the temporal reign of the Messiah, and in that expectation would be ready to give some bold strokes at the government, if Christ would have committed himself to them, and put himself at the head of them; but he would not, for his kingdom is not of this world. We should be shy of turbulent, unquiet people, as our Master here was, though they profess to believe in Christ, as these did.

Fourthly. That the reason why he did not commit himself to them was, because he knew them, ver. 25, knew the wickedness of some, and weakness of others. The evangelist takes this occasion to assert Christ's omniscience.

1. "He knew all men," not only their names and faces, as it is possible for us to know many, but their nature, dispositions, affections, designs, so as we do not know any man, scarce ourselves. He knows all men, for his powerful hand made them all, his piercing eye sees them all, sees into them. He knows his subtle enemies, and all their secret projects; his false friends, and their true characters; what they really are, whatever they pretend to be. He knows them that are truly his, knows their integrity, and knows their infirmity too. He knows their frame.

2. He "needed not that any should testify of man." His knowledge was not by information from others, but by his own infallible intuition. It is the infelicity of earthly princes, that they must see with other men's eyes, and hear with other men's ears, and take things as they are represented to them; but Christ goes purely upon his own knowledge. Angels are his messengers, but not his spies, for his own eyes run to and fro through the earth, 2 Chr. xvi. 9. This may comfort us in reference to Satan's accusations, that Christ will not take men's characters from him.

3. "He knew what was in man;" in particular persons, in the nature and race of man. We know what is done by men, Christ knows what is in them, tries the heart and the reins. This is the prerogative of that essential, eternal Word, Heb. iv. 12, 13; we invade his prerogative if we presume to judge men's hearts. How fit is Christ to be the Saviour of men; very fit to be the physician, who hath such a knowledge of the patient's state and case, temper and distemper; knows what is in him. How fit also to be the judge of all, for the judgment of him who knows all men, all in men, must needs be according to truth.

Now this is all the success of Christ's preaching and miracles at Jerusalem in this journey. The Lord comes to his temple, and none come to him but a parcel of weak, simple people, that he can neither have credit from, nor put confidence in; yet he shall at length "see of the travail of his soul."

CHAPTER III.

In this chapter we have, I. Christ's discourse with Nicodemus, a Pharisee, concerning the great mysteries of the Gospel, which he here privately lets him into, ver. 1—21. II. John Baptist's discourse with his disciples concerning Christ, upon occasion of his coming into the neighbourhood where he was, ver. 22—36, in which he fairly and faithfully resigns all his honour and interest to him.

HERE was a man of the Pharisees, named Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews: 2 The same came to Jesus by night, and said unto him, Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him. 3 Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. 4 Nicodemus saith unto him, How can a man be born when he is old? can he enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born? 5 Jesus answered, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. 6 That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. 7 Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again. 8 The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit. 9 Nicodemus answered and said unto him, How can these things be? 10 Jesus answered and said unto him, Art thou a master of Israel, and knowest not these things? 11 Verily, verily, I say unto thee, We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen; and ye receive not our witness. 12 If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things? 13 And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven. 14 And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: 15 That whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life. 16 For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. 17 For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved. 18 He that believeth on him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God. 19 And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and of a change in the man; so that it is not new works done, but a new man to do them—not another life only, but another birth." It is what to be, rather than what to do, which is so conspicuous in New Testament teaching. "Cannot see," or understand. On "the kingdom of God," see Rom. xiv. 17. Webster and Wilkinson remark: "The two ideas most familiar to the mind of every Jew, and especially of every Jewish teacher at this time, were: 1. The kingdom of God promised in prophecy, expected under the Messiah, and recently proclaimed as near by John the Baptist; 2. Birth in the family of Abraham as the indispensable and indeed sole qualification for the inheritance of the privileges of this kingdom. Our Lord's words were addressed to both of these ideas, especially the latter. By this single sentence he swept away the erroneous, and established the true doctrine of the kingdom of God, and of the qualification for it."

iii. 8. "The wind:" rather, a gentle breeze. "Bloweth," or better, men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. 20 For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. 21 But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God.

We found in the close of the foregoing chapter, that few were brought to Christ at Jerusalem; yet here was one, a considerable one; it is worth while to go a great way for the salvation though but of one soul. Observe,

First. Who this Nicodemus was. Not many mighty and noble are called; yet some are, and here was one. Not many of the rulers, or of the Pharisees; yet, 1. This was a man of the Pharisees, bred to learning, a scholar; let it not be said that all Christ's followers are unlearned and ignorant men. The principles of the Pharisees, and the peculiarities of their sect, were directly contrary to the spirit of Christianity; yet there were some, in whom even those high thoughts were cast down, and brought into obedience to Christ. The grace of Christ is able to subdue the greatest opposition. 2. He was a ruler of the Jews, a member of the great Sanhedrim, a senator, a privy-counsellor, a man of authority in Jerusalem. As bad as things were, there were some rulers well inclined, who yet could do little good, because the stream was so strong against them; they were overruled by the majority, and yoked with those that were corrupt, so that the good which they would do, they could not do it; yet Nicodemus continued in his place, and did what he could, when he could not do what he would.

Secondly. His solemn address to our Lord Jesus Christ, ver. 2. See here, 1. When he came. "He came to Jesus by night." Observe,

1st. He made a private and particular address to Christ, and did not think it enough to hear his public discourses. He resolved to talk with him by himself, where he might be free with him. Personal converse with skilful, faithful ministers about the affairs of our souls would be of great use to us, Mal. ii. 7.

2nd. He made this address by night, which may be considered either, First. As an act of prudence and discretion. Christ was engaged all day in public work, and he would not interrupt him then, nor expect his attendance then, but observed Christ's hour, and waited on him when he was at leisure. Note, Private advantages to ourselves and our own families, must give way to those that are public, and of more general use. The greater good must be preferred before the less. Christ had many enemies; and therefore Nicodemus came incognito to him, lest if the chief priests had known it, they should have been the more enraged against Christ. Secondly. As an act of zeal and forwardness. Nicodemus was a man of business, and could not spare time all day to make Christ a visit, and therefore he would rather take time from the diversions of the evening, or the rest of the night, than not converse with Christ. When others were sleeping, he was getting knowledge, as David by meditation, Ps. lxxiii. 6; cxix. 148. Probably it was the very next night after he saw Christ's miracles, and he would not slip the first opportunity of pursuing his convictions. He knew not how soon Christ might leave the town, nor what might happen betwixt that and another feast, and therefore would lose no time. In the night his converse with Christ would be more free, and less liable to disturbance; these were noctes Christianae,—Christian nights, much more instructive than the noctes Atticæ,—Attic nights. Or, Thirdly. As an act of fear and cowardice. He was afraid or ashamed to be seen with Christ, and therefore came in the night. When religion is out of fashion, there are many Nicodemites, especially among the rulers, who have a better affection to Christ and his religion than they would be known to have. But observe, 1st. Though he came by night, Christ bade him welcome, accepted his integrity, and pardoned his infirmity; considered his temper, which perhaps was timorous, and the temptation he was in from his place and office; and thereby taught his ministers to become all things to all men, and to encourage good beginnings though they are weak. Paul preached "privately to them of reputation," Gal. ii. 2. 2nd. Though now he came by night, yet afterwards, when there was occasion, he owned Christ publicly, ch. vii. 50; xix. 30. The grace which is at first but a grain of mustard seed may grow to be a gr at tree.

2. What he said. He did not come to talk with Christ about politics, and state affairs, though he was a ruler; but about the concerns of his own soul and its salvation, and without circumspection comes presently to the business; he calls Christ, Rabbi, which signifies a great man, see Isa. xix. 20: "He shall send them a Saviour, and a great one;" a Saviour and a Rabbi; so the word is. There is hopes of those who have a respect for Christ, and think and speak honourably of him. He tells Christ how far he had attained; "we know that thou art a teacher." Observe,

1st. His assertion concerning Christ: "thou art a teacher come from God;" not educated or ordained by men, as other teachers, but supported with Divine inspiration, and Divine authority. He that was to be the sovereign ruler came first to be a teacher, for he would rule with reason, not with rigour,—by the power of truth, not of the sword. The world lay in ignorance and mistake; the Jewish teachers were corrupt, and caused them to err; "It is time for the Lord to work." He came a teacher from God, from God as the Father of mercies, in pity to a dark deceived world; from God as the Father of lights, and fountain of truth; all that light and truth which we may venture our souls upon.

2nd. His assurance of it; "we know," not only I, but others; so he took it for granted, the thing being so plain and self-evident; perhaps he knew that there were divers of the Pharisees and rulers with whom he conversed, that were under the same convictions, but had not the grace to own it. Or, we may suppose he speaks in the plural number, we know, because he brought with him one or more of his friends and pupils, to receive instructions from Christ, knowing them to be of common concern. Master, saith he, we come with a desire to be taught, to be thy scholars, for we are fully satisfied thou art a Divine teacher.

3rd. The ground of this assurance; "no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him." Here, First. We are assured of the truth of Christ's miracles, and that they were not counterfeit. Here was Nicodemus, a judicious, sensible, inquisitive man, one that had all the reason and opportunity imaginable to examine them, was so fully satisfied they were real miracles, that he was wrought upon by them to go contrary to his interest, and the stream of those of his own rank, who were prejudiced against Christ. Secondly. We are directed what inference to draw from Christ's miracles; therefore we are to receive him as "a teacher come from God." His miracles were his credentials. The course of nature could not be altered but by the power of the God of nature, who we are sure is the God of truth and goodness, and would never set his seal to a lie, or a cheat.

Thirdly. The discourse between Christ and Nicodemus hereupon, or rather the sermon Christ preached to him; the contents of it, and that perhaps an abstract of Christ's public preaching; see ver. 11, 12. Four things our Saviour here discoursed of:

1. Concerning the necessity and nature of regeneration, or the new birth, ver. 3–8. Now we must consider this,

1. As pertinently answered to Nicodemus' address. "Jesus answered," ver. 3. This answer was either, 1st. A rebuke of what he saw defective in the address of Nicodemus. It was not enough for him to admire Christ's miracles, and acknowledge his mission, but he must be born again. It is plain he expected the kingdom of heaven, that is, the kingdom of the Messiah, now shortly to appear; is betimes aware of the dawning of that day; and, according to the common notion of the Jews, he expects it to appear in external pomp and power; doubts not but this Jesus who works these miracles, is either the Messiah, or his prophet; and therefore makes his court to him, compliments him, and so hopes to secure a share to himself of the advantages of that kingdom. But Christ tells him he can have no benefit by that change of the state, unless there be a change of the spirit, of the principles and dispositions, equivalent to a new birth. Nicodemus came by night; but this will not do, saith Christ. His religion must be owned before men; so Dr. Hammond. Or, 2nd. A reply to what he saw designed in his address. When Nicodemus owned Christ a teacher come from God, one intrusted with an extraordinary revelation from heaven, he plainly intimated a desire to know what it was, and a readiness to receive it, and Christ gives it him.

2. We may consider this as positively and vehemently asserted by our Lord Jesus; "Verily, verily, I say unto thee," "I, the Amen, the Amen, say it;" so it may be read; I, the faithful and true witness. The matter is settled irreversibly, that "except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God;" I say it unto thee, though a Pharisee, though a master of Israel. Observe,

1st. What it is that is required,—to be born again: that is, First. We must live a new life. Birth is the beginning of life; to be born again is to begin anew, as those that have hitherto lived either much amiss, or to little purpose. We must not think to patch up the old building, but begin from the foundation. Secondly. We must have a new nature, new principles, new affections, new aims. We must be born anew, which signifies both denovo,—again, and desuper,—from above. 1st. We must be born anew, so the word is taken, Gal. iv. 9, and ab initio,—from the beginning, Lu. i. 3. By our first birth we were corrupt, shapen in sin and iniquity, we must therefore undergo a second birth; our souls must be fashioned and enlivened anew. 2nd. We must be born from above, so the word is used by the evangelist, ch. iii. 31; xix. 11; and I take it to be especially intended here, not excluding the other; for to be born from above supposeth being born again. But this new birth has its rise from heaven, ch. i. 13, and its tendency to heaven. It is to be born to a divine and heavenly life, a life of communion with God and the upper world, and in order to this, it is to partake of a divine nature, and bear the image of the heavenly.

2nd. The indispensable necessity of this; "except a man" (any one that partakes of the human nature, and consequently of the corruptions of that, except he) "be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God,"—the kingdom of the Messiah, begun in grace and perfected in glory. Except we be born from above, we cannot see this. That is, First. We cannot understand the nature of it. Such is the nature of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, (in which Nicodemus desired to be instructed,) that the soul must be new modelled and moulded; the natural man must become a spiritual man, before he is capable of receiving and understanding them, 1 Cor. ii. 14. Secondly. We cannot receive the comfort of it; cannot expect any benefit by Christ and his Gospel, nor have any part or lot in the matter. Note, Regeneration is absolutely necessary to our happiness here and hereafter. Considering what we are by nature, how corrupt and sinful; and that God is in whom alone we can be happy, and what heaven is to which the perfection of our happiness is reserved, it will appear in the nature of the thing that we must be born again; because it is impossible we should be happy if we be not holy; see 1 Cor. vi. 11, 12.

This great truth of the necessity of regeneration, being thus solemnly laid down,

1. It is objected against by Nicodemus, ver. 4: "How can a man be born when he is old?" old as I am, ἡλικίας μου,—being an old man; "Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born?" Herein appears,

1st. His weakness in knowledge; what Christ spoke spiritually he seems to have understood after a corporal and carnal manner, as if there were no other way of regenerating and new moulding an immortal soul but by new framing the body, and bringing that back to the rock out of which it was hewn; as if there were such a connexion between the soul and the body, that there could be no fashioning the heart anew but by forming the bones anew. Nicodemus, as others of the Jews, valued himself, no doubt, very much by his first birth, and the dignities and privileges of that; the place of it, the holy land, perhaps the holy city; his parentage, such as that which Paul could have gloried in, Phil. iii. 5; and therefore it is a great surprise to him to hear of being born again. Could he be better bred and born, than bred and born an Israelite? Or by any other birth stand fairer for a room in the kingdom of the Messiah? Indeed they looked upon a proselyted Gentile to be as one born again, or born anew; but could not imagine how a Jew, a Pharisee, could ever better himself by being born again; he therefore thinks if he must be born again, it must be of her that bare him first. They that are proud of their first birth are hardly brought to a new birth.

2nd. His willingness to be taught. He doth not turn his back upon Christ because of this hard saying, but ingenuously acknowledges his ignorance, which implies a desire to be better informed; and so I take this, rather than that he had such gross notions of the new birth Christ spoke of. Lord, make me to understand this, for it is a riddle to me; I am such a fool as to know no other way for a man to be born, but of his mother. When we meet with that in the things of God which is dark, and hard to be understood, we must with humility and industry continue our attendance upon the means of knowledge, till God shall reveal even that unto us.

2. It is opened and farther explained by our Lord Jesus, ver. 5–8. From the objection he takes occasion, 1st. To repeat and confirm what he had said, ver. 5: "Verily, verily, I say unto thee," the very same that I said before. Note, The word of Christ is not yea and nay, but yea and amen; what he said he will abide by, whoever saith against it; nor will he retract any of his sayings for the ignorance and mistakes of men. Though Nicodemus understood not the mystery of regeneration, yet Christ asserts the necessity of it as positively as before. Note, It is folly to think of evading the obligation of evangelical precepts, by pleading that they are unintelligible, Rom. iii. 3, 4.

2nd. To expound and clear what he had said concerning regeneration; for the explication of which he farther shews,

First. The author of this blessed change, and who it is that works it. To be born again is to be "born of the Spirit," ver. 5, 6. It is not wrought by any wisdom or power of our own, but by the power and influence of the blessed Spirit of grace. It is the "sanctification of the Spirit," 1 Pet. i. 2; and "renewing

"breatheth." It is worth observing that our Lord, in speaking of the operation of the Divine in the sphere of the Spirit, uses illustrations from Nature. The breeze, the water, the flame are all used. The outer world is but the type of the inner, the material the figure of the spiritual. The things of Nature, as the ordinances of the Mosaic sanctuary, are the pattern of things in the mount of God. (See Acts vii. 44.)

iii. 12. "Earthly things," "heavenly things:" by the former may be meant the simpler and more elementary truths of Christ's revelation; by the latter the profounder mysteries.

iii. 13. "No man hath ascended;" Olshausen remarks, "The creature cannot by his own power penetrate into the eternal world. . . . But eternal love itself has indeed stooped, and in itself discloses to the humble all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge (Col. ii. 3). Lücke and Tholuck justly remark that the coming of the Son does not annul his existence in heaven, as if he were of the Holy Ghost." Tit. iii. 5. The Word he works by is his inspiration, and the heart to be wrought on he has access to.

Secondly. The nature of this change; and what that is which is wrought; it is spirit, ver. 6. Those that are regenerated are made spiritual, and refined from the dross and dregs of sensuality. The dictates and interests of the rational and immortal soul have retrieved the dominion they ought to have over the flesh. The Pharisees placed their religion in external purity, and external performances; and it would be a mighty change indeed with them, no less than a new birth, to become spiritual.

Thirdly. The necessity of this change.

1st. Christ here shews that it is necessary in the nature of the thing, for we are not fit to enter into the kingdom of God till we are born again; ver. 6. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." Here is our malady, and the cause of it, which are such as speak plain, that there is no remedy but we must be born again. First, We are here told what we are; we are flesh, not only corporeal but corrupt, Gen. vi. 3. The soul is still a spiritual substance, but so wedded to the flesh, so captivated by the will of the flesh, so in love with the delights of the flesh, so employed in making provision for the flesh, that it is justly called flesh; it is carnal. And what communion can there be between God who is a spirit, and a soul in this condition? Secondly. How we came to be so, by being born of the flesh. It is a corruption that is bred in the bone with us; and therefore we cannot have a new nature, but we must be born again. The corrupt nature which is flesh, takes rise from our first birth; and therefore, the new nature which is spirit, must take rise from a second birth. Nicodemus spoke of entering again into his mother's womb and being born; but if he could do so, to what purpose? If he were born of his mother a hundred times that would not mend the matter, for still "that which is born of the flesh is flesh;" a clean thing cannot be brought out of an unclean. He must seek for another original, must be born of the Spirit, or he cannot become spiritual. The case is in short this; man, though made to consist of body and soul, yet his spiritual part had then so much the dominion over his corporeal part, that he was denominated a living soul, Gen. ii. 7; but by indulging the appetite of the flesh in eating forbidden fruit, he prostituted the just dominion of the soul to the tyranny of sensual lust, and became no longer a living soul, but flesh; "dust thou art." The living soul became dead and inactive; thus in the day he sinned he surely died, and sadly; he became earthy. In this degenerated state, "he begat a son in his own likeness," he transmitted the human nature, which had been entirely deposited in his hands, thus corrupted and depraved; and in the same plight it is still propagated. Corruption and sin are woven into our nature; we are shapen in iniquity, which makes it necessary that the nature be changed. It is not enough to put on a new coat, or a new face, but we must put on the new man; we must be new creatures.

2nd. Christ makes it farther necessary by his own word; ver. 7. "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again." First. Christ hath said it, and as he himself never did nor ever will unsay it, so all the world cannot gainsay it, that we must be born again. He who is the great Lawgiver, whose will is a law; he who is the great Mediator of the new covenant, and has full power to settle the terms of our reconciliation to God, and happiness in him; he who is the great Physician of souls, knows their case, and what is necessary to their cure; he hath said, "Ye must be born again." I said unto thee that which all are concerned in, ye must, ye all, one as well as another, "ye must be born again." Not only the common people, but the rulers, the masters in Israel. Secondly. We are not to marvel at it; for when we consider the holiness of the God with whom we have to do, the great design of our redemption, the pravity of our nature, and the constitution of the happiness set before us, we shall not think it strange that so much stress is laid upon this as the one thing needful,—that we must be born again.

Fourthly. This change is illustrated by two comparisons:

1st. The regenerating work of the Spirit is compared to water, ver. 5. To be born again is to "be born of water, and of the Spirit," that is, of the Spirit working like water, as Mat. iii. 11, "with the Holy Ghost and with fire," means, with the Holy Ghost as with fire. First. That which is primarily intended here, is to shew that the Spirit in sanctifying a soul, 1. Cleanseth and purifieth it as water; takes away its filth by which it was unfit for the kingdom of God. It is the "washing of regeneration" Tit. iii. 2. "Ye are washed," 1 Cor. vi. 11: see Eze. xxxvi. 25. 2. Cools and refresheth it as water doth the hunted hart, and the weary traveller. The Spirit is compared to water, Isa. xlv. 3; ch. vii. 38, 39. In the first creation the fruits of heaven were born of water, Gen. i. 20; in allusion to which, perhaps, they that are born from above are said to be born of water. Secondly. It is probable Christ had an eye to the ordinance of baptism which John had used, and he himself had begun to use. You must be born again of the Spirit, which regeneration by the Spirit should be signified by washing with water, as the visible sign of that spiritual grace. Not that all they and they only that are baptized are saved, but without that new birth which is wrought by the Spirit, and signified by baptism, none shall be looked upon as the protected, privileged subjects of the kingdom of heaven. The Jews cannot partake of the benefits of the Messiah's kingdom they had so long looked for, unless they quit all expectation of being justified by the works of the law, and submit to "the baptism of repentance," the great Gospel duty, "for the remission of sins," the great Gospel privilege.

2nd. It is compared to wind; ver. 8. "The wind blows where it listeth, . . . so is every one that is born of the Spirit." The same word, πνευμα, signifies both the wind and the Spirit. The Spirit came upon the apostles in "a rushing mighty wind," Acts ii. 2. His strong influences on the hearts of sinners are compared to the breathing of the wind, Eze. xxxvii. 9; and his sweet influences on the souls of saints, to the north and south wind, Cant. iv. 16. This comparison is here used to shew, First. That the Spirit in regeneration works arbitrarily, and as a free agent. "The wind blows where it listeth" for us, and doth not attend our order, nor is subject to our command; God directs it, it fulfils his word, Ps. cxlviii. 8. The Spirit dispenseth his influences where, and when, on whom, and in what measure and degree he pleaseth, "dividing to every man severally as he will," 1 Cor. xii. 11. Secondly. That he works powerfully, and with evident effects; "thou hearest the sound thereof;" though its causes are hidden, its effects are manifest. When the soul is brought to mourn for sin, to groan under the burden of corruption, to breathe after Christ, to cry, Abba, Father, then we hear the sound of the Spirit; we find he is at work, as Acts ix. 11, "Behold, he prays." Thirdly. That he works mysteriously, and in secret hidden ways; "thou canst not tell whence it comes, or whither it goes;" how it gathers, and how it spends its strength, is a riddle to us; so the manner and methods of the Spirit's working is a mystery: "which way went the Spirit?" 1 Kin. xxii. 24; see Ecl. ix. 5, and compare it with Ps. cxxxix. 14.

II. Here is a discourse concerning the certainty and sublimity of Gospel truths, which Christ takes occasion for, from the weakness of Nicodemus. Here is,

1. The objection which Nicodemus still made; ver. 9, "How can these things be?" Christ's explication of the doctrine of the necessity of regeneration, it should seem, made it never the clearer to him. The corruption of nature which makes it necessary, and the way of the Spirit, which makes it practicable, are as much mysteries to him as the thing itself. Though he had in general owned Christ a Divine teacher, yet he was unwilling to receive his teachings, when they did not agree with the notions he had imbibed. Thus many profess to admit the doctrine of Christ in general, and yet will neither believe the truths of Christianity, nor submit to the laws of it farther than they please: Christ shall be their teacher, provided they may choose their lesson.

Now here, 1st. Nicodemus owns himself ignorant of Christ's meaning after all; "How can these things be?" They are things I do not understand, my capacity will not reach them. Thus "the things of the Spirit of God are foolishness to the natural man;" he is not only estranged from them, and therefore they are dark to him, but prejudiced against them, and therefore they are foolishness to him. 2nd. Because this doctrine was unintelligible to him (so he was pleased to make it) he questions the truth of it; as if, because it was a paradox to him, it was a chimera in itself. Many have such an opinion of their own capacity, as to think that that cannot be proved which they cannot believe; by wisdom they knew not Christ.

2. The reproof which Christ gave him for his dulness and ignorance; "Art thou a master in Israel;" διδάσκαλος,—"a teacher, a tutor;" one that sits in Moses's chair, and yet, not only unacquainted with the doctrine of regeneration, but incapable of understanding it? This word is a reproof, 1st. To those that undertake to teach others and yet are ignorant and unskilful in the Word of righteousness themselves. 2nd. To those that spend their time in learning and teaching notions and ceremonies in religion, niceties and criticisms in the Scripture, and neglect that which is practical, and tends to reform the heart and life. Two words in the reproof are very emphatical. First. The place where his lot was cast, "in Israel;" where there was such great plenty of the means of knowledge, where Divine revelation was. He might have learned this out of the Old Testament. Secondly. The things he was thus ignorant in; "these things" these necessary things, these great things, these Divine things; had he never read, Ps. i. 5, 10; Eze. xviii. 13; xxxvi. 25, 26?

3. Christ's discourse hereupon, of the certainty and sublimity of Gospel truths, ver. 11–13, to shew the folly of those who make strange of these things and to recommend them to our search. Observe here,

1st. That the truths Christ taught were very certain, and what we may venture upon; ver. 11, "We speak that we do know;" we; whom doth he mean besides himself? Some understand it of those that bore witness to him, and with him on earth; the prophets, and John Baptist, they spoke what they knew, and had seen, and were themselves abundantly satisfied in: Divine revelation carries its own proof along with it. Others, of those that bore witness from heaven, the Father and the Holy Ghost; the Father was with him, the Spirit of the Lord was upon him; therefore he speaks in the plural number, as ch. xiv. 13, "We will come unto him." Observe, First. That the truths of Christ are of undoubted certainty. We have all the reason in the world to be assured that the sayings of Christ are faithful sayings, and such as we may venture our souls upon; for he is not only a credible witness, who would not go about to deceive us, but a competent witness, who could not himself be deceived: "we testify that we have seen." He spoke not upon hearsay, but upon the clearest evidence, and therefore with the greatest assurance. What he spoke of God, of the invisible world, of heaven and hell, of the Divine will concerning us, and the counsels of peace, was what he knew and had seen, for he was by him as one brought up with him, Pr. viii. 30. Whatever Christ spoke, he spoke of his own knowledge. Secondly. That the unbelief of sinners is greatly aggravated by the infallible certainty of the truths of Christ. The things are thus sure, thus clear, and yet "ye receive not our witness." Multitudes to be unbelievers of that, which yet (so cogent are the motives of credibility) they cannot disbelieve!

2nd. The truths Christ taught, though communicated in language and expressions borrowed from common and earthly things, yet in their own nature were most sublime and heavenly; this is intimated, ver. 12, "If I have told them earthly things," that is, have told them the great things of God in similitudes taken from earthly things, to make them the more easy and intelligible, as that of the new birth, and the wind; if I have thus accommodated myself to your capacities, and listened to you in your own language, and cannot make you to understand my doctrine, what would you do if I should accommodate myself to the nature of the things, and speak with the tongue of angels, that language which mortals cannot utter; if such familiar expressions be stumblingblocks, what would abstract ideas be, and spiritual things painted proper?

Now we may learn hence, First. To admire the height and depth of the doctrine of Christ; it is a great mystery of godliness. The things of the Gospel are heavenly things, out of the road of the inquiries of human reason, and much more out of the reach of its discoveries. Secondly. To acknowledge with thankfulness the condescension of Christ; that he is pleased to suit the manner of the Gospel revelation to our capacities; to speak to us as to children. He considers our frame, that we are of the earth; and our place, that we are on the earth; and therefore speaks to us earthly things, and makes things sensible the vehicle of things spiritual, to make them the more easy and familiar to us; thus he has done both in parables, and in sacraments. Thirdly. To lament the corruption of our nature, and our great unaptness to receive and entertain the truths of Christ. Earthly things are despised because they are vulgar, and heavenly things because they are abstruse; and so whatever method is taken, still some fault or other is found with it, Mat. xi. 17; but wisdom is, and will be, justified of her children notwithstanding.

3rd. Our Lord Jesus, and none but he, was fit to reveal to us a doctrine thus certain, thus sublime; ver. 13, "no man hath ascended up into heaven but he." First. None but he was able to reveal to us the will of God for our salvation. Nicodemus addressed to Christ as a prophet, but he must know that he is greater than all the Old Testament prophets, for none of them had ascended into heaven. They wrote by Divine inspiration, but not of their own knowledge; see ch. i. 18. Moses ascended into the mount, but not into heaven; no man hath attained to the certain knowledge of God and heavenly things so as Christ has; see Mat. xi. 27. It is not for us to send to Heaven for instructions, we must wait to receive what instructions Heaven will send to us; see Pr. xxx. 4; Deu. xxx. 12. Secondly. Jesus Christ is able and fit, and every way qualified to reveal the will of God to us; for it is "he that came down from heaven," and "is in heaven." He had said, ver. 12, "how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things?" Now here, 1st. He gives them an instance of those heavenly things which he could tell them of, when he tells them of one that came down from heaven, and yet is the Son of man; is the Son of man, and yet is in heaven. If the regeneration of the soul of man was such a mystery, what then is the incarnation of the Son of God? these are Divine and heavenly things indeed. We have here an intimation of Christ's two distinct natures in one person; his Divine nature, in that he came down from heaven; his human nature, in that he is the Son of man; and that union of those two, in that, while he is the Son of man, yet he is in heaven. 2nd. He gives them a proof of his ability to speak to them heavenly things, and to lead them into the arcanes of the kingdom of heaven, by telling them,

1. That he "came down from heaven." The intercourse settled between dependent on locality, but that even at his incarnation he ceased not to be with the Father in eternal presence."

iii. 14. "Serpent:" for the use of this symbol by Moses two explanations have been offered—1. That the serpent (Gen. iii. 1) signified the power of evil; its impalement represented evil conquered. 2. That the symbol was derived from Egypt, where the serpent was worshipped as the symbol of life and health. An attempt has been made to combine both views, by taking the serpent to signify wisdom, apart from the Divine rule, allying itself to man's lower nature, and degenerating into cunning; and its impalement to represent the same wisdom restored to the service of God, and thenceforward becoming the source of healing influence.

iii. 22. "Land of Judaea:" i.e., rural districts, in distinction from the metropolis. "Baptized:" see chap. iv. 2, from whence it is plain that the baptism was administered by Christ through the medium of his disciples.

God and man began above; the first motion towards it did not arise from this earth, but "came down from heaven." We love him, and send to him, because he first loved us, and sent to us. Now this speaks, 1st. Christ's Divine nature. He that came down from heaven is certainly more than a mere man; he "is the Lord from heaven," 1 Cor. xv. 47. 2nd. His intimate acquaintance with the Divine counsels; for, coming from the court of heaven, he had been from eternity conversant with them. 3rd. It speaks God manifest. Under the Old Testament, God's favours to his people are expressed by his hearing from heaven, 2 Chr. vii. 14; looking from heaven, Ps. lxxx. 14; speaking from heaven, Neh. ix. 13; sending from heaven, Ps. lviii. 3; but the New Testament shews us God coming down from heaven to teach and save us. That he thus descended is an admirable mystery, for the Godhead cannot change places, nor did he bring his body from heaven; but that he thus condescended for our redemption is a more admirable mercy; herein he commended his love.

2. That he is "the Son of man," that Son of man spoken of by Daniel, Dan. vii. 13, by which the Jews always understand to be meant the Messiah. Christ in calling himself the Son of man, shews that he is the second Adam; for the first Adam was the father of man. And of all the Old Testament titles of the Messiah, he chose to make use of this, because it was the most expressive of his humility, and most agreeable to his present state of humiliation.

3. That he "is in heaven." Now at this time, when he is talking with Nicodemus on earth, yet, as God, he is in heaven; the Son of man, as such, was not in heaven till his ascension; but he that was the Son of man, by his Divine nature, was now every where present, and particularly in heaven. Thus the Lord of glory, as such, could not be crucified, nor God, as such, shed his blood, yet that person who was the Lord of glory was crucified, 1 Cor. ii. 8; and God purchased the church with his own blood, Acts xx. 28; so close is the union of the two natures in one person, that there is a communication of properties. He doth not say, ὁ θεός, but ὁ υἱὸς ἐν τῷ ὁπαύῳ. God is the ὁ υἱός—He that is; and heaven is the habitation of his holiness.

III. Christ here discourseth of the great design of his own coming into the world, and the happiness of those that believe in him, ver. 14–18. Here we have the very marrow and quintessence of the whole Gospel; that faithful saying, 1 Tim. i. 15, that Jesus Christ came to seek and to save the children of men from death, and recover them to life. Now sinners are dead men upon a twofold account. 1. As one that is mortally wounded, or sick of an incurable disease, is said to be a dead man, for he is dying; and so Christ came to save us, by healing us, as the brazen serpent healed the Israelites, ver. 14, 15. 2. As one that is justly condemned to die for an unpardonable crime is a dead man, he is dead in law; and in reference to this part of our danger, Christ came to save as a prince or judge, publishing an act of indemnity, or general pardon under certain provisos; this saving here is opposed to condemning, ver. 16–18.

First. Jesus Christ came to save us, by healing us, as the children of Israel that were stung with fiery serpents, were cured, and lived, by looking up to the brazen serpent; we have the story of it, Num. xxi. 6–9. It was the last miracle that past through the hand of Moses before his death. Now in this type of Christ we may observe,

1. The deadly and destructive nature of sin, that is implied here. The guilt of sin is like the pain of the biting of a fiery serpent; the power of corruption is like the venom diffused thereby. The devil is the old serpent, subtle at first, Gen. iii. 1, but ever since fiery, and his temptations fiery darts; his assaults terrifying, his victories destroying. Ask awakened consciences, ask damned sinners, and they will tell you, how charming soever the allurements of sin are, "at the last it bites like a serpent," Pr. xxiii. 30, 31. God's wrath against us for sin, is as those fiery serpents which God sent among the people to punish them for their murmurings. The curses of the law are as fiery serpents, so are all the tokens of Divine wrath.

2. The powerful remedy provided against this fatal malady. The case of poor sinners is deplorable, but is it desperate? Thanks be to God it is not; there is balm in Gilead. The Son of man is lifted up, as the serpent of brass was by Moses, which cured the stung Israelites. 1st. It was a serpent of brass that cured them. Brass is bright; we read of Christ's feet shining like brass, Rev. i. 15. It is durable; Christ is the same. It was made in the shape of a fiery serpent, and yet had no poison, no sting; fitly representing Christ, who was "made sin for us," and yet knew no sin; was "made in the likeness of sinful flesh," and yet not sinful; as harmless as a serpent of brass. The serpent was a cursed creature; Christ was made a curse. That which cured them minded them of their plague; so in Christ sin is set before us most fiery and formidable. 2nd. It was lifted up upon a pole, and so must the Son of man be lifted up; thus it behoved him, Lu. xxiv. 26, 46. No remedy now. Christ is lifted up. First. In his crucifixion; he was lifted up upon the cross. His death is called his being lifted up, ch. xii. 32, 33; he was lifted up as a spectacle, as a mark; lifted up between heaven and earth, as if he had been unworthy of either, and abandoned by both. Secondly. In his exaltation; he was lifted up to the Father's right hand to give repentance and remission; he was lifted up to the cross, to be farther lifted up to the crown. Thirdly. In the publishing and preaching of his everlasting Gospel, Rev. xiv. 6. The serpent was lifted up that all the thousands of Israel might see it, Christ in the Gospel is exhibited to us, evidently set forth; Christ is lifted up as an ensign, Isa. xi. 10. 3rd. It was lifted up by Moses; Christ was made under the law of Moses, and Moses testified of him. 4th. Being thus lifted up, it was appointed for the cure of those that were bitten by fiery serpents; he that sent the plague provided the remedy; none could redeem and save us but he whose justice had condemned us. It was God himself that found the ransom, and the efficacy of it depends upon his appointment. The fiery serpents were sent to punish them for their tempting Christ, so the apostle saith, 1 Cor. x. 9, and yet they were healed by virtue derived from him. He whom we have offended is our peace.

3. The way of applying this remedy, and that is, by believing; which plainly alludes to the Israelites' looking up to the brazen serpent in order to their being healed by it. If any stung Israelite was either so little sensible of his pain and peril, or had so little confidence in the word of Moses, as not to look up to the brazen serpent, justly did he die of his wound; but every one that looked up to it did well, Num. xxi. 9. If any so far slight either their disease by sin, or the method of cure by Christ, as not to embrace Christ upon his own terms, their blood is upon their own head; he hath said, Look, and be saved, Isa. xlv. 22; look and live. We must take a complacency in, and give consent to, the methods which Infinite Wisdom has taken of saving a guilty world, by the mediation of Jesus Christ, as the great sacrifice and intercessor.

4. The great encouragements given us by faith to look up to him: 1st. It was for this end that he was lifted up, that his followers might be saved; and he will pursue his end. 2nd. The offer that is made of salvation by him is general, that whosoever believes in him, without exception, might have benefit by him. 3rd. The salvation offered is complete. First. "They shall not perish," shall not die of their wounds, though they may be pained, and ill-frightened; iniquity shall not be their ruin. But that is not all, Secondly. They shall "have eternal life." They shall not only not die of their wound in the wilderness, but they shall reach Canaan, (which they were then just ready to enter into,) they shall enjoy the promised rest.

Secondly. Jesus Christ came to save us by pardoning us, that we might not die by the sentence of the law, ver. 16, 17. Here is Gospel indeed, good news, the best that ever came from heaven to earth: here is much, here is all in a little; the word of reconciliation in miniature.

1. Here is God's love in giving his Son for the world, ver. 16; where we have three things:

1st. The great Gospel mystery revealed: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son." The love of God the Father, is the original of our regeneration by the Spirit, and our reconciliation by the lifting up of the Son. Note, First. Jesus Christ is the only begotten Son of God. This magnifies his love in giving him for us, in giving him to us: now know we that he loves us, when he has given his only begotten Son for us; which speaks not only his dignity in himself, but his cleanness to his Father; he was always his delight. Secondly. In order to the redemption and salvation of man, it pleased God to give his only begotten Son. He not only gave him, that is, sent him into the world, with full and ample power to negotiate a peace between heaven and earth, but he gave him, that is, he gave him up, to suffer and die for us, as the great propitiation, or expiatory sacrifice. It comes in here as a reason why he must be lifted up, for so it was determined and designed by the Father, who gave him for this purpose, and prepared him a body in order to it. His enemies could not have taken him, if his Father had not given him. Though he was not yet crucified, yet in the determinate counsel of God he was given up, Acts ii. 23. Nay farther, God hath given him, that is, he hath made an offer of him to all, and given him to all true believers, to all the intents and purposes of the new covenant. He has given him to be our prophet, a witness to the people; the high priest of our profession; to be our peace; to be head of the church, and head over all things to the church; to be to us all we need. Thirdly. Herein God has commended his love to the world; "God so loved the world," so really, so richly. Now his creatures shall see that he loves them, and wishes them well; so loved the world of fallen man, as he did not love that of fallen angels; see Rom. v. 8; 1 Jno. iv. 10. Behold and wonder, that the great God should love such a worthless world! That the holy God should love such a wicked world, with a love of good will, when he could not look upon it with any complacency! This was a time of love indeed, Eze. xvi. 6, 8. The Jews vainly conceived that the Messiah should be sent only in love to their nation, and to advance that upon the ruins of their neighbours; but Christ tells them he came in love to the whole world, Gentiles as well as Jews, 1 Jno. ii. 2. Though many of the world of mankind perish, yet God's giving his only begotten Son was an instance of his love to the whole world, because through him there is a general offer of life and salvation made to all. It is love to the revolted, rebellious province, to issue out a proclamation of pardon and indemnity to all that will come in, to plead it upon their knees, and return to their allegiance. So far God loved the apostate, lapsed world, that he sent his Son with this fair proposal, "That whosoever believeth in him," one or other, "shall not perish." Salvation has been of the Jews; but now Christ is known for salvation to the ends of the earth; a common salvation.

2nd. Here is the great Gospel duty, and that is, to believe in Jesus Christ, whom God hath thus given, given for us, given to us. To accept the gift, and answer the intention of the Giver, we must yield an unfeigned assent and consent to the record God hath given in his Word concerning his Son. God having given him to us to be our Prophet, Priest, and King, we must give up ourselves to be ruled, and taught, and saved by him.

3rd. Here is the great Gospel benefit, that whosoever believes in Christ, shall not perish; this he had said before, and here repeats it. It is the unspeakable happiness of all true believers, which they are eternally indebted to Christ for. First. That they are saved from the miseries of hell, delivered from going down to the pit, they shall not perish. God has taken away their sin, they shall not die; a pardon is purchased, and so the attainder is reversed. Secondly. They are entitled to the joys of heaven, they shall have everlasting life. The convicted traitor is not only pardoned, but preferred, and made a favourite, and treated as one whom the King of kings delights to honour. Out of prison he cometh to reign, Eccl. iv. 14. If believers, then children; and if children, then heirs.

2. Here is God's design in sending his Son into the world; it was, "that the world through him might be saved." He came into the world with salvation in his eye, with salvation in his hand. Therefore the aforementioned offer of life and salvation is sincere, and shall be made good to all that by faith accept it; ver. 47, "God sent his Son into the world," this guilty, rebellious, apostate world; sent him as his agent, or ambassador, not as sometimes he had sent angels into the world as visitants, but as resident. Ever since man sinned he has dreaded the approach and appearance of any special messenger from heaven, as being conscious of guilt, and looking for judgment; "we shall surely die, for we have seen God." If therefore the Son of God himself come, we are concerned to inquire on what errand he comes, "Is it peace?" or, as they asked Samuel, trembling, "Comest thou peaceably?" And this Scripture returns the answer, "Peaceably."

1st. He did not come to condemn the world; we had reason enough to expect he should, for it is a guilty world; it is convicted, and what cause can be shewn why judgment should not be given, and execution awarded according to law? That one blood of which all nations of men are made, Acts xvii. 26, is not only tainted with an hereditary disease, like Gehazi's leprosy, but it is attainted with an hereditary guilt, like that of the Amalekites, with whom God had war from generation to generation; and justly may such a world as this be condemned: and if God would have sent to condemn it, he had angels at command to pour out the vials of his wrath; a cherubim with a flaming sword ready to do execution. "If the Lord had been pleased to kill us," he would not have sent his Son among us; He came with full powers indeed to execute judgment, ch. v. 22–27; but did not begin with a judgment of condemnation, did not proceed upon the outlawry, nor take advantage against us for the breach of the covenant of innocency, but puts us upon a new trial before a throne of grace.

2nd. He came "that the world through him might be saved;" that a door of salvation might be opened to the world, and whoever would might enter in by it. "God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself," and so saving it. An act of indemnity is passed and published, through Christ a remedial law made; and the world of mankind dealt with, not according to the rigours of the first covenant, but according to the riches of the second. "That the world through him might be saved," for it could never be saved but through him; there is not salvation in any other. This is good news to a convicted conscience; healing to broken bones, and bleeding wounds, that Christ our Judge came not to condemn, but to save.

Thirdly. From all this is inferred, the happiness of true believers; ver. 18, "He that believeth on him is not condemned." Though he have been a sinner, a great sinner, and stands convicted, (habes confitentem reum—by his own confession;) yet upon his believing, process is stayed, judgment is arrested, and he is not condemned. This speaks more than a reprieve; he is not condemned, that is, he is acquitted; he stands upon his deliverance, as we say, and if he be not condemned, he is discharged; ὁὐ κρίνεται, 'he is not judged; not dealt with in strict justice according to the desert of his sins. He is accused, and he cannot plead not guilty to the indictment; but he can plead

iii. 23. "Enon," "Salim:" the exact situation of these places is uncertain. Jerome and Eusebius concur in placing Salim near the Jordan, eight Roman miles south of Scythopolis.

iii. 25. "Jews:" rather, "a Jew" (so best MSS.); one of the Jews. The precise nature of the dispute is a matter of conjecture. It seems, however, to have originated with John's disciples, and to have turned on the question of the relative values of the baptism of John and of Jesus. This appears probable from the fact that we find John's disciples coming to him with a half-complaining announcement of the increasing following of Jesus (verse 26). The explanatory language of John confirms the supposition (verse 30).

iii. 31. Some have supposed that the verses from 31 to the end of the chapter are not the words of the Baptist, but of the Evangelist. But, as Alford says, it seems more natural to take them as containing the reasons given by the Baptist explaining why Christ must increase, while he himself decreased.

in bar, can plead a noli prosequi upon the indictment, as blessed Paul doth, "Who is he that condemns? it is Christ that died." He is afflicted, chastened of God, persecuted by the world, but he is not condemned. The cross perhaps lies heavy upon him, but he is saved from the curse. Condemned by the world, it may be, but not condemned with the world, Rom. viii. 1; 1 Cor. xi. 32.

IV. Christ, in the close, discourseth concerning the deplorable condition of those that persist in unbelief, and wilful ignorance, ver. 18—21.

1. Read here the doom of those that will not believe in Christ, they are condemned already. Observe, 1st. How great the sin of unbelievers is: it is aggravated from the dignity of the person they slight; they believe not in the name of the only begotten Son of God, who is infinitely true, and deserves to be believed; infinitely good, and deserves to be embraced. God sent one to save us that was dearest to himself, and shall not he be dearest to us? Shall not we believe on his name, who has a name above every name? 2nd. How great the misery of unbelievers is; they are condemned already, which speaks, First. A certain condemnation; they are as sure to be condemned in the judgment of the great day, as if they were condemned already. Secondly. A present condemnation; the curse has already taken hold of them, the wrath of God now fastens upon them. They are condemned already, for their own hearts condemn them. Thirdly. A condemnation grounded upon the former guilt; he is condemned already, for he lies open to the law for all his sins; the obligation of the law is in full force, power, and virtue against him, because he is not by faith interested in the Gospel defeasance; "He is condemned already, because he has not believed." Unbelief may truly be called the great damning sin, because it leaves us under the guilt of all our other sins; it is a sin against the remedy, against our appeal.

2. Read also the doom of those that would not so much as know him, ver. 19; many inquisitive people had knowledge of Christ, and his doctrine, and miracles, but they were prejudiced against him, and would not believe in him, while the generality were sottishly careless and stupid, and would not know him. "And this is the condemnation," the sin that ruined them, "that light is come into the world, and they loved darkness rather." Now here observe,

1st. That the Gospel is light, and when the Gospel came, light came into the world. Light is self-evidencing, so is the Gospel; it proves its own Divine original. Light is discovering, and truly the light is sweet, and rejoiceth the heart. It is a light shining in a dark place, and a dark place indeed the world would be without it. It is come into all the world, Col. i. 6; and not confined to one corner of it, as the Old Testament light was.

2nd. It is the unspeakable folly of the most of men, that they loved darkness rather than light, rather than this light. The Jews loved the dark shadows of their law, and the instructions of their blind guides, rather than the doctrine of Christ. The Gentiles loved their superstitious services of an unknown god, whom they ignorantly worshipped, rather than the reasonable service which the Gospel enjoins. Sinners that were wedded to their lusts, loved their ignorance and mistakes, which supported them in their sins, rather than the truths of Christ, that would have parted them from their sins. Man's apostasy began in an affectation of forbidden knowledge, but is kept up by an affectation of forbidden ignorance. Wretched man is in love with his sickness, in love with his slavery; and will not be made free, will not be made whole.

3rd. The true reason why men love darkness rather than light is, "because their deeds are evil." They love darkness, because they think it is an excuse for their evil deeds; and they hate the light, because it robs them of the good opinion they had of themselves, by shewing them their sinfulness and misery. Their case is sad, and because they are resolved they will not mend it they are re-olved they will not see it.

4th. Wilful ignorance is so far from excusing sin, that it will be found at the great day to aggravate the condemnation. "This is the condemnation," this is it that ruins souls, that they shut their eyes against the light, and will not so much as admit a parley with Christ and his Gospel; they set God so much at defiance, that they desire not the knowledge of his ways, Job xxi. 14. We must account in the judgment, not only for the knowledge we had and used not, but for the knowledge we might have had and would not; not only for the knowledge we sinned against, but for the knowledge we sinned away.

For the farther illustration of this, he shews, ver. 20, 21, that according as men's hearts and lives are good or bad, accordingly they stand affected to the light Christ has brought into the world.

First. It is not strange, if those that do evil, and resolve to persist in it, hate the light of Christ's Gospel, for it is a common observation, that "every one that doeth evil hateth the light," ver. 20. Evil doers seek concealment, out of sense of shame, and fear of punishment; see Job xiv. 13, &c. Sinful works are works of darkness; sin from the first affected concealment, Job xxxi. 33. The light shakes the wicked, Job xxxviii. 12, 13. Thus the Gospel is a terror to the wicked world; "they come not to this light" but keep as far off it as they can, "lest their deeds should be reproved." Note, 1st. The light of the Gospel is sent into the world to reprove the evil deeds of sinners, to make them manifest, Eph. v. 13; to shew people their transgressions, to shew that to be sin which was not thought to be so; and to shew them the evil of their transgressions, that sin by the new commandment might appeatations exceeding sinful. The Gospel has its convictions to make way for its consolations. 2nd. It is for this reason that evil doers hate the light of the Gospel. There were those that had done evil, and were sorry for it, who bade this light welcome, as the publicans and harlots. But he that doth evil, that doth it and resolves to go on in it, hates the light; cannot bear to be told of his faults. All that opposition which the Gospel of Christ has met with in the world, comes from the wicked heart, influenced by the wicked one; Christ is hated, because sin is loved. 3rd. They who do not come to the light, thereby evidence a secret hatred of the light. If they had not an antipathy to saving knowledge, they would not sit down so contentedly in damning ignorance.

Secondly. On the other hand, upright hearts that approve themselves to God in their integrity, bid this light welcome; ver. 21. "He that doeth truth comes to the light." It seems then, though the Gospel had many enemies, it had some friends; it is a common observation, that truth seeks no corners. They who mean and act honestly dread not a scrutiny, but desire it rather; now this is applicable to the Gospel light, as it convinceth and terrifies evil doers, so it confirms and comforts those that walk in their integrity. Observe here,

1st. The character of a good man. First. He is one that doeth truth; that is, he acts truly and sincerely in all he doth. Though sometimes he comes short of doing good, the good he would do, yet he doeth truth; he aims honestly; he has his infirmities, but holds fast his integrity; as Gaius, that did faithfully, 3 Jno. 5; as Paul, 2 Cor. i. 12; as Nathanael, ch. i. 47; as Asa, 1 Kin. xv. 14. Secondly. He is one that cometh to the light; he is ready to receive and entertain Divine revelation, as far as it appears to him to be so, what uneasiness soever it may create him. He that doeth truth is willing to know the truth by himself, and to have his deeds made manifest. A good man is much in trying himself, and desirous that God would try him, Ps. xxvi. 2. He is solicitous to know what the will of God is, and resolves to do it, though never so contrary to his own wills and interests.

2nd. Here is the character of a good work; it is wrought in God, in union with him by a covenanting faith, and in communion with him by devout affections. Our works are then good, and will bear the test when the will of God is the rule of them and the glory of God the end of them; when they are done in his strength, and for his sake, to him, and not to men. And if by the light of the Gospel it be manifest to us that our works are thus wrought, then shall we have rejoicing, Gal. vi. 4; 2 Cor. i. 12.

Thus far we have Christ's discourse with Nicodemus; it is likely much more passed between them, and it had a good effect, for we find, ch. xix. 39, that Nicodemus, though he was puzzled at first, yet afterwards became a faithful disciple of Christ.

22 After these things came Jesus and his disciples into the land of Judæa; and there he tarried with them, and baptized. 23 And John also was baptizing in Ænon near to Salim, because there was much water there: and they came, and were baptized. 24 For John was not yet cast into prison. 25 Then there arose a question between some of John's disciples and the Jews about purifying. 26 And they came unto John, and said unto him, Rabbi, he that was with thee beyond Jordan, to whom thou barest witness, behold, the same baptizeth, and all men come to him. 27 John answered and said, A man can receive nothing, except it be given him from heaven. 28 Ye yourselves bear me witness, that I said, I am not the Christ, but that I am sent before him. 29 He that hath the bride is the bridegroom: but the friend of the bridegroom, which standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice: this my joy therefore is fulfilled. 30 He must increase, but I must decrease. 31 He that cometh from above is above all: he that is of the earth is earthly, and speaketh of the earth: he that cometh from heaven is above all. 32 And what he hath seen and heard, that he testifieth; and no man receiveth his testimony. 33 He that hath received his testimony hath set to his seal that God is true. 34 For he whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God: for God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto him. 35 The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand. 36 He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him.

In these verses we have,

First. Christ's removal into the land of Judæa, ver. 22; and there he tarried with his disciples. Observe,

1. Our Lord Jesus, after he entered upon his public work, travelled much, and removed often, as the patriarchs in their sojournings. As it was a good part of his humiliation, that he had no certain dwelling place, but was as Paul, in journeyings often, so it was an instance of his unwearied industry in the work for which he came into the world, that he went about in prosecution of it; many a weary step he took to do good to souls. This Sun of righteousness took a large circuit, to diffuse his light and heat, Ps. xix. 6.

2. He was not wont to stay long at Jerusalem; though he went frequently thither, yet he soon returned into the country, as here, "After these things," after he had had this discourse with Nicodemus, he came into the land of Judæa; not so much for greater privacy, (though mean and obscure places best suited the humble Jesus in his humbled state,) but for greater usefulness; his preaching and miracles perhaps made most noise at Jerusalem, the fountain head of news, but did least good there, where the topping men of the Jewish church had so much the ascendancy.

3. When he came into the land of Judæa, his disciples came with him, for these were they that continued with him in his temptations. Many that flock to him at Jerusalem would not follow his motions into the country, they had no business there, but his disciples attended him. If the ark remove, it is better remove and go after it, (as they did Jos. iii. 3.) than sit still without it, though it be in Jerusalem itself.

4. "There he tarried with them," διετρεψε; he conversed with them, discoursed with them. He did not retire into the country for his ease and pleasure, but for more free conversation with his disciples and followers; see Cant. vii. 11, 12. Note, Those that are ready to go with Christ, shall find him as ready to stay with them. It is supposed he now stayed five or six months in this country.

5. There he baptized; he admitted disciples, such as believed in him, and had more honesty and courage than those had at Jerusalem, ch. ii. 24. John began to baptize in the land of Judæa, Mat. iii. 1; therefore Christ began there, for John had said, "There comes one after me." He baptized not himself, with his own hand, but his disciples by his order and directions, as appears, ch. iv. 4.

iii. 33. "Hath set to his seal:" a thing is sealed in common life for two objects—either to render it inaccessible, and to place it under seal (Matt. xxvii. 65), or to confirm it; and thus there is in Scripture a double figurative and symbolical use of sealing. On the latter application of the seal, which alone can be regarded here, see the following passages: John vi. 27; Rev. vii. 2; Rom. iv. 11; 1 Cor. ix. 2; 2 Cor. i. 22; Eph. i. 13. In how far he who receives the testimony of Christ confirms that God is true is declared in what follows—viz., because God is revealed in Christ, and speaks through him. According to this, he who makes Christ a liar makes God one also, who speaks through him (1 John v. 10).

iii. 34. "Giveth," present tense, indicates the perpetual communication of the Spirit by the Father to the Son. "Not by measure:" pointing out a distinction between all inspired human teachers and Him in whom all fulness dwells, who is essentially the Christ, the anointed, and out of whose fulness we receive a.

But his disciples' baptizing was his baptizing. Holy ordinances are Christ's, though administered by weak men.

Secondly. John's continuance in his work as long as his opportunities lasted, ver. 23, 24. Here we are told,

1. That John was baptizing; Christ's baptism was for substance the same with John's, for he bore witness to Christ, and therefore they did not at all clash or interfere with one another. But, 1st. Christ began to preach and baptize before John laid it down, that he might be ready to receive John's disciples when he should be taken off, and so the wheels might be kept a going. It is a comfort to useful men, when they are going off the stage, to see those rising up who are likely to fill up their room. 2nd. John continued to preach and baptize, though Christ had taken it up; for he would still, according to the measure given to him, advance the interests of God's kingdom. There was still work for John to do, for Christ was not yet generally known, nor the minds of people thoroughly prepared for him by repentance. From heaven John had received his command, and he would go on in his work till from thence he received his countermand, and would have his dismission from the same hand that gave him his commission. He doth not come in to Christ, lest what had formerly passed should look like a combination between them, but he goes on with his work till Providence lays him aside. The greater gifts of some do not render the labours of others that come short of them needless and useless; there is work enough for all hands. They are sullen that will sit down and do nothing when they see themselves outshone. Though we have but one talent, we must account for that; and when we see ourselves going off, yet must go on to the last.

2. That he baptized in Ænon, near Salim, places we find nowhere else mentioned, and therefore the learned are altogether at a loss where to find them; wherever it was, it seems John removed from place to place; he did not think there was any virtue in Jordan, because Jesus was baptized there, which should engage him to stay there, but, as he saw cause, removed to other waters. Ministers must follow their opportunities; and he chose a place where there was much water; ὕδατα πολλὰ, 'many waters,' that is, many streams of water; so that wherever he met with any that were willing to submit to his baptism, water was at hand to baptize them with; shallow, perhaps, as is usual where there are many brooks, but such as would serve his purpose. And in that country plenty of water was a valuable thing.

3. That thither people came to him, and were baptized. Though they did not come in such vast crowds as they did when he first appeared, yet now he was not without encouragement, but there were still those that attended and owned him. Some refer this both to John and to Jesus; "they came and were baptized," that is, some came to John, and were baptized by him; some to Jesus, and were baptized by him; and as their baptism was one, so were their hearts.

4. It is noted, ver. 4, that "John was not yet cast into prison," to clear the order of the story, and to shew that these passages related here, ch. ii. and iii., in the harmony are to come in before Mat. iv. 12. John never desisted from his work as long as he had his liberty; nay, he seems to have been the more industrious because he foresaw his time was short; he was not yet cast into prison, but he expected it ere long, ch. ix. 4.

Thirdly. A contest between John's disciples and the Jews about purifying, ver. 25. See how the Gospel of Christ came not to send peace upon earth, but division. Observe,

1. Who were the disputants; some of John's disciples, and the Jews who had not submitted to his baptism of repentance. Penitents and impenitents divide this sinful world. In this contest, it should seem, John's disciples were the aggressors, and gave the challenge; and it is a sign they were novices that had more zeal than discretion. The truths of God have often suffered by the rashness of some that have undertaken to defend them before they were able to do so.

2. What was the matter in dispute; about purifying, about religious washing. 1st. We may suppose that John's disciples cried up his baptism, his purifying, as instar omnium, 'superior to all others,' and gave the preference to that as perfecting and superseding all the purifications of the Jews; and they were in the right; but young converts are too apt to boast of their attainments, whereas he that has found the treasure should hide it till he is sure he has it, and not talk of it too much at first. 2nd. No doubt but the Jews, with as much assurance, applauded the purifications that were in use among them, both those that were instituted by the law of Moses, and those that were imposed by the tradition of the elders; for the former they had a Divine warrant, and for the latter the usage of the church. Now it is very likely that the Jews in this dispute, when they could not deny the excellent nature and design of John's baptism, raised an objection against it from Christ's baptism, which gave occasion for the complaint that follows here, ver. 26. Here is John baptizing in one place, say they, and Jesus at the same time baptizing in another place; and therefore John's baptism, which his disciples so much applaud, is either, First, Dangerous, and of ill consequence to the peace of the church and state, for you see it opens a door to endless parties. Now John has begun, we shall have every little teacher set up for a baptist presently. Or, Secondly, That, at the best, it was defective and imperfect. If John's baptism, which you cry up thus, have any good in it, yonder is the baptism of Jesus goes beyond it; so that, for your parts, you are shaded already by a greater light, and your baptism is soon gone out of request. Thus objections are made against the Gospel from the advancement and improvement of gospel light, as if childhood and manhood were contrary to each other, and the superstructure were against the foundation. There was no reason to object Christ's baptism against John's, for they consisted very well together.

Fourthly. A complaint which John's disciples made to their master concerning Christ and his baptism, ver. 26. They, being nonplussed by the forementioned objection, and probably ruffled, and put into a heat by it, come to their master, and tell him, "Rabbi, he that was with thee," and was baptized of thee, is now set up for himself; he "baptizeth, and all men come to him," and wilt thou suffer it? Their itch of disputing occasioned this. It is common for men, when they find themselves run aground in the heat of disputation, to fall foul upon those that do them no harm. If these disciples of John had not undertaken to dispute about purifying before they understood the doctrine of baptism, they might have answered the objection without being put into a passion. In their complaint they speak respectfully to their own master, "Rabbi"; but speak very slightly of our Saviour, though they do not name him.

1. They suggest that Christ's setting up a baptism of his own was a piece of presumption, very unaccountable; as if John, having first set up this rite of baptizing, he must have the monopoly of it, and as it were a patent for the invention. "He that was with thee beyond Jordan," as a disciple of thine, "behold" and wonder, "the same," the very same, "baptizeth," and takes thy work out of thy hand. Thus the voluntary condescensions of the Lord Jesus, as that of his being baptized by John, are often unjustly and very unkindly turned to his reproach.

2. They suggest that it was a piece of ingratitude to John. He "to whom thou hast witness" baptizeth; as if Jesus owed all his reputation to the honourable character John gave of him, and yet had very unworthily improved it to the prejudice of John. But Christ needed not John's testimony, ch. v. 36. He reflected more honour upon John than he received from him; yet thus it is incident to us to think that others are more indebted to us than really they are. And besides, Christ's baptism was not in the least an impeachment, but indeed the greatest improvement of John's baptism, which was but to lead the way to Christ's. John was just to Christ in bearing witness to him, and Christ's answering his testimony did rather enrich than impoverish John's ministry.

3. They conclude that it would be a total eclipse to John's baptism, for "all men come to him;" they that used to follow with us now flock after him; it is therefore time for us to look about us. It was not indeed strange that "all men came to him." As far as Christ is manifested he will be magnified; but why should John's disciples grieve at that? Note, Aiming at the monopoly of honour and respect has been in all ages the bane of the church, and the shame of its members and ministers; as also a vieing of interests, and a jealousy of rivalry and competition. We mistake if we think that the excelling gifts, and graces, and labours, and usefulness, of one, is a diminution and disparagement to another that has obtained mercy to be faithful; for the Spirit is a free agent, dispensing to every one severally as he will. Paul rejoiced in the usefulness even of those that opposed him, Phil. i. 18. We must leave it to God to choose, employ, and honour his own instruments as he pleaseth, and not covet to be placed alone.

Fifthly. Here is John's answer to this complaint which his disciples made, ver. 28, &c. His disciples expected he should have resented this matter as they did; but Christ's manifestation to Israel was no surprise to John, but what he looked for; it was no disturbance to him, but what he wished for. He therefore checked the complaint, as Moses, "Enviest thou for my sake?" and took this occasion to confirm the testimonies he had formerly borne to Christ as superior to him, cheerfully consigning and turning over to him all the interest he had in Israel. In this discourse here, the first minister of the Gospel (for so John was) is an excellent pattern to all ministers to humble themselves and to exalt the Lord Jesus.

1. John here abaseth himself in comparison with Christ, ver. 27–30. The more others magnify us, the more we must humble ourselves; and fortify ourselves against the temptation of flattery and applause, and the jealousy of our friends for our honour, by remembering our place and what we are, 1 Cor. iii. 5.

1. John acquiesceth in the Divine disposal, and satisfieth himself with that; ver. 27, "A man can receive nothing, except it be given him from heaven," whence every good gift comes, Jas. i. 18, a general truth very applicable in this case. Different employments are according to the direction of Divine providence; different endowments according to the distribution of the Divine grace. No man can take any true honour to himself, Heb. v. 4. We have as necessary and constant a dependence upon the grace of God in all the motions and actions of the spiritual life, as we have upon the providence of God for all the motions and actions of the natural life. Now this comes in here as a reason,

1st. Why we should not envy those that have a larger share of gifts than we have, or move in a larger sphere of usefulness. John minds his disciples that Jesus had not thus excelled him, except he had received it from heaven, for as man and Mediator he received gifts; and if God gave him the Spirit without measure, ver. 34, shall they grudge at it? The same reason will hold as to others. If God is pleased to give to others more ability and success than to us, shall we be displeased at it, and reflect upon him as unjust, unwise, and partial? see Mat. xx. 15.

2nd. Why we should not be discontented, though we be inferior to others in gifts and usefulness, and be eclipsed by their excellences. John was ready to own that it was the gift, the free gift of Heaven, that made him a preacher, a prophet, a baptist; it was God that gave him the interest he had in the love and esteem of the people; and if now his interest decline, God's will be done! He that gives may take. What we receive from Heaven we must take as it is given. Now John never received a commission for a standing, perpetual office, but only for a temporary one, which must soon expire; and therefore when he has fulfilled his ministry, he can contentedly see it go out of date. Some give quite another sense of these words; John had taken pains with his disciples to teach them the reference which his baptism had to Christ, who should come after him, and yet be preferred before him, and do that for them which he could not do; and yet after all they dote upon John, and grudge this preference of Christ above him. Well, saith John, I see "a man can receive," that is, perceive, "nothing, except it be given him from heaven." The labours of ministers is all lost labour, unless the grace of God make it effectual. Men do not understand that which is made most plain, nor believe that which is made most evident, unless it be given them from heaven to understand and believe it.

2. John appeals to the testimony he had formerly given concerning Christ, ver. 18; You can bear me witness that I said again and again, "I am not the Christ, but that I am sent before him." See how steady and constant John was in his testimony to Christ, and not as "a reed shaken with the wind;" neither the frowns of the chief priests, nor the flatteries of his own disciples, could make him change his note. Now this serves here,

1st. As a conviction to his disciples of the unreasonableness of their complaint. They had spoken of the witness which their master bore to Jesus, ver. 26. "Now," saith John, "do not you remember what the testimony was that I did bear? Call that to mind, and you will see your own civil answered. Did I not say, "I am not the Christ?" why then do you set me up as a rival with him that is? Did I not say, "I am sent before him?" why then doth it seem strange to you that I should stand by and give way to him?"

2nd. It is a comfort to himself that he had never given his disciples any occasion thus to set him up in competition with Christ; but, on the contrary, had particularly cautioned them against this mistake, though he might have made a hand of it for himself. It is a satisfaction to faithful ministers, if they have done what they could in their places, to prevent any extravagances that their people ran into. John had not only not encouraged them to hope that he was the Messiah, but had plainly told them the contrary, which was now a satisfaction to him. It is a common excuse for those who have undue honour paid them, Si populus vult decipi, decipiat. "If the people will be deceived, let them;" but that is an ill maxim for them to go by whose business it is to undeceive people. "The lip of truth shall be established."

3. John professeth the great satisfaction he had in the advancement of Christ and his interest. He was so far from regretting it, as his disciples did, that he rejoiced in it. This he expresseth, ver. 29, by an elegant similitude.

1st. He compares our Saviour to the bridegroom: "He that has the bride is the bridegroom." Do all men come to him? It is well; whether else should they go? Has he got the throne in men's affections? who else should have it? It is his right; to whom should the bride be brought but to the bridegroom? Christ was prophesied of in the Old Testament as a bridegroom, Ps. xlv.; "the Word was made flesh, that the disparity of nature might not be a bar to the match; provision is made for the purifying of the church, that the defilement of sin might be no bar; Christ espouseth his church to himself; he has the bride, for he has her love: he has her promise, the church is subject to Christ

iv. 1. "When the Lord knew," &c.: it would appear that the increasing popularity of Christ had occasioned great jealousy on the part of the Pharisees. Perhaps signs of a persecuting spirit had shown themselves among them. If this be so, it lends some probability to the opinion of those who hold that John the Baptist was about this time cast into prison.

iv. 4. "Samaria:" i.e., the whole district, for the city does not appear to be mentioned in the New Testament. The only passage which seems to do so (Acts viii. 5), should be translated "a city of Samaria."

iv. 5. "Sychar:" named here only. Generally believed to be a name applied to the town of Shechem, distant upwards of thirty miles from Jerusalem, and afterwards called Neapolis, or Nablous.

iv. 6. "Jacob's well:" not mentioned in the Old Testament, but it was the custom of the patriarchs to dig wells (see Gen. xxi., xxvi). The object of digging a well in a neighbourhood so abundantly

As far as particular souls are devoted to him in faith and love, so far the bridegroom has the bride.

2nd. He compares himself to "the friend of the bridegroom," who attends upon him to do him honour and service, assists him in prosecuting the match, speaks a good word for him, useth his interest on his behalf, rejoiceth when the match goes on, and most of all when the point is gained, and he hath the bride. All that John had done in preaching and baptizing was to introduce him, and now He was come, he had what he wished for. "The friend of the bridegroom stands and hears him," stands expecting him, and waiting for him; "rejoiceth with joy because of the bridegroom's voice," because he is come to the marriage after he had been long expected. Note, First, Faithful ministers are friends of the bridegroom, to recommend him to the affections and choice of the children of men; to bring letters and messages from him, for he courts by proxy; and herein they must be faithful to him. Secondly, The friends of the bridegroom must stand and hear the bridegroom's voice, must receive instructions from him, and attend his orders; must desire to have proofs of Christ's speaking in them and with them, 2 Cor. xiii. 3; that is the bridegroom's voice. Thirdly, The espousing of souls to Jesus Christ in faith and love, is the fulfilling of the joy of every good minister. If the day of Christ's espousals be the day of the gladness of his heart, Cant. iii. 11, it cannot but be theirs too, who love him, and wish well to his honour and kingdom. Surely they have no greater joy.

4. He owns it highly fit and necessary that the reputation and interest of Christ should be advanced and his own diminished; ver. 30. "He must increase, but I must decrease." If they grieve at the growing greatness of the Lord Jesus, they will have more and more occasion to grieve, as they have that indulge themselves in envy and emulation. John speaks of Christ's increase and his own decrease, not only as necessary and unavoidable, which could not be helped, and therefore must be borne, but as highly just and agreeable, and is entirely satisfied in it. 1st. He was well pleased to see the kingdom of Christ getting ground. "He must increase." You think he has gained a deal, but it is nothing to what he will gain. Note, The kingdom of Christ is and will be a growing kingdom, like the light of the morning, like the grain of mustard seed. 2nd. He was not at all displeased that the effect of this was the diminishing of his own interest: "I must decrease." Created excellences are under this law, they must decrease; "I have seen an end of all perfection." Note, First, The shining forth of the glory of Christ eclipseth the lustre of all other glory. The glory that stands in competition with Christ, that of the world and the flesh, decreaseth and loseth ground in the soul, as the knowledge and love of Christ increase and get ground; but it is here spoken of that which is subservient to him. As the light of the morning increaseth that of the morning star decreaseth. Secondly, If our diminution and abasement may but in the least contribute to the advancement of Christ's name, we must cheerfully submit to it, and be content to be any thing, to be nothing, so that Christ may be all.

11. John Baptist here advanceth Christ, and instructs his disciples concerning him, that they might be so far from grieving that so many come to him, that they might come to him themselves.

1. He instructs them concerning the dignity of Christ's person; ver. 31, "He that cometh from above," that "cometh from heaven, is above all." Here, 1st. He supposeth his Divine original,—that he came from above, from heaven, which speaks not only his Divine extraction, but his Divine nature. He had a being before his conception, a heavenly being. None but he that came from heaven was fit to shew us the will of Heaven or the way to heaven. When God would save man he sent from above. 2nd. Hence he infers his sovereign authority,—he is above all; above all things, and all persons. "God over all, blessed for evermore." It is daring presumption to dispute precedence with him. When we come to speak of the honours of the Lord Jesus, we find they transcend all conception and expression, and we can say but this, He is above all. It was said of John Baptist, "There is not a greater among them that are born of women," but the descent of Christ from heaven put such a dignity upon him as he was not divested of by his being made flesh; still he was above all.

This he farther illustrates by the meanness of those who stood in competition with him, "He that is of the earth is earthly," ὁ ὢν ἐκ τῆς γῆς ἐκ τῆς γῆς ἐστίν, "he that is of the earth is of the earth," he that has his original of the earth, has his food out of the earth, has his converse with earthly things, and his concern is for them. Note, First, Man has his rise out of the earth; not only Adam at first, but we also still are formed out of the clay, Job xxxiii. 6. Look to the rock whence we were hewn. Secondly, Man's constitution is therefore earthly; not only his body frail and mortal, but his soul corrupt and carnal, and its bent and bias strong towards earthly things. The prophets and apostles were of the same mould with other men; they were but earthen vessels, though they had a rich treasure lodged in them; and shall these be set up as rivals with Christ? "Let the pottersherds strive with the pottersherds of the earth," but let them not cope with him that came from heaven.

2. Concerning the excellency and certainty of his doctrine. His disciples were displeased that Christ's preaching was admired and attended upon more than his; but he tells them there was reason enough for it; for,

1st. He for his part spoke of the earth, and so do all those that are of the earth. The prophets were men, and spoke like men; of themselves they could not speak, but of the earth, 2 Cor. iii. 5. The preaching of the prophets and of John was but low and flat compared with Christ's preaching; as heaven is high above the earth, so were his thoughts above theirs. By them God spoke on earth, but in Christ he speaketh from heaven.

2nd. But he that cometh from heaven is not only in his person, but in his doctrine, above all the prophets that ever lived on earth; none teacheth like him. The doctrine of Christ is here recommended to us,

First, As infallibly sure and certain, and to be entertained accordingly; ver. 32, "what he hath seen and heard, that he testifieth." See here, 1st. Christ's Divine knowledge; he testified nothing but "what he had seen and heard," what he was perfectly apprized of, and thoroughly acquainted with. What he discovered of the Divine nature, and of the invisible world, was what he had seen; what he revealed of the mind of God, was what he had heard immediately from him, and not at second-hand. The prophets testified what was made known to them in dreams and visions, by the mediation of angels, but not what they had seen and heard. John was the crier's voice, that said, Make room for the witness, and keep silence, while the charge is given, but then leaves it to the witness to give in his testimony himself, and the judge to give the charge himself. The Gospel of Christ is not a doubtful opinion, like an hypothesis or new notion in philosophy, which every one is at liberty to believe or not; but it is a revelation of the mind of God, which is of eternal truth in itself, and of infinite concern to us. 2nd. His Divine grace and goodness; that which he had seen and heard, because he knew it nearly concerned us, he was pleased to make known to us. What Paul had seen and heard in the third heavens he could not testify, 2 Cor. xii. 4; but Christ knew how to utter what he had seen and heard. Christ's preaching is here called his testifying, to note, First, The convincing evidence of it; it was not reported, as news, by hearsay, but it was testified as evidence given in court, with great caution and assurance. Secondly, The affectionate earnestness of the delivery of it; it was testified with concern and importunity, as Acts xviii. 5.

From the certainty of Christ's doctrine John takes occasion, 1. To lament the infidelity of the most of men; though he testifies what is infallibly true, yet "no man receiveth his testimony;" that is, very few, next none, none in comparison with those that refuse it. They receive it not, they will not hear it; they do not heed it, or give credit to it. This he speaks of, not only as matter of wonder that such a testimony should not be received,—who hath believed our report? how stupid and foolish is the greatest part of mankind, what enemies to themselves!—but as a matter of grief; John's disciples grieved that all men came to Christ, ver. 26; they thought his followers too many. But John grieves that no man came to him, he thought them too few. Note, The unbelief of sinners is the grief of saints. It was for this that St. Paul had great heaviness, Rom. ix. 2. 2. He takes occasion to commend the faith of the chosen remnant; ver. 37, "He that hath received his testimony" (and some such there were, though very few), "hath set to his seal that God is true." God is true, though we do not set our seal to it; "let God be true, and every man a liar." His truth needs not our faith to support it; but by faith we do ourselves the honour and justice to subscribe to his truth, and hereby God reckons himself honoured. God's promises are all yea and amen; by faith we put our amen to them; as Rev. xii. 20. Observe, He that receives the testimony of Christ, subscribes not only to the truth of Christ, but to the truth of God; for his name is the Word of God; the commandments of God, and the testimony of Christ, are put together, Rev. xii. 17. By believing in Christ we set to our seal, 1st. That God is true to all the promises which he has made concerning Christ, that which he spake by the mouth of all his holy prophets; what he sware to our fathers is all accomplished, and not one iota or tittle of it fallen to the ground, Lu. i. 70, &c.; Acts xiii. 32, 33. 2nd. That he is true to all the promises he has made in Christ; we venture our souls upon God's veracity, being satisfied that he is true, we are willing to deal with him upon trust, and to quit all in this world for a happiness in reversion, and out of sight. By this we greatly honour God's faithfulness. Whom we give credit to, we give honour to.

Secondly, It is recommended to us as a Divine doctrine; not his own, but his that sent him, ver. 39; "for he whom God hath sent, speaks the word of God," which he was sent to speak, and enabled to speak, "for God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto him." The prophets were as messengers that brought letters from heaven; but Christ came under the character of an ambassador, and treats with us as such; for, 1st. He spoke the words of God, and nothing he said savoured of human infirmity; both substance and language were divine. He proved himself sent of God, ch. iii. 1; and therefore his words are to be received as the words of God. By this rule we may try the spirits; those that speak as the oracles of God, and prophesy according to the proportion of faith, are to be received as sent of God. 2nd. He spoke so as no other prophet did; "for God giveth not the Spirit by measure to him." None can speak the words of God, without the Spirit of God, 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11. The Old Testament prophets had the Spirit, and in different degrees, 2 Kin. ii. 9, 10; but whereas God gave them the Spirit by measure, 1 Cor. xii. 4, he gave him to Christ without measure; all fulness dwelt in him, the fulness of the Godhead, an unmeasurable fulness. The Spirit was not in Christ as in a vessel, but as in a fountain, as in a bottomless ocean. "The prophets that had the Spirit in a limited manner, only with respect to some particular revelation, sometimes spake of themselves; but he that had the Spirit always residing in him without stint, always spake the words of God;" so Dr. Whitby.

3. Concerning the power and authority he is invested with, which gives him the pre-eminence above all others, and a more excellent name than they.

1st. He is the beloved Son of the Father, ver. 35: "the Father loveth the Son." The prophets were faithful as servants, but Christ as a Son; they were employed as servants, but Christ beloved as a Son, always his delight, Pr. viii. 30. The Father was well pleased in him; not only he did love him, but he doth love him; he continued his love to him even in his estate of humiliation, loved him never the less for his poverty and sufferings.

2nd. He is Lord of all. The Father, as an evidence of his love to him, "hath given all things into his hand." Love is generous. The Father took such a complacency, and had such a confidence in him, that he constituted him the great feoffee in trust for mankind. Having given him the Spirit without measure, he gave him all things; for he was thereby qualified to be master and manager of all. Note, It is the honour of Christ, and the unspeakable comfort of all Christians, that the Father hath given all things into the hand of the Mediator. First, All power; so it is explained, Mat. xxviii. 18. All the works of creation being put under his feet, all the affairs of redemption are put into his hand; he is Lord of all. Angels are his servants, devils are his captives. He has power over all flesh; the heathen given him for his inheritance. The kingdom of providence is committed to his administration. He has power to settle the terms of the covenant of peace, as the great plenipotentiary; to govern his church, as the great lawgiver; to dispense Divine favours, as the great almoner; and to call all to account, as the great judge. Both the golden sceptre and the iron rod are given into his hand. Secondly, All grace is given into his hand, as the channel of conveyance; all things, that is, all those good things which God intended to give to the children of men—eternal life, and all its preliminaries. We are unworthy that the Father should give those things into our hands, for we have made ourselves the children of his wrath; he hath therefore appointed the Son of his love to be trustee for us; and the things he intended for us, he gives into his hands, who is worthy, and has merited both honours for himself, and favours for us. They are given into his hands, by him to be given into ours. This is a great encouragement to faith, that the riches of the new covenant are deposited in so sure, so kind, so good a hand, the hand of him that purchased them for us, and us for himself; who is able to keep all that which both God and believers have agreed to commit to him.

3rd. He is the object of that faith which is made the great condition of eternal happiness; and herein he has the pre-eminence above all others, ver. 36: "He that believeth on the Son hath life." We have here the application of what he had said concerning Christ and his doctrine; and it is the conclusion of the whole matter. If God has put this honour upon the Son, we must, by faith, give honour to him. As God offers and conveys good things to us by the testimony of Jesus Christ, whose word is the vehicle of Divine favours, so we receive and partake of those favours, by believing the testimony, and entertaining that word as true and good; this way of receiving fitly answers that way of giving. We have here the sum of that Gospel, which is to be preached to every creature, Mar. xvi. 16. Here is,

First, The blessed state of all true Christians: "He that believes on the Son hath everlasting life." Note, 1st. It is the character of every true Christian, that he believes on the Son of God; not only believes him, that what he saith is true, but believes on him, consents to him, and confides in him. 2nd. The benefit of true Christianity is no less than everlasting life; that is it which Christ came to purchase for us, and confer upon us; it can be no less than the happiness of an immortal soul in an immortal God. 3rd. True believers, even now, have everlasting life; not only they shall have it hereafter, but they have it now. For, First, They have very good security for it. The deed by which it passeth, is sealed and delivered to them, and so they have it; it is put into supplied with water was in all probability to secure an independent supply. Robinson says, "The well lay apparently before the city, and at some distance from it. In passing along the Eastern plain, Jesus had halted at the well, and sent his disciples to the city, situated in the narrow valley, intending on their return to proceed along the plain on his way to Galilee, without himself visiting the city." "Sixth hour;" mid-day.

iv. 9. "The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans;" rather omit the article before Jews and Samaritans. This is the language of the evangelist, explaining the words of the woman. On the animosity between Jews and Samaritans, it must be borne in mind that when Israel was carried away captive, other nations were placed in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel (2 Kings xvii. 23, 24). It would seem that these new Samaritans were Assyrians by birth or subjugation, and were utterly strangers in the cities of Samaria. They were regarded as an alien race by the Jews, who the hands of their guardian for them, and so they have it, though the use be not yet transferred into possession. They have the Son of God, and in him they have life, and the Spirit of God the earnest of this life. Secondly. They have the comfortable foretastes of it, in present communion with God, and the tokens of his love. Grace is glory begun.

Secondly. The wretched and miserable condition of unbelievers: "he that believeth not the Son" is undone, ἀπολλύται. The word includes both incredulity and disobedience. An unbeliever is one that gives not credit to the doctrine of Christ, nor is in subjection to the government of Christ. Now, those that will neither be taught nor ruled by Christ, 1st. They cannot be happy in this world, or that to come; "he shall not see life," that life which Christ came to bestow. He shall not enjoy it, he shall not have any comfortable prospect of it, shall never come within ken of it, except to aggravate his loss of it. 2nd. They cannot but be miserable; the wrath of God abides upon an unbeliever. He is not only under the wrath of God, which is as surely the soul's death, as his favour is its life; but it abides upon him. All the wrath he has made himself liable to by the violation of the law, if not removed by the grace of the Gospel, is bound upon him. God's wrath for his daily actual transgressions lights and lies upon him. Old scores lie undischarged, and new ones added; something done every day to fill the measure, and nothing to empty it. Thus the wrath of God abides, for it is treasured up against the day of wrath.

CHAPTER IV.

It was more than any thing else the glory of the land of Israel, that it was Emmanuel's land, Isa. viii. 9, not only the place of his birth, but the scene of his preaching and miracles. This land, in our Saviour's time, was divided into three parts: Judæa in the south, Galilee in the north, and Samaria lying between them. Now in this chapter we have Christ in each of these three parts of that land. I. Departing out of Judæa, ver. 1-3. II. Passing through Samaria, which, though a visit in transitu, here takes up most room. 1. His coming into Samaria, ver. 4-6. 2. His discourse with the Samaritan woman at a well, ver. 7-26. 3. The notice which the woman gave of him to the city, ver. 27-30. 4. Christ's talk with his disciples in the meantime, ver. 31-38. 5. The good effect of this among the Samaritans, ver. 39-42. III. We find him residing for some time in Galilee, ver. 43-46; and his curing of a nobleman's son there that was at death's door, ver. 46-54.

HEN therefore the Lord knew how the Pharisees had heard that Jesus made and baptized more disciples than John, 2 (Though Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples,) 3 He left Judæa, and departed again into Galilee.

We read of Christ's coming into Judæa, ch. iii. 22, after he had kept the feast at Jerusalem; and now he left Judæa four months before harvest, as is said here, ver. 35; so that it is computed he stayed in Judæa about six months, to build upon the foundation John had laid there. We have no particular account of his sermons and miracles there, only in general, ver. 1.

First. That he made disciples; he prevailed with many to embrace his doctrine, and to follow him as a teacher come from God; his ministry was successful, notwithstanding the opposition it met with, Ps. cx. 3; μαθηταὶ ποιεῖ; it signifies the same with μαθητεύω, to disciple. Compare Gen. xii. 5, "The souls which they had gotten;" which they had 'made,' so the word is, which they had made proselytes. Note, It is Christ's prerogative to make disciples; first to bring them to his foot, and then form and fashion them to his will. Fili non nascitur Christianus,—the Christian is made such, not born such.

Secondly. That he baptized those whom he made disciples; admitted them by washing them with water; not himself, but by the ministry of his disciples, ver. 2. 1. Because he would put a difference between his baptism and that of John, who baptized all himself; for he baptized as a servant, Christ as a master. 2. He would apply himself more to preaching work, which was the more excellent, 1 Cor. i. 17. He would put honour upon his disciples, by empowering and employing them to do it; and so train them up to farther services. 4. If he had baptized some himself, they would have been apt to value themselves upon that, and despise others, which he would prevent, as Paul, 1 Cor. i. 13, 14. 5. He would reserve himself for the honour of baptizing with the Holy Ghost, Acts i. 5. 6. He would teach us that the efficacy of sacraments depends not on any virtue in the hand that administers them; as also, that what is done by his ministers, according to his direction, he owns as done by himself.

Thirdly. That he "made and baptized more disciples than John;" not only more than John did at this time, but more than he had done at any time Christ's converse was more winning than John's; his miracles were convincing, and the cures he wrought gratis very inviting.

Fourthly. That the Pharisees were informed of this; they heard what multitudes he baptized, for they had, from his first appearing, a jealous eye upon him, and wanted not spies to give them notice concerning him. Observe, 1. When the Pharisees thought they had got rid of John, (for he was by this time clapped up,) and were pleasing themselves with that, Jesus appears, who was a greater vexation to them than ever John had been. The witnesses will rise again. 2. That which grieved them was, that Christ made so many disciples. The success of the Gospel exasperates its enemies; and it is a good sign it is getting ground, when the powers of darkness are enraged against it.

Fifthly. That our Lord Jesus knew very well what informations were given in against him to the Pharisees. It is likely the informers were willing to have their names concealed, and the Pharisees loath to have their designs known; but none can dig so deep as to hide their counsels from the Lord, Isa. xxix. 15; and Christ is here called the Lord. He knew what was told the Pharisees, and how much it is likely it exceeded the truth; for it is not likely that Jesus had yet baptized more than John; but so the thing was represented, to make him appear the more formidable; see 2 Kin. vi. 12.

Sixthly. That hereupon our Lord Jesus left Judæa, and departed again to go to Galilee.

1. He left Judæa, because he was likely to be persecuted there, even to the death, such was the rage of the Pharisees against him, and such their impious politics to devour the man-child in his infancy. To escape their designs, Christ quitted the country, and went thither, where what he did would be less provoking than just under their nose. For, 1st. His hour was not yet come, ch. vii. 38, the time fixed in the counsels of God, and the Old Testament prophecies for Messiah's being cut off. He had not finished his testimony, and therefore would not surrender or expose himself. 2nd. The disciples he had gathered in Judæa were not able to bear hardships, and therefore he would not expose them. 3rd. Hereby he gave an example to his own rule; "when they persecute you in one city, flee to another." We are not called to suffer, while we may avoid it without sin; and therefore, though we may not for our own preservation change our religion, yet we may change our place. Christ secured himself, not by miracle, but in a way common to men, for the direction and encouragement of his suffering people.

2. He departed into Galilee, because he had work to do there, and many friends, and fewer enemies. He went to Galilee now, 1st. Because John's ministry had now made way for him there; for Galilee, which was under Herod's jurisdiction, was the last scene of John's baptism. 2nd. Because John's imprisonment had now made room for him there. That light being now put under a bushel, the minds of people would not be divided between him and Christ. Thus both the liberties and restraints of good ministers are for the furtherance of the Gospel, Phil. i. 12. But to what purpose doth he go into Galilee for safety? Herod, the persecutor of John, will never be the protector of Jesus. Chennitius here notes, Pu in hac vita quos fugiant habent; ad quos vero fugiant ut in tuto sint non habent, nisi ad te, Deus, qui solus refugium nostrum es,—the pious have those in this life to whom they can flee, but they have none to flee to who can afford them refuge except thee, O God.

4 And he must needs go through Samaria. 5 Then cometh he to a city of Samaria, which is called Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph. 6 Now Jacob's well was there. Jesus therefore, being wearied with his journey, sat thus on the well: and it was about the sixth hour. 7 There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water: Jesus saith unto her, Give me to drink. 8 (For his disciples were gone away unto the city to buy meat.) 9 Then saith the woman of Samaria unto him, How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria? for the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans. 10 Jesus answered and said unto her, If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink; thou wouldest have asked of him, and refused their aid in rebuilding the Temple (Ezra iv. 2, 3), although they had to a large extent adopted Jewish rites and worship. After this refusal on the part of the Jews, they erected an independent Temple on Mount Gerizim. Their faith and practice were founded solely on the Pentateuch, and they rejected all other inspired writings. Christ himself makes a distinction between them and the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Matt. x. 5, 6). The antipathy extended to all matters of friendly intercourse or kindness; they did not refuse to enter into commercial relations with each other. This hostility gives point to the parable of the good Samaritan. (See also Luke xvii. 16-18.)

iv. 20. "This mountain:" i.e., Mount Gerizim.

iv. 21. "Neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem:" Alford renders, "Ye shall worship the Father, but not (only) in this mountain, nor in Jerusalem."

iv. 22. "Ye worship ye know not what," &c.: they had confused

he would have given thee living water. 11 The woman saith unto him, Sir, thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep: from whence then hast thou that living water? 12 Art thou greater than our father Jacob, which gave us the well, and drank thereof himself, and his children, and his cattle? 13 Jesus answered and said unto her, Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again: 14 But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life. 15 The woman saith unto him, Sir, give me this water, that I thirst not, neither come hither to draw. 16 Jesus saith unto her, Go, call thy husband, and come hither. 17 The woman answered and said, I have no husband. Jesus said unto her, Thou hast well said, I have no husband: 18 For thou hast had five husbands; and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband: in that saidst thou truly. 19 The woman saith unto him, Sir, I perceive that thou art a prophet. 20 Our fathers worshipped in this mountain; and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship. 21 Jesus saith unto her, Woman, believe me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. 22 Ye worship ye know not what: we know what we worship: for salvation is of the Jews. 23 But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him. 24 God is a Spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. 25 The woman saith unto him, I know that Messiah cometh, which is called Christ: when he is come, he will tell us all things. 26 Jesus saith unto her, I that speak unto thee am he.

We have here an account of the good Christ did in Samaria, when he passed through that country in his way to Galilee. The Samaritans, both in blood and religion, were mongrel Jews; the posterity of those colonies which the king of Assyria planted there after the captivity of the ten tribes, with whom the poor of the land that were left behind, and many other Jews, afterwards incorporated themselves. They worshipped the God of Israel only, to whom they erected a temple on mount Gerizim, in competition with that at Jerusalem. There was great enmity between them and the Jews; the Samaritans would not admit Christ when they saw he was going to Jerusalem, Lu. ix. 53. The Jews thought they could not give him a worse name, than to say, "He is a Samaritan." When the Jews were in prosperity, the Samaritans claimed kindred to them, Ezr. iv. 2; but when they were in distress they were Medes and Persians; Josephus Antiq. lib. xi. c. 8; lib. xii. c. 7. Now observe,

First, Christ's coming into Samaria. He charged his disciples not to enter into any city of the Samaritans, Matt. x. 5, namely, not to preach the Gospel, or work miracles; nor did he here preach publicly, or work any miracle, his eye being to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel." But what kindness he here did them was accidental; it was only a crumb of the children's bread that casually fell from the master's table.

1. His road from Judæa to Galilee lay through the country of Samaria; ver. 4. "He must needs go through Samaria." There was no other way, unless he would have fetched a compass on the other side Jordan, a great way about. The wicked and profane are at present so intermixed with God's Israel, that, unless we will go out of the world, we cannot avoid going through the company of such, 1 Cor. v. 10. We have therefore need of the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, that we may neither give provocation to them, nor contract pollution by them. We should not go into places of temptation but when we needs must; and then we should not reside in them, but hasten through them. Some think that therefore Christ must needs go through Samaria, because of the good work he had to do there: a poor woman to be converted, a lost sheep to be sought, and saved; this was work his heart was upon, and therefore he must needs go this way. It was happy for Samaria that it lay in Christ's way, which gave him an opportunity of calling on them. "When I passed by thee, I said unto thee, Live," Eze. xvi. 6.

2. His baiting place happened to be at a city of Samaria. Now observe, 1st. The place described. It was called Sychar; probably the same with Shechem, or Shechem, a place which we read much of in the Old Testament:

thus are the names of places commonly corrupted by tract of time. Shechem yielded the first proselytes that ever came into the church of Israel, Gen. xxxiv. 29, and xxxv. 2, and now it is the first place where the Gospel is preached out of the commonwealth of Israel; so Dr. Lightfoot observes; as also that the valley of Achor, which was given for a door of hope,—hope to the poor Gentiles,—ran along by this city, Hos. ii. 15. Abimelech was made king here; it was Jeroboam's royal seat; but the evangelist, when he would give us the antiquities of the place, takes notice of Jacob's interest there, which was more its honour than its crowned heads. First. Here lay Jacob's ground, "the parcel of ground which Jacob gave to his son Joseph," whose bones were buried in it; Gen. xlviii. 22; Jos. xxiv. 32. Probably this is mentioned to intimate that Christ, when he reposed himself hard by here, took occasion from the ground which Jacob gave Joseph, to meditate on the good report which the elders by faith obtained. Jerome chose to live in the land of Canaan, that the sight of the places might affect him the more with Scripture stories. Secondly. Here was Jacob's well which he digged, or at least used, for himself and his family. We find no mention of this well in the Old Testament, but the tradition was that it was Jacob's well.

2nd. The posture of our Lord Jesus at this place: "Being wearied with his journey, he sat thus on the well." We have here our Lord Jesus,

First. Labouring under the common fatigue of travellers: he was "wearied with his journey." Though it was yet but the sixth hour, and he had performed but half his day's journey, yet he was weary; or, because it was the sixth hour,—the time of the heat of the day,—therefore he was weary. Here we see, 1st. That he was a true man, and subject to the common infirmities of the human nature. Toil came in with sin, Gen. iii. 19, and therefore Christ, having made himself a curse for us, submitted to it. 2nd. That he was a poor man, else he might have travelled on horseback, or in a chariot. To this instance of meanness and mortification he humbled himself for us, that he went all his journeys on foot. When servants were on horses, princes walked as servants on the earth, Ecc. x. 7. When we are carried easily, let us think on the weariness of our Master. 3rd. It should seem he was but a tender man, and not of a robust constitution; it should seem his disciples were not tired, for they went into the town without any difficulty, when their Master sat down, and could not go a step farther. Bodies of the finest mould are most sensible of fatigue, and can worst bear it.

Secondly. We have him here betaking himself to the common relief of travellers; "being wearied, he sat thus on the well." 1st. He sat on the well, an uneasy place, cold and hard; he had no couch, no easy chair to repose himself in, but took to that which was next hand, to teach us not to be nice and curious in the conveniences of this life, but content with mean things. 2nd. He sat thus, in an uneasy posture; "sat carelessly,"—incuriosus et neglectus; or, he sat so as people that are wearied with travelling used to sit.

Secondly. His discourse with a Samaritan woman, which is here recorded at large, while Christ's dispute with the doctors, and his discourse with Moses and Elias on the mount are buried in silence.

This discourse is reducible to four heads.

1. They discourse concerning the water, ver. 7—15. Notice is first taken of the circumstances that gave occasion to this discourse.

1. "There comes a woman of Samaria to draw water." This intimates her poverty, she had no servant to be a drawer of water; and her industry, she would do it herself. See here, 1st. How God owns and approves of honest, humble diligence in our places. Christ was made known to the shepherds when they were keeping their flock. 2nd. How the Divine providence brings about glorious purposes by events which seem to us fortuitous and accidental. This woman's meeting with Christ at the well, may mind us of the stories of Rebekah, Rachel, and Jethro's daughter, who all met with husbands, good husbands, no worse than Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, when they came to the wells for water. 3rd. How the preventing grace of God sometimes brings people unexpectedly under the means of conversion and salvation. He is found of them that sought him not.

2. His disciples were gone away into the city to buy meat. Hence learn a lesson, 1st. Of justice and honesty: the meat Christ ate he bought and paid for, as Paul, 2 Thes. iii. 8. 2nd. Of daily dependence upon Providence: "take no thought for the morrow." Christ did not go into the city to eat, but sent his disciples to fetch his meat thither; not because he scrupled eating in a Samaritan city, but, First. Because he had a good work to do at that well, which might be done while they were catering. It is wisdom to fill up our vacant minutes with that which is good, that the fragments of time may not be lost. Peter, while his dinner was in getting, fell into a trance, Acts x. 10. Secondly. Because it was more private and retired, more cheap and homely, to have his dinner brought him hither, than to go into the town for it. Perhaps his purse was low, and he would teach us good husbandry; to spend according to what we have, and not go beyond it; however, he would teach us not to affect great things. Christ could eat his dinner as well upon a draw well as in the best inn in the town. Let us comport with our circumstances.

Now this gave Christ an opportunity of discoursing with this woman about spiritual concerns, and he improved it; he often preached to multitudes that crowded after him for instruction, yet here he condescends to teach a single person, a woman, a poor woman, a stranger, a Samaritan, to teach his ministers to do likewise; as those that know what a glorious achievement it is to help to save, though but one soul, from death. Let us observe the particulars of this discourse.

First. Jesus begins with a modest request for a draught of water; "Give me to drink." He that for our sakes became poor, here becomes a beggar, that they who are in want, and cannot dig, may not be ashamed to beg. Christ asked for it, not only because he needed it, and needed her help to come at it, but because he would draw on farther discourse with her, and teach us to be willing to be beholden to the meanest when there is occasion. Christ is still begging in his poor members, and a cup of cold water, like this here, given to them in his name, shall not lose its reward.

Secondly. The woman, though she doth not deny his request, yet quarrels with him because he did not carry on the humour of his own nation; ver. 9, "How is it?" Observe,

1st. What a mortal feud there was between the Jews and the Samaritans; "the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans." The Samaritans were the adversaries of Judah, Ezr. iv. 1; were upon all occasions mischievous to them. The Jews were extremely malicious against them, "looked upon them as having no part in the resurrection; excommunicated and cursed them by the sacred name of God; by the glorious writing of the tables, and by the curse of the upper and lower house of judgment; with this law, 'That no Israelite eat of any thing that is a Samaritan's, for it is as if he ate swine's flesh.'" So Dr. Lightfoot, out of Rabbi Tanchum. Note, Quarrels about religion are usually the most implacable of all other. Men were made to have dealings one with another; but if men, because one worships at one temple and another at another, will deny the offices of humanity and charity and common civility, will be proud and unnatural, scornful and censorious, and this under colour of zeal for religion, they plainly shew that however their religion may be true, they are not truly religious; but, pretending to stickle for religion, subvert the design of it.

notions of God, arising partly from their rejection of a large portion of revelation, and partly from the many superstitions derived from their heathen ancestors which had mingled with their worship. "Salvation is of the Jews:" according to the promise that the Messiah should be of the tribe of Judah (Gen. xlix. 10), and of the family of David (Rom. i. 3). Compare the recognition on the part of the Syrophenician woman (Matt. xv. 22).

iv. 26. "Messiah:" the Samaritans looked forward to the coming of a great teacher, whom they called "the Converter." Their views seem to have been less tainted by those political expectations which the Jews cherished. It is perhaps for this reason that our Lord declares his Messianic character more plainly here than among the Jews.

iv. 30. "Came unto him:" i.e., were coming, but had not yet arrived. This fits in with the phrase in the next verse, "In the meanwhile," &c.

2nd. How ready the woman was to upbraid Christ with the haughtiness and ill-nature of the Jewish nation; "How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me?" By his dress or dialect, or both, she knew him to be a Jew, and thinks it strange that he runs not to the same excess of riot against the Samaritans with other Jews. Note, Moderate men of all sides are (like Joshua and his fellows, Zec. iii. 8.) "men wondered at." Two things this woman wonders at: First, That he should ask this kindness; for it was the pride of the Jews that they would endure any hardship rather than be beholden to a Samaritan. It was part of Christ's humiliation that he was born of the Jewish nation, which was now not only in an ill state, subject to the Romans, but in an ill name among the nations; with what disdain did Pilate ask, "Am I a Jew?" Thus he made himself not only of no reputation, but of ill reputation; but herein he has set us an example of swimming against the stream of common corruptions. We must, like our Master, put on goodness and kindness, though it should be never so much the genius of our country, or the humour of our party, to be morose and ill-natured. This woman expected that Christ should be as other Jews were; but it is unjust to charge upon every individual person even the common faults of the community: no rule but has some exceptions. Secondly, She wonders he should expect to receive this kindness from her that was a Samaritan: You Jews would deny it to one of our nation, and why should we grant it to one of yours? Thus quarrels are propagated endlessly by revenge and retaliation.

Thirdly. Christ takes this occasion to instruct her in Divine things: ver. 10, "If thou knewest the gift of God, thou wouldst have asked." Observe, 1st. He waives her objection of the feud between the Jews and the Samaritans, and takes no notice of it. Some differences are best healed by being slighted, and by avoiding all occasions of entering into dispute about them. Christ will convert this woman, not by shewing her that the Samaritan worship was schismatical, though really it was so, but by shewing her her own ignorance and immoralities, and her need of a Saviour. 2nd. He possesseth her with an apprehension that she had now an opportunity, a fairer opportunity than she was aware of, of gaining that which would be of unspeakable advantage to her. She had not the helpings that the Jews had to discern: the signs of the times, and therefore Christ tells her expressly she had now a season of grace; this was the day of her visitation.

(1.) He hints to her what she should know, but was ignorant of; "If thou knewest the gift of God," that is, as the next words explain it, "who it is that saith, Give me to drink." If thou knewest who I am; she saw him to be a Jew, a poor, weary traveller, but he would have her know something more concerning him than did yet appear. Note, (1st.) Jesus Christ is the gift of God; the richest token of God's love to us, and the richest treasure of all good for us: a gift, not a debt which we could demand from God; not a loan, which he will demand from us again, but a gift, a free gift, ch. iii. 16. (2nd.) It is an unspeakable privilege to have this gift of God proposed and offered to us; to have an opportunity of embracing it. He who is the gift of God is now set before thee, and addresseth himself to thee; it is he that saith, "Give me to drink;" this gift comes begging to thee. (3rd.) Though Christ is set before us, and sues to us in and by his Gospel, yet there are multitudes that know him not; they know not who it is that speaks to them in the Gospel, that saith, "Give me to drink;" they perceive not that it is the Lord that calls them.

(2.) He hopes concerning her what she would have done if she had known him; to be sure she would not have given him such a rude and uncivil answer; nay, she would have been so far from affronting him, that she would have made her addresses to him; "Thou wouldst have asked." Note, (1st.) Those that would have any benefit by Christ, must ask for it, must be earnest in prayer to God for it. (2nd.) Those that have a right knowledge of Christ will seek to him; and if we do not seek unto him, it is a sign we do not know him, Pe. ix. 10. (3rd.) Christ knows what they that want the means of knowledge would have done if they had had them, Mat. xi. 21.

(3.) He assures her what he would have done for her if she had applied herself to him: "He would have given thee" (and not have upbraided thee, as thou dost me) "living water." By this living water is meant the Spirit, who is not like the water in the bottom of the well, which he asked for some of, but like living, or running water, which was much more valuable. Note, (1st.) The Spirit of grace is as living water; see ch. vii. 38. under this similitude the blessings of the Messiah had been promised in the Old Testament, Isa. xii. 3.; xxxv. 7.; xlv. 3. and lv. 1.; Zec. xiv. 8. The graces of the Spirit, and his comforts, satisfy the thirsting soul that knows its own nature and necessity. (2nd.) Jesus Christ can and will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him; for he received that he might give.

Fourthly. The woman objects against, and cavils at the gracious intimation Christ gave her; ver. 11, 12, "Thou hast nothing to draw with;" and besides, "Art thou greater than our father Jacob?" What he spoke figuratively she took literally; Nicodemus did so too. See what confused notions they have of spiritual things who are wholly taken up with the things that are sensual. Some respect she pays to his person, in calling him Sir, or Lord; but little respect to what he said, which she doth but banter.

1. She doth not think him capable of furnishing her with any water, no, not this in the well that is just at hand; "Thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep." This she said, not knowing the power of Christ; for he who causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth, needs nothing to draw: but there are those who will trust Christ no farther than they can see him, and will not believe his promise unless the means of the performance of it be visible; as if he were tied to our methods, and could not draw water without our buckets. She asks scornfully, "Whence hast thou this living water?" I see not whence thou canst have it. Note, The springs of that living water which Christ has for those that come to him, are secret and undiscovered: the fountain of life is hid with Christ. Christ has enough for us, though we see not whence he hath it.

2. She doth not think it possible he should furnish her with any better water than this, which she could come at, but he could not. "Art thou greater than our father Jacob, who gave us the well?"

1st. We will suppose the tradition true, that "Jacob himself, and his children, and cattle did drink of this well;" and we may observe from it, First. The power and providence of God in the continuance of the fountains of water from generation to generation, by the constant circulation of the rivers, like the blood in the body, Ecc. i. 7.; to which circulation, perhaps the flux and reflux of the sea, like the pulses of the heart, doth contribute. Secondly. The plainness of the patriarch Jacob; his drink was water, and he and his children drank of the same well with his cattle.

2nd. Yet allowing that to be true, she was out in several things; as, First. In calling Jacob "father." What authority had the Samaritans to reckon themselves of the seed of Jacob? they were descended from that mixed multitude which the king of Assyria had placed in the cities of Samaria; what have they to do then with Jacob? Because they were the invaders of Israel's rights, and the unjust possessors of Israel's lands, were they therefore the inheritors of Israel's blood and honour? How absurd were those pretensions! Secondly. She is out in claiming this well as Jacob's gift, whereas he did no more give it than Moses gave the manna, ch. vi. 32.; but thus we are apt to call the messengers of God's gifts the donors of them, and to look so much at the hands they pass through, as to forget the Hand they come from. Jacob gave it to his sons, not to them; yet thus the church's enemies not only usurp, but monopolize the church's privileges. Thirdly. She was out in speaking of Christ as not worthy to be compared with our father Jacob. An over fond veneration for antiquity makes God's graces in the good people of our own day to be slighted.

Fifthly. Christ answers this cavil, and makes it out that the living water he had to give was far better than that of Jacob's well, ver. 13, 14. Though she spoke perversely, Christ did not cast her off, but instructed and encouraged her. He shews her,

1. That the water of Jacob's well yielded but a transient satisfaction, and supply; "Whoso drinketh of this water shall thirst again." It is no better than other water; it will quench the present thirst, but the thirst will return, and in a few hours a man will have as much need and as much desire of water as ever he had. This speaks, 1st. The infirmities of our bodies in this present state; they are still necessitous and ever craving. Life is a fire, a lamp which will soon go out, without continual supplies of fuel and oil: the natural heat preys upon itself. 2nd. The imperfections of all our comforts in this world, they are not lasting, nor our satisfaction in them remaining; whatever waters of comfort we drink of we shall thirst again. Yesterday's meat and drink will not do to day's work.

2. That the living waters he would give should yield a lasting satisfaction and bliss, ver. 14. Christ's gifts appear most valuable when they come to be compared with the things of this world; for there will appear no comparison between them. Whoever partakes of the Spirit of grace, and the comforts of the everlasting Gospel, 1st. He shall never thirst; he shall never want that which will abundantly satisfy his soul's desires; they are longing, but not languishing; a desiring thirst he has, nothing more than God, but still more and more of God; but not a despairing thirst. 2nd. Therefore he shall never thirst, because this water that Christ gives "shall be in him a well of water." He can never be reduced to extremity that has in himself a fountain of supply and satisfaction. First. Ever ready; for it shall be in him. The principle of grace planted in him is the spring of his comfort; see ch. vii. 38. A good man is satisfied from himself, for Christ dwells in his heart; the anointing abides in him; he needs not sneak to the world for comfort; the work, and the witness of the Spirit in the heart, furnisheth him with a firm foundation of hope, and an overflowing fountain of joy. Secondly. Never failing; for it shall be in him a well of water. He that has at hand but a bucket of water, needs not thirst as long as that lasts, but that will soon be exhausted; but believers have in them a well of water, overflowing, ever flowing.

The principles and affections which Christ's holy religion forms in the souls of those that are captivated to the power of it, are this well of water. 1st. It is springing up, ever in motion, which speaks the actings of grace strong and vigorous. If good truths stagnate in our souls, like standing water, they do not answer the end of our receiving them: if there be a good treasure in the heart, we must thence bring forth good things. 2nd. It is springing up unto everlasting life; which speaks, (1.) The aims of gracious actings. A sanctified soul has its eye upon heaven; means that, designs that, doth all for that, will take up with nothing short of that. Spiritual life springs up towards its own perfection in eternal life. (2.) The constancy of those actings; it will continue springing up till it come to perfection. (3.) The crown of them; eternal life at last. The living water riseth from heaven, and therefore riseth towards heaven; see Ecc. i. 7. And now, is not this water better than that of Jacob's well?

Sixthly. The woman (whether in jest or earnest is hard to say) begs of him to give her some of this water; ver. 13, "Give me this water, that I thirst not."

1. Some think she speaks tauntingly, and ridicules what Christ had said as mere stuff; and in derision of it, not desiring, but challengeth him to give her some of this water: A rare invention! it will save me a deal of pain if I thirst not, and a deal of pains if I never come hither to draw. But, 2. Others think it was a well meant but weak and ignorant desire. She apprehended that he meant something very good and useful, and therefore saith Amen, at a venture; whatever it be, let me have it; who will shew me any good? and ease, or saving of labour is a valuable good to poor, labouring people. Note, 1st. Even those that are weak and ignorant, may yet have some faint and fluctuating desires towards Christ and his gifts, and some good wishes of grace and glory. 2nd. Carnal hearts, in their best wishes, look no higher than carnal ends: Give it me, saith she, not that I may have everlasting life, which Christ proposed, but that I come not hither to draw.

11. The next subject of discourse with this woman is, concerning her husband. Ver. 16-18. It was not to let fall the discourse of the water of life that Christ started this, as many, who will bring in any impertinence in conversation that they may drop a serious subject; but it was with a gracious design that Christ mentioned it. What he had said concerning his grace and eternal life, he found had made little impression upon her, because she had not been convinced of sin; therefore, waiving the discourse about the living water, he sets himself to awaken her conscience, to open the wound of guilt, and then she would more easily apprehend the remedy by grace. And this is the method of dealing with souls; they must first be made weary and heavy laden under the burthen of sin, and then brought to Christ for rest; first pricked to the heart, and then healed. This is the course of spiritual physic, and if we proceed not in this order, we begin at the wrong end. Observe,

1. How discreetly and decently Christ introduceth this discourse, ver. 16: "Go, call thy husband, and come hither." Now, 1st. This order Christ gave her had a very good colour. "Call thy husband," that he may teach thee, and help thee to understand these things, which thou art so ignorant of. The wives that will learn, must ask their husbands, 1 Cor. xiv. 35. who must dwell with them as men of knowledge, 1 Pet. iii. 7. "Call thy husband," that he may learn with thee; that then ye may be heirs together of the grace of life. "Call thy husband," that he may be witness to what passeth between us, Christ would thus teach us to provide things honest in the sight of all men, and to study that which is of good report. 2nd. As it had a good colour, so it had a good design, for from hence he would take occasion to call her sin to remembrance. There is need of art and prudence in giving reproofs, to fetch a compass; as the woman of Tekoa, 2 Sam. xiv. 20.

2. How industriously the woman seeks to evade the conviction, and yet insensibly convicts herself, and, ere she is aware, owns her fault; she said, "I have no husband." Her saying this intimated no more but that she did not care to have her husband spoken of, nor that matter mentioned any more. She would not have her husband come thither, lest in farther discourse the truth of the matter should come out, to her shame; and therefore, Pray go on to talk of something else; "I have no husband." She would be thought a maid or a widow; whereas, though she had no husband, she was neither. The carnal mind is very ingenious to shift off convictions, and to keep them from fastening; careful to cover the sin.

3. How closely our Lord Jesus brings home the conviction to her conscience. It is probable he said more than is here recorded, for she thought he told her all that ever she did, ver. 29; but that which is here recorded is concerning her husbands. Here is, 1st. A surprising narrative of her past conversation; principles." It is probable, Hengstenberg thinks, that Jesus pointed to the approaching Samaritans. Augustine remarks on the contrast between the state of the natural harvest and the spiritual. "You reckon," are his words of paraphrase, "four months to the harvest; I show you another harvest white and ready."

iv. 36. "Rejoice together;" alluding to the festivities of harvest, not without a hint, perhaps, of the quick succession of sowing and reaping in spiritual matters, where, as the prophet foretold, "the

iv. 35. "Four months;" "It was still winter, or early spring—four months yet to the harvest—and the bright golden ears of those fields had not yet whitened their unbroken expanse of verdure. But as he gazed upon them, they served to suggest the glorious vision of the distinct harvest of the Gentile world, which, with each successive turn of the conversation, unfolded itself more and more distinctly before him, as he sate (so we gather from the narrative) absorbed in the opening prospect, silent amidst his silent and astonished dis-

"thou hast had five husbands." Doubtless it was not her affliction, the burying of so many husbands, but her sin, that Christ intended to upbraid her with; either she had eloped, (as the law speaks,) had overrun her husbands, and married others, or by her undutiful, unclean, disloyal carriage, had provoked them to divorce her; or by indirect means had, contrary to law, divorced them. Those who make light of such scandalous practices as these, as no more but nine days' wonder, and as if the guilt were over as soon as the talk is over, should remember that Christ keeps account of all. 2nd. A severe reproof of her present state of life; "he whom thou now hast is not thy husband;" either she was never married to him at all, or he had some other wife; or, which is most probable, her former husband, or husbands, were living; so that, in short, she lived in adultery. Yet observe how mildly Christ tells her of it: he doth not call her a whore, but tells her, "he with whom thou livest is not thy husband;" and then leaves it to her own conscience to tell her so. Note, Reproofs are ordinarily most profitable when they are least provoking. 3rd. Yet in this he puts a better construction than it would well bear upon what she said by way of shuffle and evasion; "Thou hast well said, I have no husband;" and again, "in that saidst thou truly." What she intended as a denial of the fact, that she had none with whom she lived as a husband, he favourably interpreted, or at least turned upon her as a confession of the fault. Note, Those who would win souls should make the best of them, whereby they may hope to work upon their good nature; for if they make the worst of them, they certainly exasperate their ill nature.

III. The next subject of discourse with this woman is concerning the place of worship, ver. 19-24; where we may observe,

1. A case of conscience proposed to Christ, by the woman, concerning the place of worship, ver. 19, 20. And there, 1st. The inducement she had to put this case: "Sir, I perceive that thou art a prophet." She doth not deny the truth of what he had charged her with, but by her silence owns the justice of the reproof; nor is she put into a passion by it, as many are when they are touched in a sore place; doth not impute his censure to the general disgust the Jews had to the Samaritans; but (which is a rare thing) can bear to be told of a fault. But that is not all, she goes farther; First, She speaks respectfully to him, calls him, Sir. Thus should we honour those that deal faithfully with us. This was the effect of Christ's meekness in reproving her; he gave her no ill language, and then she gave him none. Secondly, She acknowledges him to be a prophet, one that had a correspondence with Heaven. Note, The power of the Word of Christ in searching the heart, and convincing the conscience of secret sins, is a great proof of its Divine authority, 1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25. Thirdly, She desires some farther instruction from him. Many that are not angry at their reprovers, nor fly in their faces, yet are afraid of them, and keep out of their way; but this woman was willing to have some more discourse with him that told her of her faults.

2nd. The case itself that she propounded concerning the place of religious worship in public. Some think she started this to shift off farther discourse concerning her sin. Controversies in religion often prove great prejudices to serious godliness; but it should seem she proposed it with a good design; she knew she must worship God, and desired to do it aright; and therefore meeting with a prophet begs his direction. Note, It is our wisdom to improve all opportunities of getting knowledge in the things of God. When we are in company with those that are fit to teach, let us be forward to learn; and have a good question ready to put to those who are able to give a good answer. It was agreed between the Jews and the Samaritans that God is to be worshipped; (those who were such fools as to worship false gods, yet were not such brutes as to worship none); and that religious worship is an affair of great importance; men would not contend about it, if they were not concerned about it. But the matter in variance was, where they should worship God. Observe how she states the case:

First, As for the Samaritans. "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain," near adjoining to this city, and this well; there the Samaritan temple was built by Sanballat; in favour of which she insinuates, 1st. That whatever the temple was, the place was holy; it was mount Gerizim, the mountain on which the blessings were pronounced; and some think the same on which Abraham built his altar, Gen. xii. 6, 7; and Jacob his, Gen. xxxiii. 18. 2nd. That it might plead prescription; for our fathers worshipped here. She thinks they have antiquity, tradition, and succession on their side. A vain conversation often supports itself with this, that it was received by tradition from our fathers. But she had little reason to boast of their fathers; for when Antiochus persecuted the Jews, the Samaritans, for fear of sharing with them in their sufferings, not only renounced all relation to the Jews, but surrendered their temple to Antiochus, with a request that it might be dedicated to Jupiter Olympius, and called by his name.—Jos. Antiq. lib. xii. c. 7.

Secondly, As to the Jews. Ye say that "in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship." The Samaritans governed themselves by the five books of Moses, and some think, received them only as canonical; now though they found frequent mention there of the place God would choose, yet they did not find it named there; and they saw the temple at Jerusalem stripped of many of its ancient glories, and therefore think themselves at liberty to set up another place; altar against altar.

2. Christ's answer to this case of conscience, ver. 21, &c. Those that apply themselves to Christ for instruction, shall find him meek, to teach the meek his way. Now here,

1st. He puts a slight upon the question, as she had proposed it, concerning the place of worship; ver. 21, "Woman, believe me," as a prophet, and mark what I say, thou art expecting the hour to come when, either by some Divine revelation, or some signal providence, this matter shall be decided in favour either of Jerusalem or of mount Gerizim; but I tell thee, the hour is at hand when it shall be no more a question; that which thou hast been taught to lay so much weight on shall be set aside as a thing indifferent. Note, It should cool us in our contentments to think that those things which now fill us, and which we make such a noise about, shall shortly vanish and be no more; and the very things we are striving about are passing away: "the hour comes, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father."

First, The object of worship is supposed to continue still the same, God, as a Father; under that notion the very heathen worshipped God; the Jews did so, and probably the Samaritans.

Secondly, But a period shall be put to all niceness and all differences about the place of worship. The approaching dissolution of the Jewish economy, and the erecting of the evangelical state, shall set this matter at large, and lay all in common, so that it shall be a thing perfectly indifferent whether in either of these places, or any other, men worship God, for they shall not be tied to any place; neither here nor there, but both, and any where, and every where. Note, The worship of God is not now, under the Gospel, appropriated to any place, as it was under the law, but it is God's will that men pray every where, 1 Tim. ii. 8; Mal. i. 11. Our reason teacheth us to consult decency and convenience in the places of our worship; but our religion gives no preference to one place above another in respect of holiness, and acceptableness to God. They who prefer any worship, merely for the sake of the house or building in which it is performed, though it were as magnificent and as solemnly consecrated as ever Solomon's temple was, forget that the hour is come when there should be no difference put in God's account; no, not between Jerusalem, which had been so famous for sanctity, and the mountain of Samaria, which had been so infamous for impiety.

2nd. He lays a stress upon other things in the matter of religious worship. When he made so light of the place of worship, he did not intend to lessen our concern about the thing itself, which therefore he takes occasion to discourse of more fully.

First, As to the present state of the controversy, he determines against the Samaritan worship, and in favour of the Jews, ver. 22. He tells her here,

1st. That the Samaritans are certainly in the wrong; not merely because they worshipped in this mountain—though while Jerusalem's choice was in force, that was sinful—but because they were out in the object of their worship; if the worship itself had been as it should be, its separation from Jerusalem might have been connived at, as the high places were in the best reigns; but "ye worship ye know not what;" or, "that which ye do not know." They worshipped the God of Israel, the true God, Ezr. iv. 2; 2 Kin. xvii. 32; but they were sunk into gross ignorance; they worshipped him as the God of that land, 2 Kin. xvii. 27, 33; as a local deity, like the gods of the nations; whereas God must be served as God, as the universal cause and Lord. Note, Ignorance is so far from being the mother of devotion, that it is the murderer of it. Those that worship God ignorantly, offer the blind for sacrifice; and it is the sacrifice of fools.

2nd. That the Jews were certainly in the right. For, First, "We know what we worship." We go upon sure grounds in our worship, for our people are catechised and trained up in the knowledge of God, as he has revealed himself in the Scripture. Note, Those who by the Scriptures have obtained some knowledge of God, (a certain, though not a perfect knowledge,) may worship him comfortably to themselves, and acceptably to him, for they know what they worship. Christ elsewhere condemns the corruptions of the Jews' worship, Mat. xv. 9, and yet here defends the worship itself; the worship may be true, where yet it is not pure and entire. Observe, Our Lord Jesus was pleased to reckon himself among the worshippers of God; "we worship."

"Though he were a Son," (and then are the children free) "yet learned he this obedience" in the days of his humiliation. Let not the greatest of men think the worship of God below them, when the Son of God himself did not. Secondly, "Salvation is of the Jews," and therefore they know what they worship, and what ground they go upon in their worship. Not that all the Jews were saved, or that it was not possible but that many of the Gentiles and Samaritans might be saved, for "in every nation he that fears God, and works righteousness, is accepted of him;" but, 1. The Author of eternal salvation comes of the Jews, and appears among them, Rom. ix. 8, and is sent first to bless them. 2. The means of eternal salvation are afforded to them; the word of salvation (Acts xiii. 26) was of the Jews; it was delivered to them, and was through them derived to other nations. This was a sure guide to them in their devotions; and they followed it, and therefore knew what they worshipped. "To them were committed the oracles of God," Rom. iii. 2; "and the service of God," Rom. ix. 4. The Jews therefore being thus privileged and advanced, it was presumption for the Samaritans to vie with them.

Secondly, He describes the evangelical worship, and which only God would accept of, and be well pleased with; having shewed that the place is indifferent, he comes to shew what is necessary and essential. That we worship God in spirit and in truth, ver. 23, 24. The stress is not to be laid upon the place where we worship God, but with what mind we worship him. Note, The most effectual way to take up differences in the lesser matters of religion, is to be more zealous in the greater. They who daily make it the matter of their care to worship in the spirit, one would think should not make it the matter of their strife, whether he should be worshipped here or there. Christ had justly preferred the Jewish worship before the Samaritan; yet here he intimates the imperfection of that. The worship was ceremonial, Heb. ix. 1, 10; the worshippers were generally carnal, and much strangers to the inward part of Divine worship. Note, It is possible we may be better than our neighbours, and yet not so good as we should be. It concerns us to be right, not only in the objects of our worship, but in the manner of it; and that is it which Christ here instructs us in. Observe,

1st. The great and glorious revolution which should introduce this change: "the hour cometh, and now is." The fixed stated time, concerning which it was of old determined when it should come, and how long it should last. The time of its appearance is fixed to an hour, so punctual and exact are the Divine counsels; the time of its continuance is limited to an hour, so close and pressing is the opportunity of Divine grace, 2 Cor. vi. 2. This hour cometh; it is coming in its full strength, lustre, and perfection; it now is in the embryo and infancy. The perfect day is coming, and now it dawns.

2nd. The blessed change itself. In Gospel times the "true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth;" as creatures we worship the Father of all; as Christians we worship the Father of our Lord Jesus.

Now the change shall be, First, In the nature of the worship; Christians shall worship God, not in the ceremonial observances of the Mosaic institution, but in spiritual ordinances; consisting less in bodily exercise, and animated and invigorated more with a Divine power and energy. The way of worship Christ has instituted is rational and intellectual, and refined from those external rites and ceremonies with which the Old Testament worship was both clouded and clogged. This is called true worship, in opposition to that which was typical: the legal services were figures of the true, Heb. ix. 9, 24. They that revolted from Christianity to Judaism, are said to begin in the Spirit, and end in the flesh, Gal. iii. 3. Such was the difference between Old Testament and New Testament institutions. Secondly, In the temper and disposition of the worshippers; and so the true worshippers are good Christians, distinguished from hypocrites; all should, and they will, worship God "in spirit and truth."

It is spoken of, ver. 23, as their character, and ver. 24, as their duty. Note, It is required of all that worship God that they "worship him in spirit and in truth." 1. We must worship God in spirit, Phil. iii. 3. We must depend upon God's Spirit for strength and assistance, laying our souls under his influences and operations; we must devote our own spirits to, and employ them in, the service of God, Rom. i. 9; must worship him with fixedness of thought, and a flame of affection—with all that is within us. Spirit is sometimes put for the new nature, in opposition to the flesh, which is the corrupt nature; and so to worship God with our spirit, is to worship him with our graces, Heb. xii. 28. 2. In truth, that is, in sincerity. God requires not only the inward part in our worship, but truth in the outward part, Ps. li. 6. We must mind the power more than the form: must aim at God's glory, and not to be seen of men; draw near with a true heart, Heb. x. 22.

Thirdly, The reasons why God must be thus worshipped.

1st. Because in Gospel times they, and they only, are accounted the true worshippers. The Gospel erects a spiritual way of worship; so that the professors of the Gospel are not true in their profession, do not live up to gospel light and laws, if they do not worship God "in spirit and in truth."

2nd. Because the Father seeketh such worshippers of him. This intimates, First, That such worshippers are very rare, and seldom met with, Jer. xxx. 21.

ploughman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed" (Amos ix. 13).

iv. 38. "Other men laboured;" i.e., prophets (Heb. xi. 39, 40; 1 Pet. i. 12); John the Baptist (Luke i. 17, iii. 4, 5); pre-eminent Christ himself, the sower, according to his own interpretation.

iv. 40. "Besought him that he would tarry," &c.: contrast the conduct of those other Samaritans who, influenced by their prejudices, refused to receive him. These rejoiced in one who was the Saviour of the world; those rejected him because he seemed about to bestow favour on others beside themselves (Luke ix. 51-53).

iv. 42. "Saying:" the Greek word here is not the same as that used in verse 39. The word here signifies "talking," "chat," "gossip;" the word in verse 39 has reference more to the substance of what was said than to the form in which it was said. Alford, however, says the words are perhaps not to be distinguished. But it is hardly possible not to see in the word (verse 42) something of the woman's

The gate of spiritual worshipping is strait. Secondly. That such worship is necessary, and what the God of heaven insists upon. When God comes to inquire for worshippers, the question will not be, who worshipped at Jerusalem, but who worshipped in spirit; that will be the touchstone. Thirdly. That God is greatly well pleased with, and graciously accepts of, such worship, and such worshippers; "I have desired it," Ps. cxxxii. 13, 14; Cant. ii. 14. Fourthly. That there has been, and will be to the end, a remnant of such worshippers; his seeking such worshippers, implies his taking them such. God is in all ages gathering in to himself a generation of spiritual worshippers.

3rd. Because "God is a spirit." Christ came to declare God to us, ch. i. 18; and this he has declared concerning him: He declared it to this poor Samaritan woman, for the meanest are concerned to know God; and with this design, to rectify her mistakes concerning religious worship; to which nothing would contribute more than the right knowledge of God. Note, First, "God is a spirit;" for he is an infinite and eternal mind; an intelligent being, incorporeal, immaterial, invisible, incorruptible. It is easier to say what God is not, than what he is: "a spirit has not flesh and bones;" but who knows the way of a spirit? If God were not a spirit, he could not be perfect, nor infinite, nor eternal, nor independent, nor the Father of spirits. Secondly. The spirituality of the Divine nature is a very good reason for the spirituality of Divine worship. If we do not worship God, who is a spirit, in the spirit, we neither give him the glory due to his name,—and so do not perform the act of worship,—nor can we hope to obtain his favour and acceptance; and so we miss the end of worship, Mat. xv. 8, 9.

IV. The last subject of discourse with this woman is concerning the Messiah, ver. 25, 26. Observe here,

1. The faith of the woman, by which she expected the Messiah; "I know that Messiah cometh . . . and he will tell us all things." She had nothing to object against what Christ had said; his discourse was, for aught she knew, what might become the Messiah then expected; but from him she would receive it, and in the mean time thinks best to suspend her belief. Thus many have no heart to the price in their hand, Pr. xvii. 16, because they think they have a better in their eye, and deceive themselves with a promise that they will learn that hereafter which they neglect now. Observe here,

1st. Whom she expects; "I know that Messiah cometh." The Jews and Samaritans, though so much at variance, agreed in the expectation of the Messiah and his kingdom. The Samaritans received the writings of Moses, and were no strangers to the prophets, nor to the hopes of the Jewish nation; those who knew least, knew this, that Messiah was to come; so general and uncontested was the expectation of him; and at this time more raised than ever, for the sceptre was departed from Judah; Daniel's weeks were near expiring; so that he concludes, not only he will come, but ερχεται, 'he comes'; he is just at hand, "Messias, which is called Christ." The evangelist, though he retains the Hebrew word Messiah, which the woman used, in honour to the holy language, and to the Jewish church, that used it familiarly, yet writing for the use of the Gentiles, he takes care to render it by a Greek word of the same signification, "which is called Christ," 'Anointed;' giving an example to the apostle's rule, that whatever is spoken in an unknown, or less vulgar tongue, should be interpreted, 1 Cor. xiv. 27, 28.

2nd. What she expects from him; "he will tell us all things," relating to the service of God, which are needful for us to know; will tell us that which will supply our defects, rectify our mistakes, and put an end to all our disputes. He will tell us the mind of God fully and clearly, and keep back nothing. Now this implies an acknowledgment, First. Of the deficiency and imperfection of the discovery they now had of the Divine will, and the rule they had of the Divine worship. It "could not make the comers thereunto perfect;" and therefore they expected some great advance and improvement in matters of religion, a time of reformation. Secondly. Of the sufficiency of the Messiah to make this change. "He will tell us all things" which we want to know, and about which we wrangle in the dark. He will introduce peace, by leading us into all truth, and dispelling the mists of error. It seems this was the comfort of good people in those dark times, that light would arise; if they found themselves at a loss, and run aground, it was a satisfaction to them to say, "When Messiah comes, he will tell us all things;" as it may be to us now, with reference to his second coming; now we see through a glass, but then face to face.

2. The favour of our Lord Jesus in making himself known to her, ver. 26; "I that speak unto thee am he." Christ did never make himself known so expressly to any, as he did here to this poor Samaritan, and to the blind man, ch. ix. 37; no, not to John Baptist, when he sent to him, Mat. xi. 4, 5; no, not to the Jews, when they challenged him to tell them whether he was the Christ, ch. x. 24. But, 1st. Christ would thus put an honour upon such as were poor and despised, Jas. ii. 6. 2nd. This woman, for aught we know, had never any opportunity of seeing Christ's miracles, which were then the ordinary method of conviction. Note, To those who have not the advantage of the external means of knowledge and grace, God hath secret ways of making-up the want of them; we must therefore judge charitably concerning such. God can make the light of grace shine into the heart, even where he doth not make the light of the Gospel shine in the face. 3rd. This woman was better prepared to receive such a discovery than others were; she was big with expectation of the Messiah, and ready to receive instruction from him. Christ will manifest himself to those who, with an honest humble heart, desire to be acquainted with him; "I that speak unto thee am he." See here, First. How near Jesus Christ was to her, when she knew not who he was, Gen. xxviii. 16; many are lamenting Christ's absence, and longing for his presence, when at the same time he is speaking to them. Secondly. How Christ makes himself known to us, by speaking to us; "I that speak unto thee," so closely, so convincingly, with such assurance, with such an authority, "I am he."

27 And upon this came his disciples, and marvelled that he talked with the woman: yet no man said, What seekest thou? or, Why talkest thou with her? 28 The woman then left her waterpot, and went her way into the city, and saith to the men, 29 Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ? 30 Then they went out of the city, and came unto him. 31 In the mean while his disciples prayed him, saying, Master, eat. 32 But he said unto them, I have meat to eat that ye know not of. 33 Therefore said the disciples one to another, Hath any man brought him ought to eat? 34 Jesus saith unto them, My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work. 35 Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest? behold, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest. 36 And he that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal: that both he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together. 37 And herein is that saying true, One soweth, and another reapeth. 38 I sent you to reap that whereon ye bestowed no labour: other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours. 39 And many of the Samaritans of that city believed on him for the saying of the woman, which testified, He told me all that ever I did. 40 So when the Samaritans were come unto him, they besought him that he would tarry with them: and he abode there two days. 41 And many more believed because of his own word; 42 And said unto the woman, Now we believe, not because of thy saying: for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world.

WOMAN OF SAMARIA.

We have here the remainder of the story of what happened when Christ was in Samaria, after the long conference he had with the woman.

First. The interruption given to this discourse by the disciples' coming. It is likely much more was said than is recorded; but just when the discourse was brought to a head, when Christ had made himself known to her as the true Messiah, "then came the disciples." The daughters of Jerusalem shall not stir up nor awake my love till he please. 1st. They admired at Christ's converse with this woman: marvelled that he talked thus earnestly (as perhaps they observed at a distance) with a woman, a strange woman, alone; he used to be more reserved, especially with a Samaritan woman, that was not of the lost sheep of the house of Israel; they thought their Master should be as shy of the Samaritans as the other Jews were, at least that he should not preach the Gospel to them. They wondered he should condescend to talk with such a poor contemptible woman, forgetting what despicable men they themselves were when Christ first called them into fellowship with himself. 2nd. Yet they acquiesced in it; they knew it was for some good reason, and some good end, which he was not bound to give them an account of, and therefore none of them asked, "What seekest thou? or, Why talkest thou with her?" Thus when particular difficulties occur in the word and providence of God, it is good to satisfy ourselves with this in general, that all is well which Jesus Christ saith and doth. Perhaps there was something amiss in their marvelling that Christ talked with the woman, and that it was something like the Pharisees being offended at his eating with publicans and sinners; but whatever they thought, they said nothing: "If thou hast thought evil," at any time, "lay thy hand upon thy mouth," to keep that evil thought from turning into an evil word, Pr. xxx. 32; Ps. xxxix. 1-5.

Secondly. The notice which the woman gave to her neighbours, what an extraordinary person she had happily met with, ver. 28, 29. Observe here,

1. How she forgot her errand to the well, ver. 28. Therefore because the disciples were come, and broke up the discourse, and perhaps she observed they were not pleased with it, she went her way. She withdrew in civility to Christ, that he might have leisure to eat his dinner; she delighted in his discourse, but would not be rude: every thing is beautiful in its season. So eager and diffuse report to them. See John viii. 43, where the two words are used. The word which is there translated "speech" is the same as that used here in verse 42—"saying." The word there translated "word" is that which is employed in verse 39 of this chapter. The whole might better be rendered thus: "No longer do we believe because of thy story, for we have heard for ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Saviour of the world." The word "Christ" is omitted in the best MSS., and the word rendered here

"no longer" (the "not" of the Authorised Version) implies that they believed now on different grounds.

iv. 43. "After two days:" rather "the two days"—i.e., at the close of the two days spent among the Samaritans (verse 40).

iv. 44. "Testified that a prophet," &c.: a difficulty has been felt in the reason that the evangelist assigns for Christ going into Galilee—viz., that a prophet hath no honour in his own country. The usual explanation is that the word "Galilee" does not include supposed that Jesus, when he had dined, would go forward on his journey, and therefore hastened to tell her neighbours, that they might come quickly: "Yet a little while is the light with you." See how she improved time; when one good work was done, she applied herself to another. When opportunities of getting good cease, or are interrupted, we should seek opportunities of doing good; when we have done hearing the word, then is a time to be speaking of it.

Notice is taken of her leaving her waterpot, or pail. 1st. She left it in kindness to Christ, that he might have to drink with his dinner; and fair water was his drink; he turned water into wine for others, but not for himself. Compare this with Rebecca's civility to Abraham's servant, Gen. xxiv. 18, and see that promise, Mat. x. 42. 2nd. She left it, that she might make the more haste into the city, to carry thither these good tidings. Those whose business it is to publish the name of Christ, must not encumber or entangle themselves with any thing that will retard or hinder them therein. When the disciples were to be made fishers of men, they must forsake all. 3rd. She left her waterpot as one careless of it, being wholly taken up with better things. Note, Those who are brought to the knowledge of Christ will shew it by a holy contempt of the things of this world and the things of it. And those who are newly acquainted with the things of God, must be excused if at first they be so taken up with that new world into which they are brought, that the things of this world seem to be for a time wholly neglected. Mr. Hildersham, in one of his sermons on this verse, from this instance largely justifies those who leave their worldly business on week-days to go hear sermons.

2. How she minded her errand to the town, for her heart was upon it; "she went into the city, and said to the men," probably the aldermen, the men in authority, whom, it may be, she found met together upon some public business; or to the men, that is, to every man she met in the streets; she proclaimed it in the chief places of concourse, "Come, see a man which told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ?" Observe,

1st. How solicitous she was to bring her friends and neighbours acquainted with Christ. When she had found that treasure, she called together her friends and neighbours, as Lu. xv. 4, not only to rejoice with her, but to share with her; knowing there was enough to enrich herself and all that would partake with her. Note, They that have been themselves with Jesus, and have found comfort in him, should do all they can to bring others to him; has he done us the honour to make himself known to us? let us do him the honour to make him known to others; nor can we do ourselves a greater honour. This woman becomes an apostle; quæ scortum fuerat egressa, repredicatur magistra evangelica;—she who went forth a specimen of impurity, returns a teacher of evangelical truth, saith Aretius. Christ had bid her call her husband, which she thought was warrant enough to call every body. She went into the city, the city where she dwelt, among her kinsfolk and acquaintance. Though every man is my neighbour that I have opportunity of doing good to, yet I have most opportunity, and therefore lie under the most obligations, to do good to those that live near me. Where the tree falls, there let it be made useful.

2nd. How fair and ingenuous she was in the notice she gave them concerning this stranger she had met with.

First. She tells them plainly what induced her to admire him; "he has told me all things that ever I did." No more is recorded but what he told her of her husbands; but it is not improbable he had told her more of her faults; or, his telling her of that which she knew he could not by any ordinary means come to the knowledge of, convinced her that he could have told her of all that ever she did. If he has a Divine knowledge, it must be omniscience. He told her that which none knew but God and her own conscience. Two things affected her: 1st. The extent of his knowledge; we ourselves cannot tell all things that ever we did, many things pass unheeded, and more pass away and are forgotten; but Jesus Christ knows all the thoughts, words, and actions of all the children of men; see Heb. iv. 13; he hath said, "I know thy works." 2nd. The power of his word; this made a great impression upon her, that he told her her secret sins, with such an unaccountable power and energy, that being told of one, she is convicted of all, and judged of all. She doth not say, Come see a man that has told me strange things concerning religious worship, and the laws of it; that has decided the controversy between this mountain and Jerusalem; a man that calls himself the Messiah; but, Come see a man that has told me of my sins; she fastens upon that part of Christ's discourse, which one would think she should have been most shy of repeating; but experimental proofs of the power of Christ's word and Spirit are, of all other, the most cogent and convincing; and that knowledge of Christ, into which we are led by the conviction of sin and humiliation, is most likely to be sound and saving.

Secondly. She invites them to come and see him whom she had conceived so high an opinion of. Not barely come and look upon him,—she doth not invite them to him as a show,—but come and converse with him; come and hear his wisdom, as I have done, and you will be of my mind. She would not undertake to manage the arguments which had convinced her, in such a manner as to convince others; all that see the evidence of truth themselves are not able to make others see it; but come and talk with him, and you will find such a power in his word as far exceeds all other evidence. Note, Those who can do little else towards the conviction and conversion of others, may and should bring them to those means of grace which they themselves have found effectual. Jesus was now at the town's end: Now come, see him. When opportunities of getting the knowledge of God are brought to our doors, we are inexcusable if we neglect them; shall we not go over the threshold to see Him whose day prophets and kings desired to see?

Thirdly. She resolves to appeal to themselves, and their own sentiments, upon the trial; "Is not this the Christ?" She doth not peremptorily say, "he is the Messiah," how clear soever she was in her own mind; and yet she very prudently mentions the Messiah, whom otherwise they would not have thought of, and then refers it to themselves; she will not impose her faith upon them, but only propose it to them. By such fair but forcible appeals as these, men's judgments and consciences are sometimes taken hold of, ere they are aware.

3rd. What success she had in this invitation, ver. 30: they "went out of the city, and came to him." Though it might seem very improbable that a woman of so small a figure and so ill a character should have the honour of the first discovery of the Messiah among the Samaritans; yet it pleased God to incline their hearts to take notice of her report, and not to slight it as an idle tale. Time was when lepers were the first that brought tidings to Samaria of a great deliverance, 2 Kin. vii. 3, &c. They came unto him; did not send for him into the city to them; but in token of their respect to him, and the earnestness of their desire to see him, they went out to him. Those that would know Christ, must meet him where he records his name.

Fourthly. Christ's discourse with his disciples, while the woman was absent, ver. 31—34. See how industrious our Lord Jesus was to redeem time, to husband every minute of it, and to fill up the vacancies of it. When the disciples were gone into the town, his discourse with the woman was edifying, and suited to her case; when she was gone into the town, his discourse with them was no less edifying, and suited to their case; it were well if we could thus gather up the fragments of time, that none of it may be lost. Two things are observable in this discourse:

1. How Christ expresseth the delight which he himself had in his work. His work was to seek and save that which was lost; to go about doing good. Now this work we here find him wholly taken up with; for,

1st. He neglected his meat and drink for his work. "When he sat down upon the well, he was weary, and needed refreshment; but this opportunity of saving souls made him forget his weariness and hunger; and he minded his food so little that, First. His disciples were forced to invite him to it; they prayed him, they pressed him, saying, 'Master, eat.' It was an instance of their love to him, that they invited him, lest he should be faint and sick for want of some support; but it was a greater instance of his love to souls, that he needed invitation. Let us learn hence a holy indifference even to the needful supports of life, in comparison with spiritual things. Secondly. He minded it so little, that they suspected he had meat brought him in their absence, ver. 33: "Has any man brought him ought to eat?" he had so little stomach to his dinner that they were ready to think he had dined already. They that make religion their business, when any of its affairs are to be attended, will prefer them before their food; as Abraham's servant, that would not eat till he had told his errand, Gen. xxiv. 33; and Samuel, that would not sit down till David was anointed, 1 Sam. xvi. 11.

2nd. He made his work his meat and drink. The work he had done in instructing the woman; the work he had to do among the Samaritans; the prospect he now had of doing good to many,—this was meat and drink to him, it was the greatest pleasure and satisfaction imaginable. Never did a hungry man, or an epicure, expect a plentiful feast with so much desire, nor feed upon its dainties with so much delight, as our Lord Jesus expected and improved an opportunity of doing good to souls. Concerning this he saith,

First. That it was such meat as the disciples knew not of: they did not imagine that he had any design or prospect of planting his Gospel among the Samaritans; this was a piece of usefulness they never thought of. Note, Christ by his Gospel and Spirit doth more good to the souls of men than his own disciples know of, or expect. This may be said of good Christians too who live by faith, that they have meat to eat which others know not of,—joy which a stranger doth not intermeddle with. Now this word made them ask, "Has any man brought him ought to eat?" so apt were even his own disciples to understand him after a corporal and carnal manner when he used similitudes.

Secondly. That the reason why his work was his meat and drink was, because it was his Father's work, his Father's will; ver. 34, "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me." Note, 1st. The salvation of sinners is the will of God, and the instruction of them in order thereunto is his work; see 1 Tim. ii. 4. There is a chosen remnant, whose salvation is in a particular manner his will. 2nd. Christ was sent into the world on this errand, to bring people to God; to know him, and to be happy in him. 3rd. He made this work his business and delight. When his body needed food, his mind was so taken up with this, that he forgot both hunger and thirst, both meat and drink. Nothing could be more grateful to him than doing good; when he was invited to meat, he went that he might do good, for that was his meat always. 4th. He was not only ready upon all occasions to go to his work, but he was earnest and in care to go through it, and to finish his work, in all the parts of it. He resolved never to quit it, or lay it down, till he could say, "It is finished." Many have zeal to carry them out at first, but not zeal to carry them on to the last; but our Lord Jesus was intent upon finishing his work. Our Master has herein left us an example, that we may learn to do the will of God as he did. First. With diligence and close application, as those that make a business of it. Secondly. With delight and pleasure in it, as in our element. Thirdly. With constancy and perseverance; not only minding to do but aiming to finish, our work.

2. See here how Christ, having expressed his delight in his work, excites his disciples to diligence in their work: they were workers with him, and therefore should be workers like him, and make their work their meat, as he did. The work they had to do was to preach the Gospel, and by it to set up the kingdom of the Messiah. Now this work he here compares to harvest work, which is the gathering in of the fruits of the earth; and this similitude he prosecutes throughout this discourse, ver. 35—38. Note, Gospel time is harvest time, and gospel work harvest work. The harvest is before appointed and expected, so was the Gospel. Harvest time is busy time; all hands must be then at work; every one must work for himself, that he may reap of the graces and comforts of the Gospel: ministers must work for God, to gather in souls to him. Harvest time is opportunity, a short and limited time, which will not last always; and harvest work is work that must be done then, or not at all; so the time of the enjoyment of the Gospel is a particular season, which must be improved for its proper purposes; for once past, it cannot be recalled. The disciples were to gather in a harvest of souls for Christ. Now he here suggests three things to them, to quicken them to diligence:

1st. That it was necessary work, and the occasion for it very urgent and pressing, ver. 35: "Ye say, It is four months to harvest; but I say, The fields are already white." Here is, First. A saying of Christ's disciples concerning the corn-harvest; "there are yet four months, and then cometh harvest," which may be taken either generally, You say, for the encouragement of the sower at seed time, that it will be but four months to the harvest. With us it is but about four months between the barley seedness and the barley harvest; probably it was so with them as to other grain; or particularly, Now at this time you reckon it will be four months to next harvest, according to the ordinary course of providence. The Jews' harvest began at the passover, about Easter, much earlier in the year than ours; by which it appears that this journey of Christ from Judæa to Galilee was in the winter, about the end of November, for he travelled all weathers to do good. God has not only promised us a harvest every year, but has appointed the weeks of harvest, so that we know when to expect it, and take our measures accordingly. Secondly. Here is a saying of Christ's concerning the gospel harvest; his heart was as much upon the fruits of his Gospel as the hearts of others were upon the fruits of the earth; and to that he would lead the thoughts of his disciples: "Look, the fields are already white unto the harvest."

1st. Here, in this place, where they now were, there was harvest work for him to do. They would have him to eat, ver. 31. "Eat!" saith he; "I have other work to do, that is more needful. Look what crowds of Samaritans are coming out of the town, over the fields, that are ready to receive the Gospel." Probably there were many now in view. People's forwardness to hear the Word is a great excitement to ministers' diligence and liveliness in preaching it.

2nd. In other places, all the country over, there was harvest work enough for them all to do. Consider the regions, think of the state of the country, and you will find there are multitudes as ready to receive the Gospel as a field of corn that is fully ripe is ready to be reaped. The fields were now made white to the harvest. First. By the decree of God, revealed in the prophecies of the Old Testament. Now was the time when the gathering of the people should be to Christ, Gen. xlix. 10; when great accessions should be made to the church, and the bounds of it should be enlarged; and therefore it was time for them to Nazareth, but is employed to designate the country of Samaria, in contradistinction from the town of Nazareth. Thus the statement would amount to this, that he went into the province, avoiding Nazareth, where he knew his reception would not be favourable. Alford, however, is of opinion that our Lord left Judæa to escape the publicity that was gathering round him; and to avoid fame, betook himself to Galilee, where, as a prophet, he was least likely to be honoured.

iv. 45. "The Galileans received him:" see chap. n. 23. "For they also," &c.: inserted for the benefit of those readers who might not be aware that the Galileans frequented the feasts at Jerusalem.

iv. 46. "Nobleman:" probably an officer belonging to the household of Herod Antipas. It has been conjectured that he was Chuza, Herod's steward (Luke viii. 3). He was most likely a Jew. "Capernaum:" "a town choicely situated on the north-west shore of the Sea of Galilee. Its position at the head of the lake gave it a be busy. It is a great encouragement to us to engage in any work for God, if we understand by the signs of the times that this is the proper season for that work, for then it will prosper. Secondly. By the disposition of men. John Baptist had made ready a people prepared for the Lord, Lu. i. 17; since he began to preach the kingdom of God every man pressed into it, Lu. xvi. 16; this, therefore, was a time for the preachers of the Gospel to apply themselves to their work with the utmost vigour, to thrust in their sickle when the harvest was ripe, Rev. xiv. 15. It was necessary to work now; pity such a season should be let slip. If the corn that is ripe be not reaped, it will shed, and be lost, and the fowls will pick it up; if souls that are under convictions, and have some good inclinations, be not helped now, their hopeful beginnings will come to nothing, and they will be a prey to pretenders. It was also easy to work now; when the people's hearts are prepared, the work will be done suddenly, 2 Chr. xxix. 36. It cannot but quicken ministers to take pains in preaching the Word, when they observe that people take pleasure in hearing it.

2nd. That it was profitable and advantageous work, which they themselves would be gainers by; ver. 36, "he that reapeth receiveth wages," and so shall you. Christ has undertaken to pay those well whom he employs in his work, for he will never do as Jehoiakim did, that used his neighbours' service without wages, Jer. xxii. 13, or those who by fraud kept back the hire of those particularly who reaped down their corn fields, Jas. v. 4. Christ's reapers, though they cry to him day and night, shall never have cause to cry against him, nor to say they served a hard master: he that reapeth, not only shall receive wages, but death receive it: there is a present reward in the service of Christ, and his work is its own wages. First. Christ's reapers have fruit; "he gathereth fruit unto life eternal;" that is, he shall both save himself and those that hear him, 1 Tim. iv. 16. If the faithful reaper save his own soul, that is fruit abounding to his account; it is fruit gathered to life eternal; and if over and above this he be instrumental to save the souls of others too, there is fruit gathered. Souls gathered to Christ are fruit, good fruit, the fruit that Christ seeks for, Rom. i. 13; it is gathered for Christ, Cant. viii. 11, 12; it is gathered to life eternal. This is the comfort of faithful ministers, that their work has a tendency to the eternal salvation of precious souls. Secondly. They have joy; "that he that sows and they that reap may rejoice together." The minister who is the happy instrument of beginning a good work is he that sows, as John Baptist was; he that is employed to carry it on and perfect it is he that reaps, and both shall rejoice together. Note, 1st. Though God is to have all the glory of the success of the Gospel, yet faithful ministers may take themselves the comfort of it. The reapers share in the joy of harvest, though the profits belong to the master, 1 Thes. ii. 19. 2nd. Those ministers who are variously gifted and employed should be so far from envying one another, that they should rather mutually rejoice in each other's success and usefulness. Though all Christ's ministers are not alike serviceable, nor alike successful, yet, if they have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, they shall all enter together into the joy of their Lord at last.

3rd. That it was easy work, and work that was half done to their hands by those that were gone before them; ver. 37, 38, "One soweth and another reapeth." This sometimes speaks a grievous judgment upon him that sows, Nic. vi. 15; Deu. xxviii. 30; "Thou shalt sow, and another shall reap;" as Deu. vi. 11, "houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not." So here, Moses, and the prophets, and John Baptist, had paved the way to the Gospel, had sown the good seed which the New Testament ministers did in effect but gather the fruit of; "I sent you to reap that whereon ye bestowed," in compassion, "no labour" Isa. xl. 3-5.

This speaks two things concerning the Old Testament ministry: First. That it was very much short of the New Testament ministry. Moses and the prophets sowed, but they could not be said to reap, so little did they see of the fruit of their labours. Their writings have done much more good since they left us than ever their preaching did. Secondly. That it was very much serviceable to the New Testament ministry, and made way for it. The writings of the prophets, which were read in the synagogues every sabbath day, raised people's expectations of the Messiah, and so prepared them to bid him welcome. Had it not been for the seed sown by the prophets, this Samaritan woman could not have said, "We know that the Messiah cometh." The writings of the Old Testament are in some respects more useful to us than they could be to those to whom they were first written, because better understood by the accomplishment of them, see 1 Pet. i. 12; Heb. iv. 2; Rom. xvi. 25, 26.

This also speaks two things concerning the ministry of the apostles of Christ: First. That it was a fruitful ministry. They were reapers that gathered in a great harvest of souls to Jesus Christ; and did more in seven years towards the setting up of the kingdom of God among men than the prophets of the Old Testament had done in twice so many ages. Secondly. That it was much facilitated, especially among the Jews, to whom they were first sent, by the writings of the prophets. The prophets sowed in tears, crying out, We have laboured in vain; the apostles reaped in joy, saying, "Thanks be to God, who always causeth us to triumph." Note, From the labours of ministers that are dead and gone, much good fruit may be reaped by the people that survive them, and the ministers that succeed them. John Baptist, and those that assisted him, had laboured; and the disciples of Christ entered into their labours, built upon their foundation, and reaped the fruit of what they sowed. See what reason we have to bless God for those that are gone before us, for their preaching and their writing, for what they did and suffered in their day, for we are entered into their labours; their studies and services have made our work the easier. And when the ancient and modern labourers, those that came into the vineyard at the third hour, and those that came in at the eleventh, meet in the day of account, they will be so far from envying one another the honour of their respective services, that both they that sowed and they that reaped shall rejoice together; and the great Lord of the harvest shall have the glory of all.

Fourthly. The good effect which this visit Christ made to the Samaritans (en passant) had upon them, and the fruit which was now presently gathered among them, ver. 39, 42. See what impressions were made on them:

1. By the woman's testimony concerning Christ. Though a single testimony, and one of no good report, and the testimony no more but this, "He told me all that ever I did," yet it had a good influence upon many. One would have thought his telling the woman of her secret sins should have made them afraid of coming to him, lest he should tell them also of their faults; but they will venture that, rather than not be acquainted with one that they had reason to think was a prophet. And two things they were brought to,

1st. To credit Christ's words; ver. 39, "Many" of the Samaritans "of that city believed on him for the saying of the woman." So far they believed on him that they took him for a prophet, and were desirous to know the mind of God from him: this is favourably interpreted a believing on him. Now observe, First. Who they were that believed; many of the Samaritans, who were not of the house of Israel. Their faith was not only an aggravation of the unbelief of the Jews, from whom better might have been expected, but an earnest of the faith of the Gentiles, who would welcome that which the Jews rejected. Secondly. Upon what inducement they believed; "for the saying of the woman." See here, 1st. How God is sometimes pleased to use very weak and unlikely instruments for the beginning and carrying on of a good work. A little maid directed a great prince to Elsha, 2 Kin. v. 2. 2nd. How great a matter a little fire kindles; our Saviour, by instructing one poor woman, spread instruction to a whole town. Let not ministers be either careless in their preaching, or discouraged in it, because their hearers are few and mean; for by doing good to them, good may be conveyed to more, and those that are more considerable; if they teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, a great number may learn at second hand. Philip preached the Gospel to a single gentleman, in his chariot, upon the road; and he not only received it himself, but carried it into his country, and propagated it there. 3rd. See how good it is to speak experimentally of Christ and the things of God. This woman could say little of Christ, but what she did say she spoke feelingly; "he told me all that ever I did." Those are most likely to do good that can tell what God has done for their souls, Ps. lxxi. 16.

2nd. They were brought to court his stay among them; ver. 40, when they were come to him, "they besought him that he would tarry with them." Upon the woman's report they believed him to be a prophet, and came to him; and when they saw him, the meanness of his appearance and the manifest poverty of his outward condition did not lessen their esteem of him, and expectations from him, but still they respected him as a prophet. Note, There are hopes of those who are got over the vulgar prejudices that men have against true worth in a low estate. Blessed are they that are not offended in Christ at first sight. So far were they from being offended in him, that they begged he would tarry with them. First. That they might testify their respects to him, and treat him with the honour and kindness due to his character. God's prophets and ministers are welcome guests to all those who sincerely embrace the Gospel; as to Lydia, Acts xvi. 15. Secondly. That they might receive instruction from him. Those that are taught of God are truly desirous to learn more, and to be better acquainted with Christ. Many would have flocked to one that would tell them their fortune, but these flocked to one that would tell them their faults—tell them of sin and duty. The historian seems to put an emphasis upon their being Samaritans, as Lu. x. 33; xvii. 16. The Samaritans had not that reputation for religion that the Jews had; yet the Jews, who saw Christ's miracles, drove him from them; while the Samaritans, who saw not his miracles, nor shared in his favours, invited him to them. The proof of the Gospel's success is not always according to the probability; nor what is experienced, according to what is expected, either way. The Samaritans were taught by the custom of their country to be shy of conversation with the Jews; there were Samaritans that refused to let Christ go through their town, Lu. ix. 52; yet these begged him to tarry with them. Note, it adds much to the praise of our love to Christ and his Word, if it conquers the prejudices of education and custom, and sets light by the censures of men.

Now we are told that Christ granted their request; "he abode there." Though it was a city of the Samaritans, near adjoining to their temple, yet, when he was invited, he tarried there; though he was upon a journey, and had farther to go, yet, when he had an opportunity of doing good, "he abode there." That is no real hindrance which will further our account; yet he abode there but two days, because he had other places to visit, and other work to do; and those two days were as many as came to the share of this city, out of the few days of our Saviour's sojourning upon earth.

2. We are told what impressions were made upon them by Christ's own word, and his personal converse with them, ver. 41, 42; what he said and did there is not related; whether he healed theirsick or no; but it is intimated in the effect that he said and did that which convinced them he was the Christ; and the labours of a minister are best told by the good fruit of them. Their hearing of him had a good effect, but now their eyes see him, and the effect of that was,

1st. That their number grew; ver. 41, "Many more believed;" many that would not be persuaded to go out of the town to him, yet when he came among them were wrought upon to believe in him. Note, It is comfortable to see the number of believers; and sometimes the zeal and forwardness of some may be a means to provoke many, and to stir them up to a holy emulation, Rom. xi. 14.

2nd. That their faith grew. Those who had been wrought upon by the report of the woman now saw cause to say, "Now we believe, not for thy saying," ver. 42. Here are three things in which their faith grew:

First. In the matter of it, or that which they did believe. Upon the testimony of the woman they believed him to be a prophet, or some extraordinary messenger from heaven; but now they have conversed with him, they believe that he is the Christ—the anointed one—the very same that was promised to the fathers, and expected by them; and that, being the Christ, he is "the Saviour of the world," for that was the work to which he was anointed, to "save his people from their sins." They believed him to be the Saviour, not only of the Jews, but of the world, which they hoped would take them in, though Samaritans, for it was promised that he should be salvation to the ends of the earth, Isa. xlii. 6.

Secondly. In the certainty of it. Their faith now grew up to a full assurance; we "know that this is indeed the Christ;" ἀληθῶς; not a pretended Christ, but a real one; not a typical Saviour, as many under the Old Testament, but truly one. Such an assurance as this of Divine truths is what we should labour after; not only we think it probable, and are willing to suppose, that Jesus may be the Christ, but we know that he is indeed the Christ.

Thirdly. In the ground of it, which was a kind of spiritual sensation and experience. "Now we believe, not because of thy saying, for we have heard him ourselves." They had before believed for her saying; and it was well—it was a good step; but now they find farther and much firmer footing for their faith: Now we believe, because we have heard him ourselves, and have heard such excellent and divine truths, accompanied with such commanding power and evidence, that we are abundantly satisfied and assured that this is the Christ. This is like what the queen of Sheba said of Solomon, 1 Kin. x. 6, 7; "the one half was not told me." These Samaritans who believed for the woman's saying, now gained farther light; for to him that hath shall be given; he that is faithful in a little shall be trusted with more.

In this instance we may see how faith comes by hearing. 1st. Faith comes to the birth by hearing the report of men. These Samaritans, for the sake of the woman's saying, believed so far as to come and see—to come and make a trial; thus the instructions of parents and preachers, and the testimony of the church and our experienced neighbours, recommend the doctrine of Christ to our acquaintance, and incline us to entertain it as highly probable. But, 2nd. Faith comes to its growth, strength, and maturity, by hearing the testimony of Christ himself; and this goes farther, and recommends his doctrine to our acceptance, and obligeth us to believe it as undoubtedly certain. We were induced to look into the Scripture by the saying of those who told us that in them they had found eternal life; but when we ourselves found it in them too, have experienced the enlightening, convincing, regenerating, sanctifying, comforting power of the Word, now we believe, not for their saying, but because we have searched them ourselves; and our faith stands "not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God," 1 Cor. ii. 5; 1 Jno. v. 9, 10.

Thus was the seed of the Gospel sown in Samaria; what effect there was of this afterwards doth not appear; but we find that four or five years after, when Philip preached the gospel in Samaria, he found such blessed remains of this good work now wrought, that "the people with one accord gave heed to those things which Philip spoke," Acts viii. 5, 6, 8; but as some were pliable large share in the profits of the Galilean fisheries. The plain of Gennesaret, in which it was situated, was not only prolific of agricultural advantages, but also brought to the city a very dependable source of wealth from the manufactories—the mills, tanneries, and potteries which had been erected there. In addition, the highway between Damascus and the heart of Palestine ran through the district, and brought a very extensive general traffic to the city, which became the centre of commercial and manufacturing life in the provinces. C added in the lap of a prodigal nature, a focus of mercantile and trading interests, steeped in the bounteous and varied prosperity which fortune had showered upon her, Capernaum was exalted unto heaven."

iv. 54. "Second miracle:" i.e., in Cana (see chap. ii. 23), the first having been wrought when he made the water wine. The words here mean that Jesus performed this second miracle on his return into Galilee.

to good so were others to evil, whom Simon Magus bewitched with his sorceries, ver. 9, 10.

13 Now after two days he departed thence, and went into Galilee. 44 For Jesus himself testified, that a prophet hath no honour in his own country. 45 Then when he was come into Galilee, the Galileans received him, having seen all the things that he did at Jerusalem at the feast: for they also went unto the feast. 46 So Jesus came again into Cana of Galilee, where he made the water wine. And there was a certain nobleman, whose son was sick at Capernaum. 47 When he heard that Jesus was come out of Judæa into Galilee, he went unto him, and besought him that he would come down, and heal his son: for he was at the point of death. 48 Then said Jesus unto him, Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe. 49 The nobleman saith unto him, Sir, come down ere my child die. 50 Jesus saith unto him, Go thy way; thy son liveth. And the man believed the word that Jesus had spoken unto him, and he went his way. 51 And as he was now going down, his servants met him, and told him, saying, Thy son liveth. 52 Then enquired he of them the hour when he began to amend. And they said unto him, Yesterday at the seventh hour the fever left him. 53 So the father knew that it was at the same hour, in the which Jesus said unto him, Thy son liveth: and himself believed, and his whole house. 54 This is again the second miracle that Jesus did, when he was come out of Judæa into Galilee.

In these verses we have, First. Christ's coming into Galilee, ver. 43. Though he was as welcome among the Samaritans as he could be any where, and had better success, yet after two days he left them; not so much because they were Samaritans, and he would not confirm those in their prejudices against him who said, "he is a Samaritan," ch. viii. 48, but because he must preach to other cities, Lu. iv. 43. He went into Galilee, for there he spent much of his time. Now see here,

1. Whither Christ went; into Galilee, into the country of Galilee; but not to Nazareth, which was strictly his own country; he went among the villages, but declined going to Nazareth, the head city, for a reason here given, which Jesus himself testified, who knew the temper of his countrymen, the hearts of all men, and the experiences of all prophets; and it is this, that "a prophet hath no honour in his own country." Note, 1st. Prophets ought to have honour, because God has put honour upon them, and we do or may receive benefit by them. 2nd. The honour due to the Lord's prophets has very often been denied them, and contempt put upon them. 3rd. This due honour is most frequently denied them in their own country; see Lu. iv. 24; Mat. xiii. 57; not that it is universally true; no rule but hath some exceptions, but it holds for the most part. Joseph, when he began to be a prophet, was most hated by his brethren; David disdained by his brother, 1 Sam. xvii. 28; Jeremiah malign'd by the men of Anathoth, Jer. xi. 21; Paul by his countrymen, the Jews; and Christ's near kinsmen spoke most slightly of him, ch. vii. 5. Men's pride and envy makes them scorn to be instructed by those that, when time was, were their school-fellows and playfellows. Desire of novelty, and of that which is far fetched and dear bought, and seems to drop out of the sky to them, makes them despise those persons and things which they have been long used to and know the rise of. 4th. It is a great discouragement to a minister to go among a people that have no value for him or his labours. Christ would not go to Nazareth, because he knew how little respect he should have there. 5th. It is just with God to deny his Gospel to those that despise the ministers of it: they that mock the messengers forfeit the benefit of the message, Mat. xxi. 35, 41.

2. What entertainment he met with among the Galileans in the country; ver. 45, they received him, bade him welcome, and cheerfully attended on his doctrine. Christ and his Gospel are not sent in vain; if they have not honour with some, they shall have with others. Now the reason given why these Galileans were so ready to receive Christ is, because they had "seen the miracles he did at Jerusalem," ver. 45. Observe, 1st. They went up to Jerusalem at the feast, the feast of the passover. The Galileans lay very remote from Jerusalem, and their way thither lay through the country of the Samaritans, which was very troublesome for a Jew to pass through, worse than Bala's valley of old; yet, in obedience to God's command, they went up to the feast, and there they became acquainted with Christ. Note, They that are diligent and constant in attending on public ordinances, some time or other meet with more spiritual benefit than they expect. 2nd. At Jerusalem they saw Christ's miracles, which recommended him and his doctrine very much to their faith and affections. The miracles were wrought for the benefit of them at Jerusalem; yet the Galileans were accidentally there, got more advantage by them than they did for whom they were chiefly designed. Thus the Word preached to a mixed multitude may perhaps edify occasional hearers more than the constant auditory.

3. What city he went to; when he would go to a city, he chose to go to Cana of Galilee, "where he had made the water wine," ver. 46: thither he went to see if there were any good fruits of that miracle remaining; and if there were, to confirm their faith, and to water what he had planted. The evangelist mentions this miracle here, to teach us to keep in remembrance what we have seen of the works of Christ.

Secondly. His curing of the nobleman's son that was sick of a fever. This story is not recorded by any other of the evangelists; it comes in Mat. iv. 23. Observe,

1. Who the petitioner was, and who the patient. The petitioner was a nobleman, the patient was his son; "there was a certain nobleman;" regulus, so the Latin, 'a little king'; so called, either for the largeness of his estate, or the extent of his power, or the royalties that belonged to his manor. Some understand it as speaking his preferment; he was a courtier, in some office about the king; others, as speaking his party; he was an Herodian, a royalist, a prerogative man, one that espoused the interest of the Herods, father and son; perhaps it was Chuza, Herod's steward, Lu. viii. 3, or Manaen, Herod's foster brother, Acts xiii. 1. There were saints in Caesar's household. The father a nobleman, and yet the son sick; for dignities and titles of honour will be no security to persons and families from the assaults of sickness and death. It was fifteen miles from Capernaum, where this nobleman lived, to Cana, where Christ now was, yet this affliction in his family sent him so far to Christ.

2. How the petitioner made his application to the Physician. Having heard that "Jesus was now come out of Judæa into Galilee," and finding that he did not come towards Capernaum, but turned off towards the other side of the country, he went to him himself, and "besought him to come and heal his son," ver. 47. See here, 1st. His tender affection to his son, that when he was sick he would spare no pains to get help for him. 2nd. His great respect to our Lord Jesus; that he would come himself to wait upon him, when he might have sent a servant; and that he besought him, when, as a man in authority, some would think he might have ordered his attendance. The greatest men, when they come to God, must become beggars, and sue sub forma pauperis,— 'as paupers.'

As to the errand he came upon, we may observe a mixture in his faith. First. There was sincerity in it; he did believe that Christ could heal his son, though his disease was dangerous. It is likely he had physicians to him, who had given him over; but he believed that Christ could cure him when the case seemed deplorable. Secondly. Yet there was infirmity in his faith; he believed that Christ could heal his son, but, as it should seem, he thought he could not heal at a distance; and therefore he besought him that he would come down and heal him, expecting, as Naaman did, that he will come and strike his hand over the patient, as if he could not cure him but by a physical contact. Thus we are apt to limit the Holy One of Israel, and to stint him to our forms. The centurion, a Gentile, a soldier, was so strong in faith as to say, "Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof," Mat. viii. 8. This nobleman, a Jew, must have Christ to come down, though it was a good day's journey, and despaired of a cure unless he come down; as if he must teach Christ how to work. We are encouraged to pray, but we are not allowed to prescribe; Lord, heal me, but whether with a word, or a touch, "thy will be done."

3. The gentle rebuke he met with in this address, ver. 48: "Jesus said to him, I see how it is, 'Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe,' as the Samaritans did, though they saw no signs and wonders; and therefore I must work miracles among you. Though he was a nobleman, and now in grief about his son, and had shewed great respect to Christ in coming so far to him, yet Christ gives him a reproof. Men's dignity in the world shall not exempt them from the rebukes of the Word or Providence; for Christ reproves not after the hearing of his ears, but with equity, Isa. xl. 3. Observe, Christ first shews him his sin and weakness, to prepare him for mercy, and then grants him his request. Christ humbles those first with his frowns whom he intends to honour with his favours. The Comforter shall first convince. Herod longed to see some miracle, Lu. xxiii. 8, and this courtier was of the same mind, and the generality of the people too.

Now that which is blamed is, 1st. That whereas they had heard by credible and incontestable report of the miracles he had wrought in other places, they would not believe except they saw them with their own eyes, Lu. iv. 23; they must be honoured, and they must be humoured, or they will not be convinced. Their country must be graced, and their curiosity gratified, with signs and wonders, or else, though the doctrine of Christ be sufficiently proved by miracles wrought elsewhere, they will not believe; like Thomas, they will yield to no method of conviction but what they shall prescribe. 2nd. That whereas they had seen divers miracles, which they could not gain say the evidence of, but which sufficiently proved Christ a teacher come from God, and should now have applied themselves to him for instruction in his doctrine, which by its native excellency would have gently led them on in believing to a spiritual perfection; instead of this, they would go no farther in believing than they were driven by signs and wonders. The spiritual power of the Word did not affect them, did not attract them, but only the sensible power of miracles, which were for them who believe not, but prophesying for them that believe, 1 Cor. xiv. 22. Those that admire miracles only, and despise prophesying, rank themselves with unbelievers.

4. His continued importunity in his address; ver. 49, "Sir, come down, ere my child die." Kuipo, 'Lord,' so it should be rendered. In this reply of his we have,

1st. Something that was commendable; he took the reproof patiently, he spoke to Christ respectfully; though he was one of those that wore soft clothing, yet he could bear this reproof. It is none of the privileges of peerage to be above the reproofs of the word of Christ; but it is a sign of a good temper and disposition in men, especially in great men, when they can be told of their faults and not be angry. And as he did not take the reproof for an affront, so he did not take it for a denial, but still prosecuted his request, and continued to wrestle till he prevailed. Nay, he might argue thus, If Christ heal my soul, sure he will heal my son; if he cure my unbelief, he will cure his fever. This is the method Christ takes, first to work upon us, and then to work for us; and there is hopes, if we find him entering upon his method.

2nd. Here is something that was blameworthy; that was his infirmity; for, First. He seems to take no notice of the reproof Christ gave him, saith nothing to it, either by way of confession or excuse; for he is so wholly taken up with concern about his child that he can mind nothing else. Note, The sorrow of the world is a great prejudice to our profiting by the word of Christ; inordinate care and grief are thorns that choke the good seed; see Ex. vi. 9. Secondly. He still discovered the weakness of his faith in the power of Christ. 1st. He must have Christ to come down, thinking else he could do the child no kindness. It is hard to persuade ourselves that distance of time and place are no obstructions to the knowledge and power of our Lord Jesus; yet so it is, he sees afar off, for his eyes run to and fro; and he acts afar off, for his word, the word of his power, runs very swiftly. 2nd. He believes Christ could heal a sick child, but not that he could raise a dead child; and therefore, O "come down, ere my child die;" as if then it would be too late; whereas Christ has the same power over death that he has over bodily diseases. He forgot that

v. 1. "After this:" rather, "after these things." The expression implies that some interval had elapsed since the events mentioned in the close of the last chapter. "A feast:" various conjectures have been made as to what feast is here meant. Almost every Jewish feast has been suggested, but it seems impossible to determine with any degree of certainty what feast it was. Alford says, "No reason need be given why John does not name the feast; it is quite in accordance with his practice of mentioning nothing that does not concern his subject-matter. Thus the Passover is mentioned, chap. ii. 13, because of the buying and selling in the Temple; again, chap. vi. 4, to account for the great multitude, and as eminently suiting his discourse there; the Feast of Tabernacles, vii. 2, because of the practice alluded to by our Lord in verse 37; that of the Dedication, x. 22, to account for his being in Solomon's Porch, because it was winter; but in this chapter, where there is nothing alluding to the time or nature of the feast, it is not specified." "Jesus:" we need

Elijah and Elisha had raised dead children; and is Christ's power inferior to theirs? Observe what haste he is in; "Come down, ere my child die;" as if there were danger of Christ's slipping his time. "He that believeth doth not make haste," but refers himself to Christ; Lord, what, and when, and how thou pleasest.

5. The answer of peace which Christ gave to his request at last; ver. 50, "Go thy way, thy son liveth." Christ here gives us an instance,

1st. Of his power; that he not only could heal, but could heal with so much ease, without the trouble of a visit. Here is nothing said, nothing done, nothing ordered to be done, and yet the cure wrought; "thy son liveth." The healing beams of the Sun of righteousness dispense benign influences from one end of heaven to another, and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof. Though Christ is now in heaven, and his church on earth, he can send from above. This nobleman would have Christ come down, and heal his son; Christ will heal his son, and not go down; and thus the cure is the sooner wrought, and the nobleman's mistakes rectified, and his faith confirmed; so that the thing was better done in Christ's way. When he denies what we ask, he gives what is much more to our advantage; we ask for ease, he gives patience. Observe, His power was exerted by his word; in saying, thy son lives, he shewed that he has life in himself, and power to quicken whom he will. Christ's saying, thy soul lives, makes it alive.

2nd. Of his pity; he observed the nobleman to be in pain about his son, and his natural affection discovered itself in that word, ere my child, my dear child, die; and therefore Christ dropped the reproof, and gave him assurance of the recovery of his child; for he knows how a father pities his children.

6. The nobleman's belief of the word of Christ; he believed, and went away. Though Christ did not gratify him so far as to go down with him, he is satisfied with the method Christ took, and reckons he has gained his point. How quickly, how easily is that which is lacking in our faith perfected by the word and power of Christ. Now he sees no sign or wonder, and yet believes the wonder done.

1st. Christ said, "thy son liveth," and the man believed him; not only believed the omniscience of Christ, that he knew the child recovered, but the omnipotence of Christ, that the cure was effected by his word. He left him dying; yet, when Christ said, he lives, like the father of the faithful, "against hope he believed in hope, and staggered not through unbelief."

2nd. Christ said, "Go thy way," and, as an evidence of the sincerity of his faith, "he went his way," and gave neither Christ nor himself any farther disturbance. He did not press Christ to come down; did not say, if he do recover, yet a visit will be acceptable; no, he seems no farther solicitous; but, like Hannah, he goes his way, and his countenance is no more sad. As one entirely satisfied, he made no great haste home; did not hurry home that night, but returned leisurely, as one that was perfectly easy in his own mind.

7. The farther confirmation of his faith, by comparing notes with his servants at his return.

1st. His servants met him with the agreeable news of the child's recovery, ver. 51. Probably they met him not far from his own house; and knowing what their master's cares were, they were willing, as soon as they could, to make him easy. David's servants were loath to tell him when the child was dead. Christ said, "thy son liveth," and now the servants say the same. Good news will meet those that hope in God's word.

2nd. He inquired what hour the child began to recover, ver. 52; not as if he doubted the influence of Christ's word upon the child's recovery, but he was desirous to have his faith confirmed, and might be able to satisfy any to whom he should relate it; for it was a material circumstance. Note, (1.) It is good to furnish ourselves with all the corroborating proofs and evidences that may be, to strengthen our faith in the word of Christ, that it may grow up to a full assurance: "shew me a token for good." (2.) The diligent comparing of the works of Christ with his word will be of great use to us for the confirming of our faith. That was the course this nobleman took; "he enquired of the servants the hour when he began to amend," and they told him, "yesterday, at the seventh hour," (at one o'clock in the afternoon, or, as some think this evangelist reckons, at seven o'clock at night,) "the fever left him;" not only he began to amend, but he was perfectly well on a sudden; so "the father knew that it was at the same hour" when Jesus said to him, "thy son liveth." As the word of God, well studied, will help us to understand his providences, so the providence of God, well observed, will help us to understand his word; for God is every day fulfilling the Scripture.

Two things would help to confirm his faith. First. That the child's recovery was sudden, and not gradual. They name the precise time to an hour, "yesterday," not about, but "at the seventh hour, the fever left him;" not it abated, or began to decrease, but left him in an instant. The word of Christ did not work like physic, which must have time to operate, and produce the effect, and perhaps cures by expectation only; no, with Christ it was dictum, factum—he spake, and it was done; not, he spake, and it was set a doing. Secondly. That it was just at the same time that Christ spoke to him, "at that very hour." The synchronisms and coincidences of events add very much to the beauty and harmony of providence. Observe the time, and the thing itself will be more illustrious; for every thing is beautiful in its time; at the very time when it is promised, as Israel's deliverance, Ex. xii. 41; at the very time when it is prayed for, as Peter's deliverance, Acts xii. 12. In men's works, distance of place is the delay of time, and the retarding of business; but it is not so in the works of Christ. The pardon, and peace, and comfort, and spiritual healing, which he speaks in heaven, is, if he pleases, at the same time effected and wrought in the souls of believers; and when these two come to be compared in the great day, Christ will "be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe."

8. The happy effect and issue of this. The bringing of the cure to the family brought salvation to it.

1st. The nobleman himself believed. He had before believed the word of Christ with reference to this particular occasion, but now he believed in Christ as the Messiah promised, and became one of his disciples. Thus the particular experience of the power and efficacy of one word of Christ may be a happy means to introduce and settle the whole authority of Christ's dominion in the soul. Christ has many ways of gaining the heart, and by the grant of a temporal mercy may make way for better things.

2nd. His whole house believed likewise. First. Because of the interest they all had in the miracle, which preserved the blossom and hopes of the family; this affected them all, and endeared Christ to them, and recommended him to their best thoughts. Secondly. Because of the influence the master of the family had upon them all. A master of a family cannot give faith to those under his charge, nor force them to believe; but he may be instrumental to remove external prejudices which obstruct the operation of the evidence, and then the work is more than half done. Abraham was famous for this, Gen. xviii. 19, and Joshua, Jos. xxiv. 15. This was a nobleman, and probably had a great household; but when he comes into Christ's school he brings them all along with him. What a blessed change was here in this house, occasioned by the sickness of the child! This should reconcile us to afflictions, we know not what good may follow from them. Probably the conversion of this nobleman, and his family at Capernaum, might invite Christ to come afterward and settle at Capernaum as his head-quarters in Galilee. Then great men receive the Gospel, they may be instrumental to bring it to the places where they live.

Lastly. Here is the evangelist's remark upon this cure, ver. 54: "This is the second miracle," referring to ch. ii. 11, where the turning water into wine is said to be the first; that was soon after his first return out of Judaea, this soon after his second. In Judaea he had wrought many miracles, ch. iii. 2; iv. 45; they had the first offer; but being driven thence he wrought miracles in Galilee. Somewhere or other Christ will find a welcome. People may, if they please, shut the sun out of their own houses, but cannot shut it out of the world. This is not to be the second miracle, 1st. To remind us of the first, wrought in the same place some months before. Fresh mercies should revive the remembrance of former mercies, as former mercies should encourage our hopes of farther mercies. Christ keeps account of his favours, whether we do or no. 2nd. To let us know that this cure was before those many cures which the other evangelists mention to be wrought in Galilee, Mat. iv. 23; Mar. i. 34; Lu. iv. 40. Probably this cure, the patient being a person of quality, was the more talked of for that reason, and sent him crowds of patients; when this nobleman applied himself to Christ, multitudes followed. What abundance of good may great men do, if they be good men.

CHAPTER V.

We have in the Gospels a faithful record of all that Jesus began both to do and to teach, Acts i. 1. These two are interwoven, because what he taught explained what he did, and what he did confirmed what he taught. Accordingly, we have in this chapter a miracle and a sermon. 1. The miracle was the cure of an impotent man, that had been diseased thirty-eight years, with the circumstances of that cure, ver. 1-16. 2. The sermon was Christ's vindication of himself before the Sanhedrim, when he was prosecuted as a criminal for healing the man on the sabbath day; in which, 1. He asserts his authority as Messiah, and Mediator between God and man, ver. 17-29. 2. He proves it by the testimony of his Father, of John Baptist, of his miracles, and of the Scriptures of the Old Testament, and condemns the Jews for their unbelief, ver. 30-47.

AFTER this there was a feast of the Jews; and Jesus went up to Jerusalem. 2 Now there is at Jerusalem by the sheep market a pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda, having five porches. 3 In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water. 4 For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the water: whosoever then first

after the troubling of the water stepped in was made whole of whatsoever disease he had. 5 And a certain man was there, which had an infirmity thirty and eight years. 6 When Jesus saw him lie, and knew that he had been now a long time in that case, he saith unto him, Wilt thou be made whole? 7 The impotent man answered him, Sir, I have no not suppose that he went up by himself without his disciples. See chap. ii. 13, where no mention is made of the disciples, and yet in iii. 22 we read, "came Jesus and his disciples into the land of Judaea."

v. 2. "There is at Jerusalem;" from the use of the present tense, some have supposed that St. John wrote his gospel before the destruction of Jerusalem, and was thus stating what was then in existence at Jerusalem. But the form of a narrative is frequently thrown into the present tense, even when the things described happened some time before, so that no argument as to the date of the gospel can be drawn from what is here said. "Sheep market:" rather, "sheep gate." It was probably that mentioned in Neh. iii. 1, where we read, "Then Eliashib the high-priest rose up with his brethren the priests, and they builded the sheep gate." (See Neh. iii. 3, xii. 39, where mention is made of the "fish gate.") It is not improbable that these gates received their names from the sheep market and fish market which were before them. "A pool;" literally, a place for man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool: but while I am coming, another steppeth down before me. 8 Jesus saith unto him, Rise, take up thy bed, and walk. 9 And immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed, and walked: and on the same day was the sabbath. 10 The Jews therefore said unto him that was cured, It is the sabbath day: it is not lawful for thee to carry thy bed. 11 He answered them, He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed, and walk. 12 Then asked they him, What man is that which said unto thee, Take up thy bed, and walk? 13 And he that was healed wist not who it was: for Jesus had conveyed himself away, a multitude being in that place. 14 Afterward Jesus findeth him in the temple, and said unto him, Behold, thou art made whole: sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee. 15 The man departed, and told the Jews that it was Jesus, which had made him whole. 16 And therefore did the Jews persecute Jesus, and sought to slay him, because he had done these things on the sabbath day.

This miraculous cure is not recorded by any other of the evangelists, who confine themselves mostly to the miracles wrought in Galilee, but John relates those wrought at Jerusalem. Concerning this, observe,

First. The time when this cure was wrought: it was at "a feast of the Jews," that is, the passover, for that was the most celebrated feast. Christ, though residing in Galilee, yet "went up to Jerusalem" at the feast, ver. 1;

1. Because it was an ordinance of God, which as a subject he would observe, being made under the law; though, as a Son, he might have pleaded an exemption. Thus he would teach us to attend religious assemblies, Heb. x. 25.

2. Because it was an opportunity of good; for, 1st. There were great numbers gathered together there at that time; it was a general rendezvous, at least, of all serious, thinking people, from all parts of the country, beside strangers from other nations; and wisdom must cry in the places of concourse, Pr. i. 21. 2nd. It was to be hoped they were in a good frame, for they came together to worship God, and to spend their time in religious exercises. Now a mind inclined to devotion, and sequestering itself to the exercises of piety, lies very open to the farther discoveries of Divine light and love, and to it Christ will be acceptable.

Secondly. The place where this cure was wrought: at the pool of Bethesda, which had a miraculous healing virtue in it, and is here particularly described, ver. 2-4.

1. Where it was situated; "at Jerusalem by the sheep market;" ἐν τῇ προβάτῳ; it might as well be rendered, the sheep cot, where the sheep were kept; or the sheep gate, which we read of, Neh. iii. 1, through which the sheep were brought, as the sheep market, where they were sold. Some think it was near the temple; and if so, it yielded a melancholy but profitable spectacle to those that went up to the temple to pray.

2. How it was called; it was "a pool," (a pond, or bath,) "which is called in Hebrew, Bethesda," 'the house of mercy;' for therein appeared much of the mercy of God to the sick and diseased. In a world of so much misery as this is, it is well there are some Bethsadas, houses of mercy; remedies against these maladies; that the scene is not all melancholy: an alms-house, so Dr. Hammond. Dr. Lightfoot's conjecture is, that this was the upper pool, Isa. vii. 3; and the old pool, Isa. xxii. 11; that it had been used for washing from ceremonial pollutions, for convenience of which the porches were built to dress and undress in, but was lately become medicinal.

3. How it was fitted up; it had five porches, cloisters, or piazzas, or roofed walks, in which the sick lay. Thus the charity of men concurred with the mercy of God for the relief of the distressed. Nature has provided remedies, but men must provide hospitals.

4. How it was frequented with sick and cripples; ver. 3, "in these lay a great multitude of impotent folk." How many are the afflictions of the afflicted in this world! How full of complaints are all places, and what multitudes of impotent folk! It may do us good to visit the hospitals sometimes, that we may take occasion, from the calamities of others, to thank God for our comforts. The evangelist instances in three sorts of diseased people that lay here, "blind, halt, and withered," or sinew shrunk, either in one particular part, as the man with the withered hand, or all over paralytic. These are mentioned because, being least able to help themselves into the water, they lay longest waiting in the porches. Those that were sick of these bodily diseases, took the pains to come far, and had the patience to wait long, for a cure. Any of us would have done the same; and we ought to do so. But oh that men were as wise for their souls, and as solicitous to get their spiritual diseases healed! We are all by nature "impotent folk" in spiritual things; "blind, halt, and withered;" but effectual provision is made for our cure, if we will but observe orders.

5. What virtue it had for the cure of these impotent folk; ver. 4, "an angel went down and troubled the water; and whose first stepped in was made whole." That this strange virtue in the pool was natural, or artificial rather, and was the effect of the washing of the sacrifices, which impregnated the water with I know not what healing virtue, even for blind people, and that this angel was a messenger, a common person, sent down to stir the water, is altogether groundless; there was a room in the temple on purpose to wash the sacrifices in. Expositors generally agree that the virtue this pool had was supernatural. It is true, the Jewish writers, who do not use to be sparing in recounting the praises of Jerusalem, do none of them make the least mention of this healing pool; of which silence in this matter, perhaps this was the reason, that it was taken for a presage of the near approach of the Messiah; and therefore they, who denied him to be come, industriously concealed such an indication of his coming; so that this here is all the account we have of it. Observe,

1st. The preparation of the medicine by an angel, who went down into the pool, and stirred the water. Angels are God's servants, and friends to mankind; and perhaps are more active in the removing of diseases, as evil angels in the inflicting of them, than we are aware of. Raphael, the apocryphal name of an angel, signifies, medicina Dei,—'God's physic,' or physician, rather; see what mean offices the holy angels condescend to, for the good of men. If we would do the will of God as the angels do it, we must think nothing below us but sin. The troubling of the water, was the signal given of the descent of the angel; as the going upon the tops of the mulberry trees was to David, and then they must bestir themselves. The waters of the sanctuary are then healing, when they are put in motion. Ministers must stir up the gift that is in them: when they are cold and dull in their ministrations, the waters settle, and are not apt to heal. The angel descended to stir the water, not daily, perhaps not frequently, but at a certain season; some think at the three solemn feasts, to grace those solemnities; or, now and then, as Infinite Wisdom saw fit. God is a free agent in dispensing his favours.

2nd. The operation of the medicine; "whoever first stepped in was made whole." Here is, (1.) A miraculous extent of the virtue, as to the diseases cured; what disease soever it was, this water cured it. Natural and artificial baths are as hurtful in some cases as they are useful in others; but this was a remedy for every malady, even for those that came from contrary causes. The power of miracles succeeds, where the power of nature succumbs. (2.) A miraculous limitation of the virtue, as to the persons cured: he that first stepped in had the benefit; that is, he or they that stepped in, presently were cured; not those that lingered and came in after. This teaches us to observe and improve our opportunities, and to look about us, that we slip not a season which may never return. The angel stirred the waters, but left the diseased to themselves to get in. God has put virtue into the Scriptures and ordinances, for he would have healed us; but if we do not make a due improvement of them, it is our own fault, we would not be healed.

Now this is all the account we have of this standing miracle; it is uncertain when it began, and when it ceased. Some conjecture it began when Eliashib, the high priest, began the building of the wall about Jerusalem, and sanctified it with prayer; and that God testified his acceptance, by putting this virtue into the adjoining pool. Some think it began now lately, at Christ's birth; nay, others at his baptism. Dr. Lightfoot, finding in Josephus, Antiq. lib. xv. c. 7, mention of a great earthquake in the seventh year of Herod, thirty years before Christ's birth, supposeth, that since there used to be earthquakes at the descent of angels, that then the angel first descended to stir this water. Some think it ceased with this miracle; others, at Christ's death; however, it is certain it had a gracious signification.

First. It was a token of God's good will to that people, and an indication, that though they had been long without prophets and miracles, yet God had not cast them off; though they were now an oppressed, despised people, and many were ready to say, "Where are all the wonders that our fathers told us of?" God did hereby let them know that he had still a kindness for the city of their solemnities. We may from hence take occasion to acknowledge with thankfulness God's power and goodness in the mineral waters that contribute so much to the health of mankind; for God made the fountains of water, Rev. xiv. 7.

Secondly. It was a type of the Messiah, who is the fountain opened; and was intended to raise people's expectations of him who is the Sun of righteousness, that ariseth with healing under his wings. These waters had formerly been used for purifying, now for healing; to signify both the cleansing and curing virtue of the blood of Christ, that incomparable bath, which heals all our diseases. The waters of Siloam, which filled this pool, signified the kingdom of David, and of Christ the Son of David, Isa. viii. 6; fitly therefore have they now this sovereign virtue put into them. The laver of regeneration is to us as Bethesda's pool, healing our spiritual diseases; not at certain seasons, but at all times: whoever will, let him come.

1. His disease was grievous; he had an infirmity, a weakness; he had lost the use of his limbs, at least on one side, as is usual in palsies. It is sad to have the body so disabled, that instead of being the soul's instrument, it is become, even in the affairs of this life, its burthen. What reason have we to thank God for bodily strength, and to use it for him, and pity those who are his prisoners!

2. The duration of it was tedious, thirty-eight years; he was lame longer than most live. Many are so long disabled for the offices of life that, as the Psalmist complains, they seem to be made in vain; for suffering, not for service; born to be always dying. Shall we complain of one wearisome night, or one ill fit, who perhaps for many years have scarce known what it has been to be a day sick; when many others, better than we, have scarce known what it has been to be a day well. Mr. Baxter's note on this passage is very affecting: "How great a mercy was it to live thirty-eight years under God's wholesome discipline. . . O my God," saith he, "I thank thee for the like discipline of diving—a swimming-bath; the word being derived from a verb signifying to dive. "Called in the Hebrew tongue:" the Hebrew tongue here mentioned was the Syro-Chaldaic, which had been spoken ever since the return from Babylon (see Acts xxi. 40). "Bethesda:" house of mercy, or place of the flowing of water. Its situation is uncertain. The five porches were probably arches or porticoes, which surrounded the pool and opened upon it, and under the protection of which the sick could repose.

v. 3. "Impotent:" i.e., sick or weak. The word does not refer to a special kind of sickness, but is used to include all the sick lying by the pool. By the "halt" are meant the lame; and by "withered," such as had shrivelled or withered limbs. The man on whom the miracle was wrought was most probably of this last class.

v. 3, 4. The words from "waiting for the moving of the waters," down to the end of verse 4, are not found in the great majority of the ancient MSS.

Fourthly. The cure, and the circumstances of it briefly related, ver. 6-9.

1. "Jesus saw him lie." Observe, when Christ came up to Jerusalem, he visited not the palaces, but the hospitals; which is an instance of his humility and condescension, and tender compassion; and an indication of his great design in coming into the world, which was to seek and save the sick and wounded. There was a great multitude of poor cripples here at Bethesda, but Christ fastened his eye upon this one, and singled him out from the rest, because he was senior of the house, and in a more deplorable condition than any of the rest; and Christ delights to help the helpless; and hath mercy on whom he will have mercy. Perhaps his companions in tribulation insulted over him, because he had been often disappointed of a cure; therefore Christ took him for his patient: it is his honour to side with the weakest, and bear up those whom he sees run down.

2. He knew and considered how long he had lain in this condition. Those that have been long in affliction may comfort themselves with this, that God keeps account how long, and knows our frame.

3. He asked him, "Wilt thou be made whole?" a strange question to be asked one that had been so long so ill. Some indeed would not be made whole, because their sores serve them to beg by, and serve them for an excuse for idleness; but this poor man was as unable to go a begging as to work; yet Christ put it to him, 1st. To express his own pity and concern for him. Christ is tenderly inquisitive concerning the desires of those that are in affliction, and is willing to know what is their petition; what shall I do for you? 2nd. To try him, whether he would be beholden to him for a cure, whom the great people were so prejudiced against, and sought to prejudice others. 3rd. To teach him to value the mercy, and to excite in him desires after it. In spiritual cases, people are not willing to be cured of their sins, are loath to part with them. If this point therefore were but gained—if people were willing to be made whole, the work were half done, for Christ is willing to heal, if we be but willing to be healed, Mat. viii. 3.

4. The poor impotent man takes this occasion to renew his complaint, and to set forth the misery of his case, which makes his cure the more illustrious; ver. 7. "Sir, I have no man to put me into the pool." He seems to take Christ's question as an imputation of carelessness and neglect: If thou hadst had a mind to be healed, thou wouldst have looked better to thy hits, and have got into the healing waters long before now. No, Master, saith the poor man, it is not for want of a good will, but of a good friend, that I am unhealed; I have done what I could to help myself, but in vain, for no one else will help me. 1st. He doth not think of any other way of being cured, but by these waters, and desires no other friendship, but to be helped into them; therefore when Christ cured him, his imagination or expectation could not contribute to it, for he thought of no such thing. 2nd. He complains for want of friends to help him in: "I have no man," no friend, to do me that kindness. One would think some of those that had been themselves healed, should have lent him a hand; but it is common for the poor to be destitute of friends; "no man careth for their soul." To the sick and impotent, it is as true a piece of charity to work for them, as to relieve them; and thus the poor are capable of being charitable to one another, and ought to be so, though we seldom find that they are so; I speak it to their shame. 3rd. He bewails his infelicity, that very often when he was coming, another stepped in before him; but a step between him and a cure, and yet he continues impotent. None had the charity to say, Your case is worse than mine; do you go in now, and I will stay till the next time; for there is no getting over the old maxim, 'Every one for himself.' Having been so often balked, he begins to despair, and now is Christ's time to come in to his relief; he delights to help in desperate cases. Observe how mildly this man speaks of the unkindness of those about him, without any peevish reflections. As we should be thankful for the least kindness, so we should be patient under the greatest contempts; and let our resentments be never so just, yet our expressions should ever be calm. And observe farther, to his praise, that though he had waited so long in vain, yet still he continued lying by the pool side, hoping that some time or other help would come, Hab. ii. 3.

5. Our Lord Jesus hereupon cures him with a word speaking, though he neither asked it, nor thought of it. Here is,

1st. The word he said; ver. 8, "Rise, take up thy bed."

First. He is bidden to rise and walk; a strange command to be given to an impotent man, that had been long disabled; but this Divine word was to be the vehicle of a Divine power; it was a command to the disease, to be gone; to nature, to be strong; but it is expressed as a command to him to bestir himself. He must rise and walk, that is, attempt to do it; and in the essay he should receive strength to do it. The conversion of a sinner is the cure of a chronic disease: this is ordinarily done by the word, a word of command, Arise and walk; Turn and live; Make ye a new heart; which no more supposes a power in us to do it, without the grace of God, distinguishing grace, than this supposed such a power in the impotent man. But if he had not attempted to help himself, he had not been cured, and he must have borne the blame; yet it doth not therefore follow that, when he did rise and walk, it was by his own strength; no, it was by the power of Christ, and he must have all the glory. Observe, Christ did not bid him rise and go into the waters, but rise and walk. Christ did that for us which the law could not do, and set that aside.

Secondly. He is bidden to take up his bed. 1st. To make it to appear that it was a perfect cure, and purely miraculous, for he did not recover strength by degrees; from the extremity of weakness and impotency, he suddenly stepped into the highest degree of bodily strength; so that he was able to carry as great a load as any porter, that had been as long used to it as he had been disused: he who this minute was not able to turn him in his bed, the next minute was able to carry his bed. The man sick of the palsy, Mat. ix. 6, was bidden to go to his house; but probably this man had no house to go to, the hospital was his home; therefore he is bidden to arise and walk. 2nd. It was to proclaim the cure, and make it public; for, being the sabbath day, whoever carried a burthen through the streets made himself very remarkable, and every one would inquire what was the meaning of it; thereby the notice of the miracle would spread, to the honour of God. 3rd. Christ would thus witness against the tradition of the elders, which had stretched the law of the sabbath beyond its intention; and would likewise shew that he was Lord of the sabbath, and had power to make what alterations he pleased about it, and to overrule the law. Joshua and the host of Israel marched about Jericho on the sabbath day, when God commanded them; so did this man carry his bed in obedience to a command. The case may be such, that it may become a work of necessity or mercy to carry a bed on the sabbath day; but here it was more, it was a work of piety, being designed purely for the glory of God. 4th. He would hereby try the faith and obedience of his patient. By carrying his bed publicly, he exposed himself to the censure of the ecclesiastical court, and was liable, at least, to be scourged in the synagogue. Now, will he run the venture of that in obedience to Christ? Yes, he will. Those that have been healed by Christ's word should be ruled by his word, whatever it cost them.

2nd. The efficacy of this word, ver. 9: a Divine power went along with it; "and immediately he was made whole, and took up his bed, and walked."

First. He felt the power of Christ's word healing him, "immediately he was made whole." What a joyful surprise was this to the poor cripple, to find himself all of a sudden, so easy, so strong, so able to help himself; what a new world was he in, in an instant. Nothing is too hard for Christ to do. Secondly. He obeyed the power of Christ's word commanding him; he "took up his bed and walked," and did not care who blamed him, or threatened him for it. The proof of our spiritual cure is, our rising and walking. Hath Christ healed our spiritual diseases? let us go whithersoever he sends us, and take up whatever he is pleased to lay upon us, and walk before him.

Fifthly. What came of the poor man after he was cured. We are here told, 1. What passed between him and the Jews, who saw him carry his bed on the sabbath day; for on that day this cure was wrought, and it was the sabbath that fell within the passover week, and therefore a high day, ch. xix. 31. Christ's work was such as that he needed not make any difference between sabbath days and other days, for he was always about his Father's business; but he wrought many remarkable cures on that day, perhaps to encourage his church to expect those spiritual favours from him, in their observance of the Christian sabbath, which were typified by his miraculous cures. Now here,

1st. The Jews quarrel with the man for carrying his bed on the sabbath day, telling him it was not lawful, ver. 10. It doth not appear whether they were magistrates, who had power to punish him, or common people, who could only inform against him; but thus far was commendable, that while they knew not by what authority he did it, they were jealous for the honour of the sabbath, and could not unconcernedly see it profaned; like Nehemiah, Neh. xiii. 17.

2nd. The man justifies himself in what he did, by a warrant that would bear him out, ver. 11: I do not do it in contempt of the law and the sabbath, but in obedience to one who, by making me whole, hath given an undeniable proof that he is greater than either. He that could work such a miracle, as to make me whole, no doubt might give me such a command, as to carry my bed; he that could overrule the powers of nature, no doubt might overrule a positive law, especially in an instance not of the essence of the law; he that was so kind as to make me whole, would not be so unkind as to bid me do what is sinful. Christ by curing another paralytic, proved his power to forgive sin, here to give law; if his pardons are valid, his edicts are so; and his miracles prove both.

3rd. The Jews inquire farther, who it was that gave him this warrant; ver. 12. "What man is that?" Observe, How industriously they overlooked that which might be a ground of their faith in Christ. They inquire not, no, not for curiosity, who is that that made thee whole? while they industriously caught at that which might be a ground of reflection upon Christ; "What man is that which said unto thee, Take up thy bed?" They would fain subpoena the patient to be a witness against his physician, and to be his betrayer. In their question observe, First. They resolve to look upon Christ as a mere man; "What man is that?" For though he gave never such convincing proofs of it, they were resolved they would never own him to be the Son of God. Secondly. They resolve to look upon him as an ill man, and take it for granted that he who bade this man carry his bed, whatever Divine commission he might produce, was certainly a delinquent, and as such they resolve to prosecute him; "What man is that," who durst give such orders?

4th. The poor man was unable to give them any account of him; ver. 13, "he wist not who he was." First. Christ was unknown to him when he healed him. Probably he had heard of the name of Jesus, but had never seen him, and therefore could not tell that this was he. Note, Christ doth many a good turn for those that know him not, Isa. xlv. 4, 5; he enlightens, strengthens, quickens, comforts us, and we wist not who it is, nor are aware how much we receive daily by his mediation. This man being unacquainted with Christ, could not actually believe in him for a cure; but Christ knew the dispositions of his soul, and suited his favours to them, as to the blind man in a like case, ch. ix. 36. Our covenant and communion with God takes rise, not so much from our knowledge of him, as from his knowledge of us. We know God, or rather are known of him, Gal. iv. 9. Secondly. For the present he kept himself unknown; for as soon as he had wrought the cure he conveyed himself away, he made himself unknown, so some read it, "a multitude being in that place." This is mentioned to shew, either, 1st. How Christ conveyed himself away, by retiring into the crowd, so as not to be distinguished from a common person; he that was the chief of ten thousand often made himself one of the throng; it is sometimes the lot of those who have by their services signalized themselves, to be levelled with the multitude, and overlooked; or, 2nd. Why he conveyed himself away; because there was a multitude there; and he industriously avoided both the applause of those who would admire the miracle, and cry that up, and the censure of those who would censure him as a sabbath-breaker, and run him down. Those that are active for God in their generation must expect to pass by evil report and good report; and it is wisdom, as much as may be, to keep out of the hearing of both, lest by the one we be exalted, and by the other depressed above measure. Christ left the miracle to commend itself, and the man on whom it was wrought to justify it.

2. What passed between him and our Lord Jesus, at their next interview ver. 14. Observe here,

1st. Where Christ found him, in the temple, the place of worship, public worship. In our attendance on public worship we may expect to meet with Christ, and improve our acquaintance with him. Observe, First. Christ went to the temple; though he had many enemies, yet he appeared in public, because there he bore his testimony to Divine institutions, and had opportunity of doing good. Secondly. The man that was cured went to the temple; there Christ found him the same day, as it should seem, that he was healed; thither he straightway went, 1st. Because he had by his infirmity been so long detained thence; perhaps he had not been there for thirty-eight years; and therefore, as soon as ever the embargo is taken off, his first visit shall be to the temple, as Hezekiah intimates his shall be; Isa. xxxviii. 22, "What is the sign that I shall go up to the house of the Lord?" 2nd. Because he had, by his recovery, a good errand thither; he went up to the temple to return thanks to God for his recovery. When God has at any time restored us our health, we ought to attend him with solemn praises, Ps. cxvi. 18, 19; and the sooner the better, while the sense of the mercy is fresh. 3rd. Because he had, by carrying his bed, seemed to put a contempt upon the sabbath. He would thus shew that he had an honour for it, and made conscience of sabbath sanctification, in that on which the chief stress of it is laid, which is the public worship of God. Works of necessity and mercy are allowed; but when they are over, we must go to the temple.

2nd. What he said to him. When Christ has cured us, he has not done with us. He now applies himself to the healing of his soul, and this by the word too. First. He gives him a memorandum of his cure: "Behold, thou art made whole." He found himself made whole; yet Christ calls his attention to it: Behold, consider it seriously, how sudden, how strange, how cheap, how easy the cure was; admire it, behold and wonder; remember it, let the impressions of it abide and never be lost, Isa. xxxviii. 9. Secondly. He gives him a caution against sin: In consideration hereof, being made whole, "sin no more." This implies that his disease was the punishment of sin; whether

v. 8. "Bed:" a rough mat, or padded quilt.

v. 10. "The Jews:" not the multitude, but those in authority.

v. 13. "Conveyed himself away:" the word means literally to "swim out and away," and expresses the rapidity and quietness with which Jesus had moved away from the spot. Alford says, "Passed on unobserved; just spoke the healing words, and then went on among the crowd, so that no particular attention was attracted to himself, either by the sick man or others."

v. 17. These words of Christ are designed to answer the cavils of those who charged him with breaking the Sabbath day. Trench well observes, "He is no more a breaker of the Sabbath than God is, when he upholds with an energy that knows no pause the work of his creation from hour to hour, and from moment to moment. 'My Father worketh hitherto, and I work:' my work is but the reflex of his work. Abstinence from an outward work belongs not to the idea of a Sabbath; it is only more or less the necessary condition of

of some remarkable, flagrant sin, or only of sin in general, we cannot tell; but we know that sin is the procuring cause of sickness, Ps. cvii. 17, 18. Some observe that Christ did not make mention of sin to any of his patients, but only to this impotent man, and to one other, who was in like manner diseased, Mar. ii. 5. While those chronic diseases lasted they prevented the outward acts of many sins; and therefore, now the disability was removed, they had the more need to be watchful. Christ intimates to him, that those who are made whole—that are eased of the present sensible punishment of sin—are in danger of returning to sin, when the terror and restraint of that is over, unless Divine grace dry up the fountain. When the trouble, which only dammed up the current, is over, the waters will return to their old course, and therefore there is need of great watchfulness, lest after healing mercy we return again to folly. The misery we were made whole from, warns us to sin no more, having felt the smart of sin; the mercy we were made whole by, is an engagement upon us not to offend him who healed us. This is the voice of every providence, "Go, sin no more." This man began his new life very hopefully, in the temple; yet Christ saw it necessary to give him this caution; for it is common for people when they are sick to promise much, when newly recovered to perform something, but after a while to forget all. Thirdly. He gives him warning of his danger, in case he should return to his former sinful course, "lest a worse thing come to thee." Christ, who knows all men's hearts, knew that he was one of those that must be frightened from sin. Thirty-eight years' lameness, one would think, was a thing ill enough; yet there is something worse that will come to him, if he relapse into sin after God has given him such a deliverance as this, Ezr. ix. 13, 14. The hospital where he lay was a melancholy place, but hell much more so. The doom of apostates is a worse thing than thirty-eight years' lameness.

Now after this interview between Christ and his patient, observe, in the two following verses, 1st. The notice which the poor simple man gave to the Jews concerning Christ; ver. 15, he told them it was Jesus that had made him whole. We have reason to think he intended this for the honour of Christ, and the benefit of the Jews, little thinking that he that had so much power and goodness could have any enemies; but those that wish well to Christ's kingdom must have the wisdom of the serpent, lest they do more hurt than good with their zeal, and not cast pearls before swine.

2nd. The rage and enmity of the Jews against him; "therefore did the" rulers of the "Jews persecute Jesus." See, First. How absurd and unreasonable their enmity to Christ was. Therefore, because he had made a poor sick man well, and so eased the public charge, upon which it is likely he had subsisted, therefore they persecuted him, because he did good in Israel. Secondly. How bloody and cruel it was. They "sought to slay him;" nothing less than his blood, his life, would satisfy them. Thirdly. How it was varnished over with a colour of zeal for the honour of the sabbath; for this was the pretended crime, "because he had done these things on the sabbath day;" as if that circumstance were enough to vitiate the best and most Divine actions, and to render him obnoxious, whose deeds were otherwise most meritorious. Thus hypocrites often cover their real enmity against the power of godliness with a pretended zeal for the form of it.

17 But Jesus answered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work. 18 Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the sabbath, but said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God. 19 Then answered Jesus and said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do: for what things soever he doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise. 20 For the Father loveth the Son, and sheweth him all things that himself doeth: and he will shew him greater works than these, that ye may marvel. 21 For as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them; even so the Son quickeneth whom he will. 22 For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son: 23 That all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father. He that honoureth not the Son honoureth not the Father which hath sent him. 24 Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life. 25 Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear shall live. 26 For as the Father hath life in himself; so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself; 27 And hath given him authority to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of man. 28 Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice. 29 And shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation. 30 I can of mine own self do nothing: as I hear, I judge: and my judgment is just; because I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father which hath sent me.

We have here Christ's discourse upon occasion of his being accused as a sabbath-breaker; and it seems to be his vindication of himself before the Sanhedrim, when he was arraigned before them; whether on the same day, or two or three days after, doth not appear; probably the same day. Observe,

First. The doctrine laid down, by which he justified what he did on the sabbath day; ver. 17, he "answered them." This supposeth that he had something laid to his charge; or what they suggested one to another, when they sought to slay him, ver. 16, he knew, and gave this reply to: "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." At other times, in answer to the like charge, he had pleaded the example of David eating the shewbread, of the priests slaying the sacrifices, and of the people's watering their cattle on the sabbath day; but here he goes higher, and allegeth the example of his Father, and his Divine authority; waiving all other pleas, he insists upon that which was instar omnium,—"equivalent to the whole," and abides by it, which he had mentioned, Mat. xii. 8, "the Son of man is Lord even of the sabbath day;" but here enlarges on it.

1. He pleads that he was the Son of God, plainly intimated in his calling God his Father; and if so, his holiness was unquestionable, and his sovereignty incontestable; and he might make what alterations he pleased of the Divine law. Surely they will reverence the Son, the heir of all things.

2. That he was a worker together with God.

1st. "My Father worketh hitherto." The example of God's resting on the seventh day from all his work is in the fourth commandment made the ground of our observing it as a sabbath, or day of rest. Now God rested only from such work as he had done the six days before; otherwise he worketh hitherto; he is every day working, sabbath days and week days; upholding and governing all the creatures, and concurring, by his common providence, to all the motions and operations of nature, to his own glory: therefore when we are appointed to rest on the sabbath day, yet we are not restrained from doing that which has a direct tendency to the glory of God, as the man's carrying his bed had.

2nd. "I work;" not only therefore I may work, like him, in doing good on sabbath days, as well as other days, but I also work with him. As God created all things by Christ, so he supports and governs all by him, Heb. i. 3. This sets what he doth above all exception; he that is so great a worker, must needs be an uncontrollable governor; he that doth all, is Lord of all, and therefore Lord of the sabbath; which particular branch of his authority he would now assert, because he was shortly to shew it farther in the change of the day from the seventh to the first.

Secondly. The offence that was taken at his doctrine; ver. 18, "the Jews sought the more to kill him." His defence was made his offence, as if by justifying himself he had made ill worse. Note, Those that will not be enlightened by the word of Christ, will be enraged and exasperated by it; and nothing more vexeth the enemies of Christ than his asserting his authority: Ps. ii. 3-5. They "sought to kill him."

1. "Because he had broken the sabbath;" for let him say what he would in his own justification, they are resolved, right or wrong, to find him guilty of sabbath-breaking. When malice and envy sit upon the bench, reason and justice may even be silent at the bar, for whatever they can say will undoubtedly be overruled.

2. Not only so, "but he had said also, that God was his Father." Now they pretend a jealousy for God's honour, as before for the sabbath day, and charge Christ with it as a heinous crime that he made himself equal with God; and a heinous crime it had been if he had not really been so; it was the sin of Lucifer: "I will be like the Most High." Now,

1st. This was justly inferred from what he said, that he was the Son of God, and that God was his Father, πατήρ ἰσθός,—"his own Father,"—his, so as he was no one's else. He had said that he worked with his Father, by the same authority and power, and hereby he made himself equal with God: Ecce intelligunt Judæi, quod non intelligunt Ariani,—"Behold, the Jews understand what the Arians do not!"

2nd. Yet it was unjustly imputed to him as an offence, that he equalled himself with God; for he was, and is, God, equal with the Father, Phil. ii. 6; and therefore Christ, in answer to this charge, doth not except against the imputation as strained or forced, but makes out his claim, and proves that he is equal with God in power and glory.

Thirdly. Christ's discourse upon this occasion, which continues without interruption to the end of the chapter. In these verses he explains, and afterwards confirms, his commission as Mediator, and plenipotentiary in the treaty between God and man. And as the honours he is hereby entitled to, are such as it is not fit for any creature to receive, so the work he is hereby intrusted with, is such as it is not possible for any creature to go through with, and therefore he is God equal with the Father.

1. In general; he is one with the Father in all he doth as Mediator; and there was a perfect good understanding between them in the whole matter. It is ushered in with a solemn preface, ver. 19, "Verily, verily, I say unto you: 'I, the Amen, the Amen, say it.' This speaks what is said to be, 1. Very awful and great, and such as commands the most serious attention. 2. Very sure, and such as commands an unfeigned assent. 3. It intimates, that they are matters purely of Divine revelation; things which Christ has told us, and which we could not otherwise have come to the knowledge of. Two things he saith in general concerning the Son's oneness with the Father in working:

1st. That the Son conforms to the Father; ver. 19, "The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he sees the Father do," for "these things doeth the Son." The Lord Jesus, as Mediator, is, First. Obedient to his Father's will; so entirely obedient, that he can do nothing of himself, in the same sense as it is said, God cannot lie, cannot deny himself, which speaks the perfection of his truth, not any imperfection in his strength; so here, Christ was so entirely devoted to his Father's will that it was impossible for him, in any thing, to act separately. Secondly. He is observant of his Father's counsel; he can, he will do nothing "but what he sees the Father do." No man can find out the work of God, but the only begotten Son, who lay in his bosom, sees what he doth, and is intimately acquainted with his purposes, and has the plan of them ever before him. What he did as Mediator throughout his whole undertaking it, for beings so framed and constituted as ever to be in danger of losing the true collection and rest of the spirit in the multiplicity of earthly toil and business. Man indeed must cease from his work, if a higher work is to find place in him. He scatters himself in his work, and therefore must collect himself anew, and have seasons for so doing. But with him who is one with the Father it is otherwise. In him the deepest rest is not excluded by the highest activity; nay, rather, in God, in the Son as in the Father, they are one and the same."

v. 20. "That ye may marvel:" rather, "so that ye shall marvel."
v. 21. "Whom he will:" in these words our Lord opposes the thought of the Jews who believed that, as descendants of Abraham, they had of necessity a right to eternal life. To this right is opposed the will of God (see Lücke in Olshausen). On the extent of this will see 1 Tim. ii. 4, where the same Greek word for "will" is used. Alford points out, in the verse connected with the preceding, the distinction between the working of the eternal Son as he is in was the exact transcript or counterpart of what the Father did; that is, what he designed when he formed the plan of our redemption in his eternal counsels, and settled those measures in every thing, which never could be broken, nor ever needed to be altered; it was the copy of that great original; it was Christ's faithfulness, as it was Moses', that he did all according to the pattern shewed him in the mount. This is expressed in the present tense, "what he seeth the Father do," for the same reason that when he was here upon earth, it was said he "is in heaven," ch. iii. 13, and "is in the bosom of the Father," ch. i. 18, as he was even then by his Divine nature present in heaven, so the things done in heaven were present to his knowledge. What the Father did in his counsels the Son had ever in his view, and still he had his eye upon it, as David in spirit spake of him, "I have set the Lord always before me," Ps. xvi. 8. Thirdly. Yet he is equal with the Father in working, "for what things soever the Father doth these also doth the Son likewise;" he did the same things, not such things, but ταυτα—"the same things;" and he did them in the "same manner,"—ὁμοίως, likewise, with the same authority, and liberty, and wisdom, the same energy and efficacy. Doth the Father enact, repeal, and alter positive laws? doth he overrule the course of nature, know men's hearts? So doth the Son. The power of the Mediator is a Divine power.

2nd. That the Father communicates to the Son, ver. 20. Observe, First. The Inducement to it: "the Father loveth the Son;" he declared, "This is my beloved Son." He had not only a good will to the undertaking, but an infinite complacency in the undertaker. Christ was now hated of men, one whom the nation abhorred, Isa. xlix. 7; but he comforted himself with this, that his Father loved him. Secondly. The instances of it. He sheweth it, 1st. In what he doth communicate to him: "he sheweth him all things that himself doeth;" the Father's measures, in making and ruling the world, are shewed to the Son, that he may take the same measures in framing and governing the church, which work was to be a duplicate of the work of creation and providence, and is therefore called the world to come. He sheweth him all things, αὐτὰ πάντα—"which he doth," that is, which the Son doth, so it might be construed; all that the Son doth is by direction from the Father; he shews him, 2nd. In what he will communicate: "he will shew him," that is, will appoint and direct him to do "greater works than these." First. Works of greater power than the curing of the impotent man, for he should raise the dead, and should himself rise from the dead. By the power of nature, with the use of means, a disease may possibly in time be cured, but nature can never, by the use of any means, in any time, raise the dead. Secondly. Works of greater authority than warranting the man to carry his bed on the sabbath day. They thought that a daring attempt; but what was that to his abrogating the whole ceremonial law, and instituting new ordinances, which he would shortly do, "that ye may marvel!" Now they looked upon his works with contempt and indignation, but he will shortly do that which they will look upon with amazement, Lu. vii. 16. Many are brought to marvel at Christ's works, whereby he has the honour of them, that are not brought to believe, by which they would have the benefit of them.

11. In particular; he proves his equality with the Father, by instancing in some of those works which he doth, that are the peculiar works of God. This is enlarged upon, ver. 21-30. 1. He doth, and shall do, that which is the peculiar work of God's almighty power—raising the dead, and giving life, ver. 21, 25, 26, 28. 2. He doth, and shall do, that which is the peculiar work of God's sovereign dominion and jurisdiction—judging, and executing judgment, ver. 22-24, 27. These two are interwoven, as being nearly connected; and what is said once is repeated and inculcated; put both together, and they will prove that Christ said not amiss when he made himself equal with God.

First. Observe what is here said concerning the Mediator's power to raise the dead, and give life. See,

1. His authority to do it; ver. 21, "as the Father raiseth up the dead, so the Son quickeneth whom he will."

1st. It is God's prerogative to raise the dead, and give life, even his who first breathed into man the breath of life, and so made him a living soul: see Deu. xxxii. 30; 1 Sam. ii. 6; Ps. lxxvii. 20; Rom. iv. 17. This God had done by the prophets Elijah and Elisha, and it was a confirmation of their mission. A resurrection from the dead never lay in the common road of nature, nor ever fell within the thought of those that studied only the compass of nature's power, one of whose received axioms was point blank against it: A privatione ad habitum non datur regressus—"Existence, when once extinguished, cannot be rekindled." It was therefore ridiculed at Athens as an absurd thing, Acts xvii. 22. It is purely the work of a Divine power, and the knowledge of it purely by Divine revelation. This the Jews would own.

2nd. The Mediator is invested with this prerogative; he "quickeneth whom he will;" raiseth whom he pleaseth to life, and when he pleases. He doth not enliven things by natural necessity, as the sun doth, whose beams revive of course; but he acts as a free agent, has the dispensing of his power in his own hand, and is never either constrained or restrained in the use of it. As he has the power, so he has the wisdom and sovereignty of a God; "has the keys of the grave, and of death," Rev. i. 18; not as a servant, to open and shut as he is bidden; for he has it as the key of David, which he is master of, Act. iii. 7. An absolute prince is described by this, Dan. v. 19; whom he would he slew, or kept alive. It is true of Christ without an hyperbole.

3. His ability to do it. Therefore he has power to quicken whom he will, as the Father doth, because "he hath life in himself, as the Father has," ver. 26.

1st. It is certain "the Father has life in himself;" not only he is a self-existent being, who doth not derive from, or depend upon, any other, Ex. iii. 14; but he is a sovereign giver of life; he has the disposal of life in himself, and of all good, for so life sometimes signifies: it is all derived from him, and dependent on him; he is to his creatures the fountain of life, and all good; author of their being and wellbeing; the living God, and the God of all living.

2nd. It is as certain that he hath "given to the Son to have life in himself." As the Father is the original of all natural life and good, being the great Creator, so the Son, as Redeemer, is the original of all spiritual life and good; is that to the church that the Father is to the world: see 1 Cor. vii. 6; Col. i. 19. The kingdom of grace, and all the life in that kingdom, is as fully and absolutely in the hand of the Redeemer, as the kingdom of providence is in the hand of the Creator; and as God, who gives being to all things, has his being of himself, so Christ, who gives life, raised himself to life by his own power, Jno. x. 18.

3. His acting according to this authority and ability. Having life in himself, and being authorized to quicken whom he will, by virtue hereof there are accordingly two resurrections performed by his powerful word; both which are here spoken of:

1st. A resurrection that now is, ver. 29; a resurrection from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, by the power of Christ's grace; "the hour is coming, and now is." It is a resurrection begun already, and farther to be carried on; "when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God." This is plainly distinguished from that, ver. 28, which speaks of the resurrection at the end of time. This saith nothing, as that doth, of the dead in their graves, and of all them, and their coming forth. Now, First. Some think this was fulfilled in those whom he miraculously raised to life, Jairus' daughter, the widow's son, and Lazarus; and it is observable, that all that Christ raised were spoken to, as, "Damsel, arise;" "Young man, arise;" "Lazarus, come forth;" whereas those raised under the Old Testament, were raised, not by a word, but other applications, 1 Kin. xvii. 21; 2 Kin. iv. 34; xii. 21. Some understand it of those saints that rose with Christ; but we do not read of "the voice of the Son of God" calling them. But, Secondly. I rather understand it of the power of the doctrine of Christ for the recovering and quickening of those that were dead in trespasses and sins, Eph. i. 5, 6. The hour was coming when dead souls should be made alive by the preaching of the Gospel, and a spirit of life from God accompanying it; nay, it then was while Christ was upon earth. I may refer especially to the calling of the Gentiles, which is said to be as life from the dead, and some think was prefigured by Ezekiel's vision, Eze. xxxvii. 1, and foretold, Isa. xxvi. 19, "thy dead men shall live." But it is to be applied to all the wonderful success of the Gospel, both among Jews and Gentiles; an hour which still is, and is still coming, till all the elect be effectually called. Note, 1st. Sinners are spiritually dead, destitute of spiritual life, sense, strength, and motion; dead to God, miserable; but neither sensible of their misery, nor able to help themselves out of it. 2nd. The conversion of a soul to God is its resurrection from death to life; then it begins to live, when it begins to live to God, to breathe after him, and move towards him. 3rd. It is by "the voice of the Son of God" that souls are raised to spiritual life; it is wrought by his power, and that power conveyed and communicated by his word; "the dead shall hear," shall be made to hear, to understand, receive, and believe "the voice of the Son of God;" to hear it as his voice; then the Spirit by it gives life, otherwise the letter kills. 4th. The voice of Christ must be heard by us, that we may live by it; "they that hear," and attend to what they hear, "shall live." "Hear, and your soul shall live," Isa. lv. 3.

2nd. A resurrection yet to come. This is spoken of, ver. 28, 29; introduced with, "Marvel not at this," which I have said of the first resurrection; do not reject it as incredible and absurd, for at the end of time you shall all see a more sensible and amazing proof of the power and authority of the Son of man. As his own resurrection was reserved to be the final and concluding proof of his personal commission, so the resurrection of all men is reserved to be a like proof of his commission to be executed by his Spirit. Now observe here,

First. When this resurrection shall be; "the hour is coming;" it is fixed to an hour, so very punctual is this great appointment. The judgment is not adjourned sine die—"to some time not yet pitched upon;" no, "he hath appointed a day," "the hour is coming." 1st. It is not yet come; it is not the hour spoken of at ver. 5, that is coming, and now is. Those erred dangerously who said the resurrection was passed already, 2 Tim. ii. 18. But, 2nd. It will certainly come; it is coming on, nearer every day than another; it is at the door. How far off it is we know not, but we know that it is infallibly designed, and unalterably determined.

Secondly. Who shall be raised? "All that are in the graves," all that have died from the beginning of time, and all that shall die to the end of time. It was said, Dan. xii. 2, many shall arise; Christ here tells us those many shall be all. All must appear before the Judge, and therefore all must be raised; every person, and the whole of every person; every soul shall return to its body, and every bone to its bone. The grave is the prison of dead bodies, where they are detained; their furnace, where they are consumed, Job xiv. 19; yet, in prospect of their resurrection, we may call it their bed, where they sleep, to be awaked again; their treasury, where they are laid up, to be used again. Those that are not put into graves yet shall arise; but because most are put into graves, Christ useth this expression, "all that are in the graves." The Jews used the word sheol for the grave, which signifies the state of the dead; all that are in that state shall hear.

Thirdly. How they shall be raised. Two things are here told us:

1st. The efficient of this resurrection; "they shall hear his voice;" that is, he shall cause them to hear it, as Lazarus was made to hear that word, "Come forth;" a Divine power shall go along with the voice, to put life into them, and enable them to obey it. When Christ rose there was no voice heard, not a word spoken, because he rose by his own power; but at the resurrection of the children of men we find three voices spoken of, 1 Thes. iv. 16. The Lord shall descend with a shout, the shout of a King, with the voice of the archangel; either Christ himself, the prince of the angels, or the commander-in-chief, under him, of the heavenly hosts; and with the trumpet of God. The soldier's trumpet sounding the alarm of war, the judge's trumpet publishing the summons to the court.

2nd. The effect of it. They shall come forth out of their graves, as prisoners out of their prison-house; they shall arise out of the dust, and shake themselves from it: see Isa. lii. 1, 2. But that is not all; they shall appear before Christ's tribunal; shall come forth as those that are to be tried; come forth to the bar, publicly to receive their doom.

Fourthly. To what they shall be raised; to a different state, of happiness or misery, according to their different character; to a state of retribution, according to what they did in a state of probation.

1st. "They that have done good shall come forth to the resurrection of life;" they shall live again, to live for ever. Note, First. Whatever name men are called by, or whatever plausible profession they make, it will be well in the great day with those only that have done good, have done that which is pleasing to God, and profitable to others. Secondly. The resurrection of the body will be a resurrection of life to all those, and those only, that have been sincere and constant in doing good. They shall not only be publicly acquitted, as a pardoned criminal, we say, has his life; but they shall be admitted into the presence of God, and that is life, it is better than life; they shall be attended with comforts in perfection. To live is to be happy, and they shall be advanced above the fear of death; that is life indeed, in which mortality is for ever swallowed up.

2nd. "They that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation;" they shall live again, to be for ever dying. The Pharisees thought the resurrection pertained only to the just; but Christ here rectifies that mistake. Note, First. Evil-doers, whatever they pretend, will be treated in the day of judgment as evil men. Secondly. The resurrection will be to evil-doers, that did not by repentance undo what they had done amiss, a resurrection of damnation. They shall come forth to be publicly convicted of rebellion against God, and publicly condemned to everlasting punishment; to be sentenced to it, and immediately sent to it without reprieve. Such will the resurrection be.

Secondly. Observe what is here said concerning the Mediator's authority to execute judgment, ver. 22-24, 27. As he hath an almighty power, so he has a sovereign jurisdiction; and who so fit to preside in the great affairs of the other life, as he who is the Father and fountain of life? Here is,

1. Christ's commission, or delegation to the office of a judge, which is twice spoken of here, ver. 22; he "hath committed all judgment unto the Son;" and again, ver. 27, "hath given him authority."

1st. "The Father judgeth no man;" not that the Father has resigned the government, but he is pleased to govern by Jesus Christ; so that man is not heaven with God, and his working in the state of his humiliation, in which the Father should by degrees advance him to exaltation; and that the former of these (verse 21) is mentioned in the present tense, and the latter (verse 20) in the future.

v. 19-26. The Jews had charged our Lord with making himself equal with God. The charge implied self-exaltation, and that to a blasphemous degree. Our Lord's reply meets both these implications. He merely claimed that oneness with the Father which was his by reason of his eternal Sonship. And as to self-exaltation this was false, for he claimed no more than was the simple truth; while in the very relationship of Sonship was implied the very opposite to self-exaltation.

v. 31. On the apparent contradiction between this verse and the words of our Lord in chap. viii. 12-14, Alford observes that here our Lord is asserting that his own unsupported witness (supposing that possible) would not be trustworthy, but that his testimony is sup-under the terror of dealing with God immediately but hath the comfort of access to him by a Mediator. "The Father judgeth no man; First, He doth not rule us by the mere right of creation, but by covenant, and upon certain terms settled by a Mediator. Having made us, he may do what he pleaseth with us, as the potter with the clay; but he doth not do so, he draws us with the cords of a man. Secondly, He doth not determine our everlasting condition by the covenant of innocency, nor take the advantage he has against us for the violation of that covenant; the Mediator having undertaken to make a vicarious satisfaction, upon which the matter is referred to him, and God is willing to enter upon a new treaty; not under the law of the Creator, but the grace of the Redeemer.

2nd. "He hath committed all judgment to the Son," hath constituted him Lord of all, Acts x. 36; Rom. xiv. 9; as Joseph in Egypt, Gen. xl. 40. This was prophesied of, Ps. lxxii. 1; Isa. xi. 3, 4; Jer. xxiii. 5; Mic. v. 1, 4; Ps. lxxvii. 4; xvi. 13; xcviii. 9. All judgment is committed to our Lord Jesus; for, First, He is intrusted with the administration of the providential kingdom, is head over all things, Eph. i. 20; head of every man, 1 Cor. xi. 3; all things consist by him, Col. i. 17. Secondly, He is empowered to make laws, immediately to bind conscience. "I say unto you" is now the form in which the statutes of the kingdom of Heaven run; be it enacted by the Lord Jesus, and by his authority. All the acts now in force are touched with his sceptre. Thirdly, He is authorized to appoint and settle the terms of the new covenant, and to draw up the articles of peace between God and man. It is God in Christ that reconciles the world, and to him he has given power to confer eternal life. The book of life is the Lamb's book; by his award we must stand or fall. Fourthly, He is commissioned to carry on and complete the war with the powers of darkness; to cast out, and give judgment against the prince of this world, ch. xii. 31. He is commissioned, not only to judge, but to make war, Rev. xix. 12. All that fight for God against Satan, must enlist themselves under his banner. Fifthly, He is constituted sole manager of the judgment of the great day. The ancients generally understood these words of that crowning act of his judicial power. The final and universal judgment is committed to the Son of man; the tribunal is his, it is "the judgment-seat of Christ;" the retinue is his, his mighty angels; he will try the causes, and pass the sentence, Acts xvii. 31.

3rd. "He hath given him authority to execute judgment also," ver. 27. Observe, First, What the authority is which our Redeemer is invested with; an authority to execute judgment; he has not only a legislative and judicial power, but an executive power too. The phrase here is used particularly for the judgment of condemnation, Jude 15, ποινικα κριτες, "to execute judgment upon all," the same with his taking vengeance, 2 Thes. i. 8. The ruin of impenitent sinners comes from the hand of Christ; he that executes judgment upon them is the same that would have wrought salvation for them, which makes the sentence unexceptionable; and there is no relief against the sentence of the Redeemer: salvation itself cannot save those whom the Saviour condemns, which makes the ruin remediless. Secondly, Whence he has that authority; the Father gave it him. Christ's authority as Mediator is delegated and derived; he acts as the Father's viceroy, as the Lord's anointed, the Lord's Christ.

Now all this redounds very much to the honour of Christ, acquitting him from the guilt of blasphemy, in making himself equal with God; and very much to the comfort of all believers, who may with the greatest assurance venture their all in such hands.

2. Here are the reasons (reasons of state) for which this commission was given him. He hath all judgment committed to him for two reasons:

1st. "Because he is the Son of man;" which speaks these three things: First, His humiliation and gracious condescension. Man is a worm, the Son of man a worm; yet this was the nature, this the character, which the Redeemer assumed, in pursuance of the counsels of love; this low estate he stooped to, and submitted to all the mortifications attending it, because it was his Father's will; in recompense therefore of this wonderful obedience God did thus dignify him; because he condescended to be the Son of man, his Father made him Lord of all, Phil. ii. 8, 9. Secondly, His affinity and alliance to us. The Father has committed the government of the children of men to him, because, being the Son of man, he is of the same nature with those whom he is set over, and therefore the more unexceptionable, and the more acceptable, as a judge; "their governor shall proceed from the midst of them," Jer. xxx. 21. Of this that law was typical, "One of thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee," Deu. xvii. 15. Thirdly, His being the Messiah promised. In that famous vision of his kingdom and glory, Dan. vii. 13, 14, he is called the Son of man; and, Ps. viii. 4-6, Thou hast made the Son of man have "dominion over the works of thy hands." He is the Messiah, and therefore is invested with all this power. The Jews usually called Christ the son of David; but Christ usually called himself the Son of man; which was the more humble title, and speaks him a Prince and Saviour, not to the Jewish nation only, but to the whole race of mankind.

2nd. "That all men should honour the Son," ver. 23. The honouring of Jesus Christ is here spoken of, First, As God's great design. The Son intended to glorify the Father, and therefore the Father intended to glorify the Son, ch. xiii. 32. Secondly, As man's great duty, in compliance with that design. If God will have the Son honoured, it is the duty of all those to honour him to whom he is made known. Observe here,

1st. The dignity that is to be done to our Lord Jesus. We must honour the Son, must look upon him as one that is to be honoured, both upon the account of his transcendent excellences and perfections in himself, and the relations he stands in to us, and must study to give him honour accordingly; must confess that he is Lord, and worship him; must honour him who was dishonoured for us.

2nd. The degree of it; "even as they honour the Father." This supposeth our duty to honour the Father, for revealed religion is founded on natural religion, and directs us to honour the Son, to honour him with Divine honour; we must honour the Redeemer with the same honour that we honour the Creator with. So far was it from blasphemy that he made himself equal with God, that it is the highest injury that can be for us to make him otherwise. The truths and laws of the Christian religion, as far as they are revealed, are as sacred and honourable as those of natural religion, and to be equally had in estimation; for we lie under the same obligations to Christ, the author of our wellbeing, that we lie under to the Author of our being; and have as necessary a dependence upon the Redeemer's grace as upon the Creator's providence, which is a sufficient ground for this law, to "honour the Son as we honour the Father."

To enforce this law it is added, "He that honours not the Son honours not the Father which hath sent him." Some pretend a reverence for the Creator, and speak honourably of him, who make light of their Redeemer, and speak contemptibly of him; but let such know that the honours and interests of the Father and Son are so inseparably twisted and interwoven, that the Father never reckons himself honoured by any that dishonour the Son. Note, First, Indignities done to the Lord Jesus reflect upon God himself, and will so be construed and reckoned for in the court of Heaven: the Son having so far espoused the Father's honour as to take to himself the reproaches cast on him, Rom. xv. 3, the Father doth no less espouse the Son's honour, and counts himself struck at through him. Secondly, The reason of this is, because the Son is sent and commissioned by the Father; it is "the Father which hath sent him." Affronts to an ambassador are justly resented by the prince that sends him; and by this rule, those who truly "honour the Son, honour the Father also;" see Phil. ii. 11.

3. Here is the rule by which the Son goes in executing this commission, so those words seem to come in, ver. 24, "He that heareth, and believeth, hath everlasting life;" where we have the substance of the whole Gospel. The preface commands attention to a thing most weighty, and assent to a thing most certain; "Verily, verily, I say unto you;" I, to whom you hear all judgment is committed; I, in whose lips is a Divine sentence: take from me the Christian's character and charter.

1st. The character of a Christian; "he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me." To be a Christian indeed is, First, To hear the word of Christ. It is not enough to be within hearing of it; but we must attend on it, as scholars on the instructions of their teachers; and attend to it, as servants to the commands of their masters; we must hear and obey it, must abide by the Gospel of Christ as the fixed rule of our faith and practice. Secondly, To believe on him that sent him, for Christ's design is to bring us to God; and as he is the first original of all grace, so he is the last object of all faith. Christ is our way, God is our rest. We must believe on God as having sent Jesus Christ, and recommended himself to our faith and love, by manifesting his glory in the face of Jesus Christ, 2 Cor. iv. 6, as his Father and our Father.

2nd. The charter of a Christian, which all those are interested in that are Christians indeed. See what we get by Christ; First, A charter of pardon, "he shall not come into condemnation;" the grace of the Gospel is a full discharge from the curse of the law. A believer shall not only not lie under condemnation eternally, but not come into condemnation now; not come into the danger of it, Rom. viii. 11; not come into judgment; not be so much as arraigned. Secondly, A charter of privileges. He is passed out of death to life; is invested in a present happiness in spiritual life, and entitled to a future happiness in eternal life. The tenor of the first covenant was, "Do this, and live;" the man that doth them shall live in them. Now this proves Christ equal with the Father, that he has power to propose the same benefit to the hearers of his word that had been proposed to the keepers of the old law, namely, life; "hear and live, believe and live," is what we may venture our souls upon, when we are disabled to "do and live;" see ch. xvii. 2.

4. Here is the righteousness of his proceedings pursuant to this commission, ver. 3. All judgment being committed to him, we cannot but ask how he manageth it? And here he answers, "My judgment is just." All Christ's acts of government, both legislative and judicial, are exactly agreeable to the rules of equity; see Pr. viii. 8. There can be no exceptions against any of the determinations of the Redeemer; and therefore, as there shall be no repeal of any of his statutes, so there shall be no appeal from any of his sentences. His judgments are certainly just, for they are directed,

1st. By the Father's wisdom: "I can of my own self do nothing," nothing without the Father; "but as I hear, I judge." As he had said before, ver. 19, "the Son can do nothing but what he sees the Father do," so here, nothing but what he hears the Father say; "as I hear," First, From the secret, eternal counsels of the Father, "so I judge." Would we know what we may depend upon in our dealing with God? Hear the word of Christ; we need not dive into the Divine counsels, those secret things which belong not to us, but attend to the revealed dictates of Christ's government and judgment, and those will furnish us with an unerring guide; for what Christ has adjudged is an exact copy or counterpart of what the Father has decreed. Secondly, From the published records of the Old Testament. Christ, in all the execution of his undertaking, had an eye to the Scripture, and made it his business to conform to that, and fulfil that, as it was written in the volume of the book. Thus he has taught us to do nothing of ourselves; but as we hear from the Word of God, so to judge of things, and act accordingly.

2nd. By the Father's will: "My judgment is just," and cannot be otherwise, "because I seek not mine own will, but his who sent me." Not as if the will of Christ were contrary to the will of the Father, as the flesh is contrary to the spirit in us. But, First, Christ had, as man, the natural and innocent affections of the human nature, sense of pain and pleasure, an inclination to life, an aversion to death; yet he pleased not himself; did not confer with these, nor consult these, when he was to go on in his undertaking, but acquiesced entirely in the will of his Father. Secondly, What he did as Mediator was not the result of any peculiar, particular purpose and design of his own; what he did seek to do, was not for his own mind's sake, but he was therein guided by his Father's will, and the purpose which he had purposed to himself. Thus our Saviour did upon all occasions refer himself to, and govern himself by.

Thus our Lord Jesus has opened his commission (whether to the conviction of his enemies, or no,) to his own honour, and the everlasting comfort of all his friends, who here see him able to save to the uttermost.

31 If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true. 32 There is another that beareth witness of me; and I know that the witness which he witnesseth of me is true. 33 Ye sent unto John, and he bare witness unto the truth. 34 But I receive not testimony from man: but these things I say, that ye might be saved. 35 He was a burning and a shining light: and ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light. 36 But I have greater witness than that of John: for the works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me. 37 And the Father himself, which hath sent me, hath borne witness of me. Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape. 38 And ye have not his word abiding in you: for whom he hath sent, him ye ported by, and in fact coincides with, that of the Father; and that the very same argument is used in viii. 12-14, but the other side of it presented to us. He does witness of himself, because his testimony is the testimony of the Father; he being the word of God, and the Father witnessing in him."

v. 32. "There is another"—not John the Baptist; see verses 34, 36, where our Lord says he receives not testimony from man, and that he has greater witness than that of John. By "another" is meant the Father. See chap. viii. 50, where a similar mode of expression is used; also viii. 18, where our Lord says distinctly, "The Father that sent me beareth witness of me."

v. 33-37. The connection and sense seems to be, "Ye sent unto John, and he told you the truth; and yet, great prophet though he was, I depend not on his testimony; I have greater witness. The works that I do are none other than the works of the Father, and so his testimony."

believe not. 39 Search the scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me. 40 And ye will not come to me, that ye might have life. 41 I receive not honour from men. 42 But I know you, that ye have not the love of God in you. 43 I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive. 44 How can ye believe, which receive honour one of another, and seek not the honour that cometh from God only? 45 Do not think that I will accuse you to the Father: there is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust. 46 For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me: for he wrote of me. 47 But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?

In these verses our Lord Jesus proves and confirms the commission he had produced, and makes it out that he was sent of God to be the Messiah.

I. He sets aside his own testimony of himself: ver. 31, "If I bear witness of myself" though it is infallibly true, ch. viii. 14, yet, according to the common rule of judgment among men, you will not admit it as a legal proof, nor allow it to be given in evidence. Now, 1. This reflects reproach upon the sons of men, and their veracity and integrity. Surely we may say deliberately, what David said in haste, "all men are liars," else it would never have been such a received maxim, that a man's testimony of himself is suspicious, and not to be relied on; it is a sign that self-love is stronger than the love of truth. And yet, 2. It reflects honour on the Son of God, and speaks his wonderful condescension, that though he is the faithful witness, the truth itself, who may challenge to be credited upon his honour, and his own single testimony, yet is pleased to waive his privilege, and, for the confirmation of our faith, refers himself to his vouchers, that we might have full satisfaction.

II. He produceth other witnesses, that bear testimony to him that he was sent of God.

First, The Father himself bore testimony to him: ver. 32, "there is another that beareth witness," which I take to be meant of God the Father; for Christ mentions his testimony with his own, ch. viii. 18, "I bear witness of myself, and the Father beareth witness of me." Observe.

1. The seal which the Father put to his commission. He "beareth witness of me," not only hath done so, by a voice from heaven, but still doth so, by the tokens of his presence with me. See who they are to whom God will bear witness: 1st. To those whom he sends and employs; where he gives commissions, he gives credentials. 2nd. To those who bear witness to him; so Christ did. God will own and honour those that own and honour him. 3rd. To those who decline bearing witness of themselves; so Christ did. Those that humble and abase themselves, and seek not their own glory, God will take care they shall not lose by it.

2. The satisfaction Christ had in this testimony: "I know that the witness which he witnesseth of me is true." I am very well assured that I have a Divine mission, and do not in the least hesitate concerning it. Thus he had the witness in himself. The devil tempted him to question his being the Son of God, but he never yielded.

Secondly, John Baptist witnessed to Christ, ver. 33, &c. "John came to bear witness of the Light," ch. i. 7. His business was to prepare his way, and direct people to him: "Behold the Lamb of God." Now the testimony of John was 1. A solemn and public testimony. "Ye sent an embassy of priests and Levites to John, which gave him an opportunity of publishing what he had to say." It was not a popular, but a judicial testimony. 2. It was a true testimony. "He bore witness to the truth," as a witness ought to do; the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Christ doth not say, he bore witness to me, though every one knew he did; but, like an honest man, "he bore witness to the truth." Now John was confessedly such a holy, good man, so mortified to the world, and so conversant with Divine things, that it could not be imagined he should be guilty of such a forgery and imposture as to say what he did concerning Christ, if it had not been so, and if he had not been sure of it. Two things are added concerning John's testimony.

1st. That it was a testimony, ex abundanti, "more than he needed to vouch;" ver. 34, "I receive not testimony from man." Though Christ saw fit to quote John's testimony, it is with a protestation that it shall not be deemed or construed so as to prejudice the prerogative of his self-sufficiency. Christ needs no letters of commendation, no testimonials or certificates but what his own worth and excellency brings with him; why then did Christ here urge the testimony of John? Why, "these things I say, that ye might be saved." This he aimed at in all his discourses, to save, not his own life, but others' souls; he produced John's testimony because, being one of themselves, it was to be hoped they would hearken to it. Note, First, Christ desires and designs the salvation even of his enemies and persecutors. Secondly, The word of Christ is the ordinary means of salvation. Thirdly, Christ, in his word, considers our infirmities, and condescends to our capacities; consulting not so much what it befits so great a prince to say, as what we can bear, and what will be most likely to do us good.

2nd. That it was a testimony, ad hominem, "to the man;" because John Baptist was one whom they had a respect for; ver. 35, he was a light among you. Observe.

First, The character of John Baptist: "he was a burning and a shining light." Christ often spoke honourably of John; he was now in prison, under a cloud, yet Christ gives him his due praise; which we must be ready to do to all that faithfully serve God. 1st. He was a light, not phos, "lux," light; (so Christ was the Light); but lucerna, "a luminary," a derived, subordinate light. His office was to enlighten a dark world with notices of the Messiah's approach, to whom he was as the morning star. 2nd. He was a burning light, which notes sincerity. Painted fire may be made to shine, but that which burns is true fire. It notes also his activity, zeal, and fervency, burning in love to God and the souls of men. Fire is always working on itself, or something else; so is a good minister. 3rd. He was a shining light, which notes either his exemplary conversation, in which our light shines, Mat. v. 18, or, an eminent, diffusive influence. He was illustrious in the sight of others; though he affected obscurity, retirement, and was in the deserts, yet such was his doctrine, his baptism, his life, that he became very remarkable, and attracted the eyes of the nation.

Secondly, The affections of the people to him; "ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light." 1st. It was a transport they were in upon the appearing of John; "ye were willing," ηθελησατε, "ye delighted" to rejoice in his light; you were very proud that you had such a man among you, that was the honour of your country; ye were willing αγαλλιασθηναι, willing to dance, and make a noise about this light, as boys about a bonfire. 2nd. It was but transient, and soon over; ye were fond of him, ποσιν ωραν, "for an hour," for a season, as little children are fond of a new thing; ye were pleased with John a while, but soon grew weary of him and his ministry, and said he had a devil; and now you have him in prison. Note, Many that seem to be affected and pleased with the Gospel at first, afterwards despise and reject it: it is common for forward and noisy professors to cool and fall off. These here rejoiced in John's light, but never walked in it, and therefore did not stick to it, like the stony ground. While Herod was a friend to John Baptist, the people caressed him; but when he fell under Herod's frowns, he lost their favours. Ye were willing to countenance John, ποσιν ωραν, that is, for temporal ends, so some take it; you were glad of him, in hopes to make a tool of him, by his interest; and under the umbrage of his name to have shaken off the Roman yoke, and recovered the civil liberty and honour of your country. Now, First, Christ mentions their respects to John, to condemn them for their present opposition to him to whom John bore witness. If they had continued their veneration for John, as they ought to have done, they would have embraced Christ. Secondly, He mentions the passing away of their respects, to justify God in depriving them, as he had now done, of John's ministry, and putting that light under a bushel.

Thirdly, Christ's own witness to him; ver. 36, "I have a testimony greater than that of John;" for "if we believe the witness of men" sent of God, as John was, "the witness of God" immediately, and not by the ministry of men, "is greater," 1 Jno. v. 9. Observe, Though the witness of John was a less cogent and less considerable witness, yet our Lord was pleased to make use of it. We must be glad of all the supports that offer themselves for the confirmation of our faith, though they may not amount to a demonstration, and not invalidate any, under pretence there are others more conclusive; we have occasion for them all. Now this greater witness was, "the works which his Father had given him to finish." That is,

1. In general; the whole course of his life and ministry: his revealing God and his will to us; setting up his kingdom among men; reforming the world; destroying Satan's kingdom; restoring fallen man to his primitive purity and felicity; and shedding abroad in men's hearts the love of God, and one another. All that work of which he said, when he died, "It is finished," it was all, from first to last, opus Deo dignum, "a work worthy of God;" all he said and did was holy and heavenly; and a Divine purity, power, and grace shone in it, and proved abundantly that he was sent of God.

2. In particular; the miracles he wrought for the proof of his Divine mission witnessed of him. Now it is here said, 1st. That these works were given him by the Father, that is, he was both appointed and empowered to work them; for, as Mediator, he derived both commission and strength from his Father. 2nd. They were given him to finish. He must do all those works of wonder which the counsel and foreknowledge of God had before determined to be done; and his finishing them proves a Divine power; for, "as for God, his work is perfect." 3rd. These works did bear witness of him, did prove that he was sent of God, and that what he said concerning himself was true; see Heb. ii. 4, Acts ii. 22; that the Father had sent him, as a father, not as a master, sends his servant on an errand, but as a father sends his son to take possession for himself; if God had not sent him, he would not have seconded him, would not have sealed him, as he did, by the works he gave him to do; for the world's Creator will never be its deceiver.

Fourthly, He produceth, more fully than before, his Father's testimony concerning him; ver. 37, "the Father that sent me hath borne witness of me." The prince doth not use to follow his ambassador himself to confirm his commission, viva voce, "by speaking;" but God was pleased to bear witness of his Son himself, by a voice from heaven at his baptism, Mat. iii. 17. This is my ambassador, "This is my beloved Son." The Jews reckoned Bath-kol, "the daughter of a voice," a voice from heaven, one of the ways by which God made known his mind; in that way he had owned Christ publicly and solemnly, and repeated it, Mat. xii. 5. Note, 1. Those whom God sends, he will bear witness of; where he gives a commission, he will not fail to seal it; that he never "left himself without witness," Acts xiv. 17, will never leave any of his servants so, who go upon his errand. 2. Where God demands belief, he will not fail to give sufficient evidence, as he has done concerning Christ. That which was to be witnessed concerning Christ, was chiefly this, that the God we had offended was willing to accept of him as Mediator. Now, concerning this, he has himself (and he was fittest to do it) given us full satisfaction, declaring himself well pleased in him. If we be so, the work is done.

Now it might be suggested, if God himself thus bore witness of Christ, how came it to pass that he was not universally received by the Jewish nation and their rulers? To this Christ here answers, that it was not to be thought strange, nor their infidelity weaken his credibility, for two reasons:

1st. Because they were not acquainted with such extraordinary revelations of God and his will: "Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape," or appearance. They shewed themselves to be as ignorant of God, though they professed relation to him, as we are of a man we never either saw or heard. But what do I talk to you of God's bearing witness of me? He is one you know nothing of, nor have any acquaintance or communion with. Note, Ignorance of God is the true reason of men's rejecting the record he has given concerning his Son. A right understanding of natural religion would discover to us such admirable congruities in the Christian religion as would greatly dispose our minds to the entertainment of it. Some give this sense of it: "The Father bore witness of me by a voice, and the descent of a dove, which is such an extraordinary thing that you never saw or heard the like; and yet, for my sake, there was such a voice and appearance; yea, and you might have heard that voice, you might have seen that appearance, as others did, if you had closely attended the ministry of John; but, by slighting it, you missed of that testimony."

2nd. Because they were not affected, no, not with the ordinary ways by which God had revealed himself to them; ver. 38, "ye have not his word abiding in you." They had the Scriptures of the Old Testament; might they not by them be disposed to receive Christ? Yes, if they had had their due influence upon them. But, First, The word of God was not in them; it was among them—in their country, in their hands—but not in them, in their hearts; not ruling in their souls, but only shining in their eyes, and sounding in their ears. What did it avail them that they had the oracles of God committed to them, Rom. iii. 2, when they had not these oracles commanding in them? if they had, they would readily have embraced Christ. Secondly, It did not abide. Many have the word of God coming into them, and making some impressions for a while, but it doth not abide with them; it is not constantly in them, as a

v. 35. "He was a burning and a shining light:" from the use of the past tense ("was") we may perhaps infer that the ministry of John had come to an end, owing to his having been cast into prison. "A burning and a shining light:" literally, "a lit-up and shining lamp or torch." Compare with this the phrase applied to our Lord, viz., "the Light." He was the source of light to others, John's was but a derived light. "For a season to rejoice," &c.: the light, frivolous, and false spirit in which they received the Baptist is alluded to.

v. 37–40. The following is Alford's connection and rendering of these verses: "The works of which I have spoken are only indirect testimonies; the Father himself, who sent me, has given direct testimony concerning me. Now that testimony cannot be derived by you nor by any man by direct communication with him; for ye have never heard his voice nor seen his shape (or perhaps have not heard his voice as your fathers did from Sinai, nor seen his vision appearance, as the prophets did), nor (verse 38) in your case has it man at home, but only now and then, as a wayfaring man. If the word abide in us, if we converse with it by frequent meditation, consult with it upon every occasion, and conform to it in our conversation, we shall then readily receive the witness of the Father concerning Christ: see ch. vii. 17.

But how did it appear that they had not the word of God abiding in them? It appeared by this, "whom he hath sent, him ye believe not." There was so much said in the Old Testament concerning Christ, to direct people when and where to look for him, and so to facilitate the discovery of him, that if they had duly considered those things, they could not have avoided the conviction of Christ's being sent of God; so that their not believing in Christ was a certain sign that the word of God did not abide in them. Note, The indwelling of the word, and Spirit, and grace of God in us, is best tried by the effects of it, particularly by our receiving what he sends; the commands he sends, the messengers, the providences he sends, especially Christ, whom he hath sent.

Fifthly. The last witness he calls is the Old Testament, which witnessed of him; and to it he appeals, ver. 39, &c. "Search the Scriptures," pericope. It may be read either, 1. "Ye do search the Scriptures," and ye do well to do so; you read them daily in your synagogues; you have rabbins, and doctors, and scribes, that make it their business to study them, and criticise upon them. The Jews boasted of the flourishing of the Scripture learning in the days of Hillel, who died about twelve years after Christ's birth, and reckoned some of those who were then members of the Sanhedrim the beauties of their wisdom, and the glories of their law; and Christ owns that they did indeed search the Scriptures, but it was in search of their own glory; "Ye do search the Scriptures; and therefore, if ye were not willfully blind, you would believe in me." Note, It is possible for men to be very studious in the letter of the Scripture, and yet to be strangers to the power and influence of it. Or, 2. As we read it, "Search the Scriptures," and so, 1st. It was spoken to them in the nature of an appeal. "You profess to receive and believe the Scriptures; there I will join issue with you: let that be the judge, provided you will not 'rest in the letter,' (herere in cortice.) but will search into it." Note, When appeals are made to the Scriptures, they must be searched. Search the whole book of Scripture throughout; compare one passage by another, and explain one by another. We must likewise search particular passages to the bottom, and see, not what they seem to say prima facie,—at the first appearance, but what they say indeed. 2nd. It is spoken to us in the nature of an advice, or command, to all Christians to search the Scriptures. Note, All those who would find Christ, must "search the Scriptures;" not only read them, and hear them, and study, and a close application of mind. First, Diligence in seeking, labour and study, and a close application of mind. Secondly, Desire and design of finding. We must aim at some spiritual benefit and advantage in reading and studying the Scripture, and often ask, What am I now searching for? We must search as for hid treasures, Pr. ii. 4: as those that sink for gold or silver, or that dive for pearl, Job xxviii. 1-11. This ennobled the Bereans, Acts xvii. 11.

Now there are two things which we are here directed to have in our eye in our searching of the Scripture; heaven our end, and Christ our way.

1st. We must search the Scriptures for heaven, as our great end; "for in them ye think ye have eternal life." The Scripture assures us of an eternal state set before us, and offers to us an eternal life in that state. It contains the chart that describes it, the charter that convey it, the direction in the way that leads to it, and the foundation upon which the hope of it is built; and this is worth searching for, there where we are sure to find it. But to the Jews Christ saith only, "Ye think ye have eternal life" in the Scripture; because, though they did retain the belief and hope of eternal life, and grounded their expectations of it upon the Scriptures; yet herein they missed it, that they looked for it by the bare reading and studying of the Scriptures. It was a common but corrupt saying among them, "He that has the words of the law, has eternal life; they thought they were sure of heaven if they could say by heart, or rather by rote, such and such passages of Scripture as they were directed to by the tradition of the elders; as they thought all the vulgar cursed, because they did not thus know the law, ch. vii. 49; so they concluded all the learned undoubtedly blessed.

2nd. We must search the Scriptures for Christ, as the new and living way that leads to this end. Those are they, the great and principal witnesses, that testify of me. Note, First, The Scriptures, even those of the Old Testament, testify of Christ, and by them God bears witness to him. The Spirit of Christ in the prophets, testified beforehand of him (1 Pet. i. 11) the purposes and promises of God concerning him, and the previous notices of him. The Jews knew very well that the Old Testament testified of the Messiah, and were critical in their remarks upon the passages that looked that way; and yet were careless, and wretchedly overseen in the application of them. Secondly, Therefore we must "search the Scriptures," and may hope to find eternal life in that search, because they testify of Christ; for this is eternal life, to know him: see 1 Jno. v. 11. Christ is the treasure hid in the field of the Scriptures; the water in those wells, the milk in those breasts.

To this testimony he annexeth a reproof of their infidelity and wickedness in four instances; particularly,

1. Their neglect of him and his doctrine; ver. 40, "ye will not come to me that ye might have life;" you search the Scriptures, you believe the prophets, which you cannot but see testify of me, and yet you will not come to me, to whom they direct you. Their estrangement from Christ was not so much the fault of their understandings as of their wills. This is expressed as a complaint; Christ offered life, and it would not be accepted. Note, 1st. There is life to be had with Jesus Christ; and it is not for poor souls; we may have life, the life of pardon and grace, and comfort and glory. Life is the perfection of our being, and inclusive of all happiness; and Christ is our life. 2nd. Those that would have this life, must come to Jesus Christ for it; we may have it for the coming for. It supposeth an assent of the understanding to the doctrine of Christ, and the record given concerning him; it lies in the consent of the will to his government and grace; and it produceth an answerable compliance in the affections and actions. 3rd. The only reason why sinners die, is because they will not come to Christ for life and happiness. It is not because they cannot, but because they will not. They will neither accept of the life offered, because spiritual and Divine; nor use of the appointed means; they will not be cured, for they will not observe the methods of cure. 4th. The wilfulness and obstinacy of sinners, in rejecting the tenders of grace, is a great grief to the Lord Jesus, and what he complains of.

Those words, ver. 41, "I receive not honour from men," come in in a parenthesis, to obviate an objection against him, as if he sought his own glory, and made himself the head of a party, in obliging all to come to him and applaud him. Note, 1st. He did not covet or court the applause of men; did not in the least affect that worldly pomp and splendour which the carnal Jews expected their Messiah to appear in. He charged those he cured not to make him known, and withdrew from those that would have made him king. 2nd. He had not the applause of men; instead of receiving honour from men, he received a great deal of dishonour and disgrace from men; for he made himself of no reputation. 3rd. He needed not the applause of men; it was no addition to his glory, whom all the angels of God worship; nor was he any otherwise pleased with it, than as it was according to his Father's will, and for the happiness of those who, in giving honour to him, received much greater honour from him.

2. Their want of the love of God; ver. 42, "I know you" very well, "that you have not the love of God in you." Why should I wonder that you do not come to me, when you want even the first principle of natural religion, which is the love of God? Note, The reason why people slight Christ, is because they do not love God; for if we did indeed love God, we would love him who is his express image, and hasten to him, by whom only we may be restored to the favour of God. He had charged them, ver. 37, with ignorance of God, and here with want of love to him; therefore men have not the love of God, because they desire not the knowledge of him. Observe,

1st. The crime charged upon them; "ye have not the love of God in you." They pretended a great love to God, and thought they proved it by their zeal for the law, the temple, and the sabbath; and yet they were really without the love of God. Note, There are many who make a great profession of religion, that yet shew they want the love of God, by their neglect of Christ, and their contempt of his commandments: they hate his holiness and undervalue his goodness. Observe, It is the love of God in us—the love that is seated in the heart, and is a living, active principle there—that God will accept; the love shed abroad there, Rom. v. 5.

2nd. The proof of this charge, by the personal knowledge of Christ, who searcheth the heart, Rev. ii. 23, and knows what is in man; "I know you." Christ sees through all our disguises, and can say to each of us, "I know thee." First, Christ knows men better than their neighbours know them. The people thought that the scribes and Pharisees were very devout and good men; but Christ knew they had nothing of the love of God in them. Secondly, Christ knows men better than they know themselves. These Jews had a very good opinion of themselves; but Christ knew how corrupt their inside was, notwithstanding the plausible shows of their outside: we may deceive ourselves, but we cannot deceive him. Thirdly, Christ knows men that do not and I will not know him; he looks on those who industriously look off him, and calls them by their own name, their true name, who have not known him.

3. Another crime charged upon them is, their readiness to entertain false Christs and false prophets, while they obstinately opposed him who was the true Messiah; ver. 43, "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." "Be astonished," O heavens, at this! Jer. ii. 12, 13; "for my people have committed two evils;" great evils indeed: 1st. "They have forsaken the fountain of living waters;" for they would not receive Christ, who came in his Father's name, had his commission from his Father, and did all for his glory. 2nd. They have hewn out broken cisterns, "they hearken to every one that will set up in his own name. They forsake their own mercies, that is bad enough; and it is for lying vanities, that is worse. Observe here, First, Those are false prophets who come in their own name, who run without being sent, and set up for themselves only. Secondly, It is just with God to suffer those to be deceived with false prophets who receive not the truth in the love of it, 2 Thes. ii. 10, 11.

The errors of antichrist are the just punishment of those who obey not the doctrine of Christ. They that shut their eyes against the true light, are by the judgment of God given up to wander endlessly after 'false lights,' and to be led aside after every ignis fatuus. Thirdly, It is the gross folly of many, that while they nauseate ancient truths, they are fond of upstart errors; they loathe manna, and at the same time feed upon ashes. After the Jews had rejected Christ and his Gospel, they were continually haunted with spectres, with false Christs and false prophets, Mat. xxiv. 24; and their proneness to follow such occasioned those distractions and seditions that hastened their ruin.

4. They are here charged with pride and vainglory, and unbelief the effect of it, ver. 44. Having sharply reprov'd their unbelief, like a wise physician he here searcheth into the cause—lays the axe to the root; they therefore slighted and undervalued Christ, because they admired and overvalued themselves. Here is,

1st. Their ambition of worldly honour. Christ despised it, ver. 41; they set their hearts upon it; "ye receive honour one of another;" that is, ye look for a Messiah in outward pomp, and promise yourselves worldly honour by him. "Ye receive honour;" that is, First, You desire to receive it, and aim at that in all you do. Secondly, Ye give honour to others, and applaud them, only that they may return it, and may applaud you; petimus dabimusque vicissim—"we ask, and we bestow." It is the proud man's art to throw honour upon others, only that it may rebound upon himself. Thirdly, You are very careful to keep all the honours to yourselves, and confine them to your own party, as if you had the monopoly of that which is honourable. Fourthly, What respects are shewed you, you receive them yourselves, and do not transmit them to God, as Herod. Idolizing men and their sentiments, and affecting to be idolized by them and their applauses, are pieces of idolatry as directly contrary to Christianity as any other.

2nd. Their neglect of spiritual honour, called here "the honour that comes from God only;" this they sought not, nor minded. Note, First, True honour is that which comes from God only—that is real and lasting honour; those are honourable indeed whom he takes into covenant and communion with himself. Secondly, "This honour have all the saints." All that believe in Christ, through him receive the honour that comes from God; he is not partial, but will give glory wherever he gives grace. Thirdly, This honour that comes from God we must seek, must aim at it, and act for it, and take up with nothing short of it, Rom. ii. 1; we must account it our reward, as the Pharisees accounted the praise of men. Fourthly, Those that will not come to Christ, and those that are ambitious of worldly honour, make it appear that they seek not the honour that comes from God; and it is their folly and ruin.

3rd. The influence this had upon their infidelity; "How can ye believe," who are thus affected? Observe here, First, The difficulty of believing ariseth from ourselves, and our own corruption; we make our work hard to ourselves, and then complain it is impracticable. Secondly, The ambition and affectation of worldly honour is a great hindrance to faith in Christ. How can they believe who make the praise and applause of men their idol? When the profession and practice of serious godliness is unfashionable, "is every where spoken against"—when Christ and his followers are men wondered at—and to be a Christian is to be like a speckled bird, (and this is the common case), how can they believe, the top of whose ambition is "to make a fair show in the flesh?"

Sixthly. The last witness here called is Moses, ver. 45, &c. The Jews had a great veneration for Moses, and valued themselves upon their being the disciples of Moses, and pretended to adhere to Moses in their opposition to Christ, but Christ here shews them,

1. That Moses was a witness against the unbelieving Jews, and accused them to the Father; "there is one that accuseth you, even Moses." This may be understood either, 1st. As shewing the difference between the law and the Gospel. Moses—that is, the law—accuseth you, for by the law is the knowledge of sin; it condemns you; it is to those that trust to it a ministration of death and condemnation; but it is not the design of Christ's Gospel to accuse us: "Think not that I will accuse you." Christ did not come into the world as a Mosaic, to find fault and pick quarrels with every body, or as a spy upon the

been given by that inward witness (chap. iii. 33; 1 John iv. 13, 14) which those have (and had in a measure even before the gift of the Spirit) in whom his word abides; for ye have not his word abiding in you, nor believe on him whom he hath sent. Yet (verse 39) there is a form of this direct testimony of the Father accessible even to you; "Search the scriptures." "Observe," continues Alford, "that the testimony in the Scriptures is not the only nor the chief one intended in verse 37, but the direct testimony in the heart of the believer, which, as the Jews have not, they are directed to another form of the Father's testimony, that in the Scriptures." The word "search" is taken by Alford as in the imperative mood. "Search" may be taken in the indicative, as asserting a fact. If it be thus taken, "the logical connection of the three sentences in verses 39, 40 is easy and obvious: 'Ye search the Scriptures, because ye think in them ye have eternal life, and they are the witnesses to which I appeal as bearing testimony concerning me; and withal (or yet) ye actions of men, or a promoter to fish for crimes; no, he came to be an advocate, not an accuser: to reconcile God and man, and not to set them more at variance. What fools were they then that adhered to Moses against Christ, and desired to be under the law, Gal. iv. 21. Or, 2nd. As shewing the manifest unreasonableness of their infidelity. Think not that I will appeal from your bar to God's, and challenge you to answer there for what you do against me, as injured innocency uses to do; no, I do not need; you are already accused and cast in the court of Heaven; Moses himself saith enough to convict you of, and condemn you for, your unbelief. Let them not mistake concerning Christ; though he was a prophet, he did not improve his interest in Heaven against those that persecuted him; did not, as Elias, make intercession against Israel, Rom. xi. 2; or as Jeremiah, desire to see God's vengeance on them, Jer. xx. 12. Instead of accusing his crucifiers to his Father, he prayed, "Father, forgive them." Nor let them mistake concerning Moses, as if he would stand by them in rejecting Christ; no, "there is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust." Note, First. External privileges and advantages, are commonly the vain confidence of those who reject Christ and his grace. The Jews trusted in Moses, and thought their having his laws and ordinances would save them. Secondly. Those that confide in their privileges, and do not improve them, will find not only that their confidence is disappointed, but that those very privileges will be witnesses against them.

2. That Moses was a witness for Christ, and to his doctrine; ver. 46, 47, "he wrote of me." Moses did particularly prophesy of Christ, as the seed of the woman, the seed of Abraham, the Shiloh, the great Prophet; the ceremonies of the law of Moses were figures of Him that was to come. The Jews made Moses the patron of their opposition to Christ; but Christ here shews them their error, that Moses was so far from writing against Christ, that he wrote for him, and of him. But,

1st. Christ here charges it on the Jews that they did not believe Moses. He had said, ver. 45, that they trusted in Moses, and yet here undertakes to make out that they did not believe Moses; they trusted to his name, but they did not receive his doctrine in its true sense and meaning; they did not rightly understand nor give credit to what there was in the writings of Moses concerning the Messiah.

2nd. He proves this charge from their disbelief of him; "had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me." Note, First. The surest trial of faith is by the effects it produceth: many say they believe, whose actions give their words the lie; for had they believed the Scriptures, they would have done otherwise than they did. Secondly. Those who rightly believe one part of Scripture will receive every part. The prophecies of the Old Testament were so fully accomplished in Christ, that they who rejected Christ, did in effect deny those prophecies, and set them aside.

3rd. From their disbelief of Moses, he infers that it was not strange they rejected him: "If ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?" how can it be thought ye should? First. If ye do not believe sacred writings, those oracles which are in black and white, which is the most certain way of conveyance, "how shall ye believe my words," which use to be less regarded? Secondly. If you do not believe Moses, for whom you have such a profound veneration, how is it likely you should believe me, whom you look upon with so much contempt? see Ex. vi. 12. Thirdly. If ye believe not what Moses spake and wrote of me, which is a strong and cogent testimony for me, how shall ye believe me and my mission? If we admit not the premises, how shall we admit the conclusion? The truth of the Christian religion,—it being a matter purely of Divine revelation,—depends upon the Divine authority of the Scripture; if therefore we believe not the Divine inspiration of those writings, how shall we receive the doctrine of Christ?

Thus ends Christ's plea for himself, in answer to the charge exhibited against him: what effect it had we know not. It should seem to have had this,—their mouths were stopped for the present, and they could not for shame but drop the prosecution; and yet their hearts were hardened.

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter we have, I. The miracle of the loaves, ver. 1—14. II. Christ's walking upon the water, ver. 15—21. III. The people's flocking after him at Capernaum, ver. 22—23. IV. His conference with them, occasioned by the miracle of the loaves; in which he reproves them for seeking carnal food, and directs them to spiritual food, ver. 26, 27; shewing them how they must labour for spiritual food, ver. 28, 29; and what that spiritual food is, ver. 30—59. V. Their discontent at what he said, and the reproof he gave them for it, ver. 60—65. VI. The apostasy of many from him, and his discourse with his disciples that adhered to him upon that occasion, ver. 66—71.

AFTER these things Jesus went over the sea of Galilee, which is the sea of Tiberias. 2 And a great multitude followed him, because they saw his miracles which he did on them that were diseased. 3 And Jesus went up into a mountain, and there he sat with his disciples.

4 And the passover, a feast of the Jews, was nigh. 5 When Jesus then lifted up his eyes, and saw a great company come unto him, he saith unto Philip, Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat? 6 And this he said to prove him: for he himself knew what he would do. 7 Philip answered him, Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little. 8 One of his disciples, Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, saith unto him, 9 There is a lad here, which hath five barley loaves, and two small fishes: but what are they among so many? 10 And Jesus said, Make the men sit down. Now there was much grass in the place. So the men sat down, in number about five thousand. 11 And Jesus took the loaves; and when he had given thanks, he distributed to the disciples, and the disciples to them that were set down; and likewise of the fishes as much as they would. 12 When they were filled, he said unto his disciples, Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost. 13 Therefore they gathered them together, and filled twelve baskets with the fragments of the five barley loaves, which remained over and above unto them that had eaten. 14 Then those men, when they had seen the miracle that Jesus did, said, This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world.

We have here an account of Christ's feeding five thousand men with five loaves and two fishes; which miracle is in this respect remarkable, that it is the only passage of the actions of Christ's life that is recorded by all the four evangelists. John, who useth not to relate what had been recorded by those who wrote before him, yet relates this, because of the reference the following discourse has to it. Observe,

First. The place and time, where and when this miracle was wrought, which are noted for the greater evidence of the truth of the story. It is not said that it was done once upon a time, no body knows where; but the circumstances are specified, that the fact might be inquired into.

1. The country that Christ was in; ver. 1, he "went over the sea of Galilee," called elsewhere the lake of Gennesaret; here, the sea of Tiberias, from a city adjoining, which Herod had lately enlarged and beautified, and called so in honour of Tiberius the emperor, and probably had made his metropolis. Christ did not go directly over, across this inland sea, but made a coasting voyage to another place on the same side. It is not tempting God to choose to go by water, when there is convenience for it, even to those places whither we might go by land; for Christ never tempted the Lord his God, Mat. iv. 7.

2. The company that he was attended with, "a great multitude followed him, because they saw his miracles," ver. 2. Note, 1st. Our Lord Jesus, while he went about doing good, lived continually in a crowd, which gave him more trouble than honour. Good and useful men must not complain of a hurry of business, when they are serving God and their generation; it will be time enough to enjoy ourselves when we come to that world where we shall enjoy God. 2nd. Christ's miracles drew many after him, that were not effectually drawn to him. They had their curiosity gratified by the strangeness of them, who had not their consciences convinced by the power of them.

3. Christ's posting himself advantageously to entertain them; ver. 3, he "went up into a mountain, and there he sat with his disciples," that he might the more conveniently be seen and heard by the multitude that crowded after him. This was a natural pulpit, and not, like Ezra's, made for the purpose. Christ was now driven to be a field preacher; but his word was never the worse, nor the less acceptable for that, to those who knew how to value it—who followed him still, not only when he went out to a desert place, but when he went up to a mountain, though up-hill be against heart. He sat there, as teachers use to do, in cathedra,—in the chair of instruction; he did not sit at ease, nor sit in state, but sat as one having authority; sat ready to receive addresses that were made to him, whoever would might come and find him there. He sat with his disciples; he condescended to take them to sit with him, to put a reputation upon them before the people, and give them an earnest of the glory in which they should shortly sit with him. We are said to sit with him, Eph. ii. 6.

4. The time when it was. The first words, "after those things," do not signify that this immediately followed what was related in the foregoing chapter; for it was a considerable time after; and they signify no more but, in process of time; but we are told, ver. 4, that it was when the passover was at hand; which is here noted, First. Because, perhaps, that had brought in all the apostles from their respective expeditions, whither they were sent as itinerant preachers, that they might attend their Master to Jerusalem to keep the feast. Secondly. Because it was a custom with the Jews religiously to observe the approach of the passover thirty days before, with some sort of solemnity; so long before they had it in their eye; repaired the roads, mended bridges, if occasion were, and discoursed of the passover, and the institution of it. Thirdly. Because, perhaps, the approach of the passover, when every one knew Christ would go up to Jerusalem, and be absent for some time, made the multitude flock the more after him, and attend the more diligently on him. Note, The prospect of losing our opportunities should quicken us to improve them with double diligence. And when solemn ordinances are approaching, it is good to prepare for them, by conversing with the word of Christ.

Secondly. The miracle itself. And there observe, 1. The notice Christ took of the crowd that attended him; ver. 5, "he lifted up his eyes, and saw a great company come to him;" poor, mean, ordinary people, no doubt, for such make up the multitudes, especially in such remote corners of the country; yet Christ shewed himself pleased with their attendance, and concerned for their welfare; to teach us to condescend to them of low estate, and not to set those with the dogs of our flock whom Christ hath set with the lambs of his. The souls of the poor are as precious to Christ and should be so to us, as those of the rich.

2. The inquiry he made concerning the way of providing for them. He directed himself to Philip, who had been his disciple from the first, and had seen all his miracles, and particularly that of his turning water into wine; and therefore it might be expected that he should have said, Lord, if thou wilt, it is easy to thee to feed them all. Those that, like Israel, have been witnesses of Christ's works, and have shared in the benefit of them, are inexcusable if they say, "Can he furnish a table in the wilderness?" Philip was of Bethsaida, in refuse to come unto me.' The argument from the testimony of the Scriptures thus closely corresponds with that from the testimony of John. "Ye sent to John—ye search the Scriptures; ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light—ye think that in the Scriptures ye have eternal life. John bare witness to the truth—the Scriptures are they that testify of me." In these words our Lord points out to the Jews their inconsistency; they thought they had eternal life in the Scriptures, and yet did not come to him to whom those Scriptures bore witness, and who had this eternal life which they professed to desire. "Ye will not;" the words signify an act of the will, and are tantamount to saying "ye refuse."

v. 42. "But I know you," &c.: the "but" draws a distinction between himself and them. "The love of God" is their love for God. The words are not spoken of a sinful state of mind and heart, but simply of the absence of that love for God which should have been in them (see Deut. vi. 5).

the neighbourhood of which town Christ now was; and therefore he was most likely to help them to provision at the best hand; and probably much of the company was known to him, and he concerned for them. Now Christ asked, "Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat?" First. He takes it for granted that they must all eat with him. One would think, when he had taught and healed them, he had done his part; and now they should rather have been contriving how to treat him and his disciples; for some of the people it is likely were rich, and we are sure that Christ and his disciples were poor; yet he is solicitous to entertain them. Those that will accept Christ's spiritual gifts, instead of paying for them, shall be paid for their acceptance of them. Christ having fed their souls with the bread of life, feeds their bodies also with food convenient, to shew that the Lord is for the body, and to encourage us to pray for our daily bread, and to set us an example of compassion to the poor, Ias. ii. 15. Secondly. His inquiry is, "Whence shall we buy bread?" One would think, considering his poverty, he should rather have asked, where shall we have money to buy for them? But he will rather lay out all he has than they shall want. He will buy to give; and we must labour, that we may give, Eph. iv. 28.

3. The design of this inquiry; it was only to try the faith of Philip, "for he himself knew what he would do," ver. 6. Note, 1st. Our Lord Jesus Christ is never at a loss in his counsels; but how difficult soever the case is, he knows what he has to do, and what course he will take, Acts xv. 18. He knows the thoughts he has towards his people, Jer. xxix. 11; and is never at uncertainty; when we know not, he himself knows what he will do. 2nd. When Christ is pleased to puzzle his people, it is only with a design to prove them. The question put Philip to a nonplus; yet Christ proposed it to try whether he would say, Lord, if thou wilt exert thy power for them, we need not buy bread.

4. Philip's answer to this question, "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient," ver. 7. "Master, it is to no purpose to talk of buying bread for them, for neither will the country afford so much bread, nor can we afford to lay out so much money; ask Judas else, who carries the bag." Two hundred pence of their money amounts to about six pounds of ours; and if they lay out all that at once, it will exhaust their fund, and break them; and they must starve themselves. Grotius computes that two hundred pennyworth of bread would scarce reach to two thousand; but Philip would go as near as he could, will have every one to take a little; and nature, we say, is content with a little. See the weakness of Philip's faith; that in this strait, as if the Master of the family had been an ordinary person, he looked for supply only in an ordinary way. Christ might now have said to him, as he did afterwards, "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip?" or, as God to Moses, in a like case, "Is the Lord's hand waxed short?" We are apt thus to distrust God's power, when visible and ordinary means fail; that is, to trust him no farther than we can see him.

5. The information which Christ received from another of his disciples concerning the provision they had. It was Andrew, here said to be Simon Peter's brother; though he was senior to Peter in discipleship, and instrumental to bring Peter to Christ, yet Peter afterwards so far outshone him, that he is described by his relation to Peter. He acquainted Christ with what they had at hand; and in that we may see,

1st. The strength of his love to those whom he saw his Master concerned for, in that he was willing to bring out all they had, though he knew not but they might want themselves, and any one would have said, "Charity begins at home." He did not go about to conceal it, under pretence of being a better husband of their provision than the Master was, but honestly gives in an account of all they had. "There is a lad here," παῖς ἄνθρωπος, "a little lad," probably one that used to follow this company, as suters do the camp, with provisions to sell; and the disciples had bespoke what he had for themselves; and it was "five barley loaves, and two small fishes." Here, First. The provision was coarse and ordinary; they were barley loaves. Canaan was a land of wheat, Deut. viii. 8; its inhabitants were commonly fed with the finest wheat, Ps. lxxxi. 16; the kidneys of wheat, Deut. xxxii. 14; yet Christ and his disciples were glad of barley bread. It doth not follow hence that we should tie ourselves to such coarse fare, and place religion in it, when God brings that which is finer to our hands, let us receive it and be thankful. But it doth follow, that therefore we must not be desirous of dainties, Pr. xxiii. 5; nor murmur if we be reduced to coarse fare; but be content and thankful, and well reconciled to it. Barley bread is what Christ had, and better than we deserve; nor let us despise the mean provision of the poor, nor look upon it with contempt, remembering how Christ was provided for. Secondly. It was but short and scanty; there were but five loaves, and those so small that one little lad carried them all; and we find, 2 Kin. iv. 42, 43, that twenty barley loaves, with some other provision to help out, would not dine a hundred men without a miracle. There were but two fishes, and those small ones, δύο ὀνείρια, so small that one of them was but a morsel, pisciculi assati. I take the fish to be pickled or soured, for they had not fire to dress them with. The provision of bread was little; but that of the fish was less, in proportion to it; so that many a bit of dry bread they must eat before they could make a meal of this provision; but they were content with it. Bread is meat for our hunger; but they that murmured for flesh, it is said, they asked meat for their lusts, Ps. lxxviii. 18. Well, Andrew was willing the people should have this as far as it would go. Note, A distrustful fear of wanting ourselves should not hinder us from needful charity to others.

2nd. See here the weakness of his faith, in that word, "but what are they among so many?" "To offer that to such a multitude is but to mock them," Philip and he had not that actual consideration of the power of Christ, which they had had such large experience of, as they should have had. Who fed the camp of Israel in the wilderness? He that could make one man chase a thousand, could make one loaf feed a thousand.

6. The directions Christ gave the disciples to seat the guests, ver. 10: "Make the men sit down," though ye have nothing to set before them, and trust me for that; this was like sending providence to market, and going to buy without money. Christ would thus try their obedience. Observe, 1st. The furniture of the dining-room; "there was much grass in that place," though a desert place. See how bountiful nature is, makes grass to grow upon the mountains, Ps. cxlvii. 8. This grass was uneaten: God gives not only enough, but more than enough. Here was this plenty of grass where Christ was preaching. The Gospel brings other blessings along with it; "then shall the earth yield her increase," Ps. lxxvii. 6. This plenty of grass made the place the more commodious for them that must sit on the ground, and served them for cushions, or beds, as they called what they sat on at meat, Est. i. 6; and considering what Christ saith of the grass of the field, Mat. vi. 29, 30, these beds excelled those of Ahasuerus. Nature's pomp is the most glorious. 2nd. The number of the guests, "about five thousand;" a great entertainment, representing that of the Gospel, which is a feast for all nations, Isa. xxv. 6; a feast for all comers.

7. The distribution of the provision, ver. 11. Observe, 1st. It was done with thanksgiving; he gave thanks. Note, First. We ought to give thanks to God for our food; for it is a mercy to have it, and we have it from the hand of God, and must receive it with thanksgiving, 1 Tim. iv. 4, 5. And this is the sweetness of our creature comforts, that they will furnish us with matter, and give us occasion for that excellent duty of thanksgiving. Secondly. Though our provision be coarse and scanty, though we have neither plenty nor dainty, yet we must give thanks to God for what we have.

2nd. It was distributed from the hand of Christ by the hands of his disciples, ver. 11. Note, First. All our comforts come to us originally from the hand of Christ; whoever brings them, it is he that sends them; he distributes to them who distribute to us. Secondly. In distributing the bread of life to those that follow him, he is pleased to make use of the ministration of his disciples; they are the servants at Christ's table, or rather, rulers in his household, to give to every one their portion of meat in due season.

3rd. It was done to universal satisfaction. They did not every one take a little, but all had as much as they would; not a short allowance, but a full meal; and considering how long they had fasted, with what an appetite they sat down, how agreeable this miraculous food may be supposed to be above common food,—it was not a little that served them, when they ate as much as they would, and on free cost. Those whom Christ feeds with the bread of life he doth not stint, Ps. lxxxi. 10. There were but two small fishes, and yet they had of them too "as much as they would." He did not reserve them for better sort of guests, and put off the poor with dry bread, but treated them all alike, for they were all alike welcome. They who call feeding upon fish fasting, reproach the entertainment Christ here made, which was a full feast.

8. The care that was taken of the broken meat.

1st. The orders Christ gave concerning it, ver. 12: "When they were filled," and every man had within him a sensible witness to the truth of the miracle, Christ, "said to the disciples," the servants he employed, "Gather up the fragments." Note, We must always take care that we make no waste of any of God's good creatures; for the grant we have of them, though large and full, is with this proviso, "wilful waste only excepted." It is just with God to bring us to the want of that which we make waste of. The Jews were very careful not to lose any bread, or let it fall to the ground to be trodden upon: Qui panem contemnit in gravem incidit pauperatem.—He who despises bread falls into the depths of poverty, was a saying among them. Though Christ could command supplies whenever he pleased, yet he would have the fragments gathered up. When we are filled, we must remember that others want, and we may want. Those that would have wherewith to be charitable, must be provident. Had this broken meat been left upon the grass, the beasts and fowls would have gathered it up; but that which is fit to be meat for men, is wasted and lost if it be thrown to the brute creatures. Christ did not order the broken meat to be gathered up till all were filled; we must not begin to hoard and lay up till all is laid out that ought to be; for that is withholding more than is meet. Mr. Baxter notes here, "How much less should we lose God's word, or helps, or our time, or such greater mercies."

2nd. The observance of these orders, ver. 13: "they filled twelve baskets with the fragments;" which was an evidence, not only of the truth of the miracle, that they were fed, not with fancy, but with real food, (witness those remains,) but of the greatness of it; they were not only filled, but there was all this over and above. See how large the Divine bounty is; it not only fills the cup, but makes it run over; bread enough, and to spare, in our Father's house. The fragments filled twelve baskets, one for each disciple; they were thus repaid with interest for their willingness to part with what they had for public service: see 2 Chr. xxxi. 10. The Jews lay it as a law upon themselves, when they have eaten a meal, to be sure to leave a piece of bread upon the table, upon which the blessing after meat may rest; for it is a curse upon the wicked man, Job xx. 21, that there shall none of his meat be left.

Thirdly. Here is the influence which this miracle had upon the people, who tasted of the benefit of it, ver. 14; they said, "This is of a truth that prophet." Note, 1st. Even the vulgar Jews with great assurance expected the Messiah to come into the world, and to be a great prophet: they speak here with assurance of his coming. The Pharisees despised them as not knowing the law; but it should seem they knew more of Him that is the end of the law than they did. 2nd. The miracles which Christ wrought did clearly demonstrate that he was the Messiah promised, a teacher come from God, the great Prophet, and could not but convince the amazed spectators that this was he that should come. 3rd. There were many who were convinced he was that prophet which should come into the world, who yet did not cordially receive his doctrine, for they did not continue in it. Such a wretched incoherence and inconsistency there is between the faculties of the corrupt, unsanctified soul, that it is possible for men to acknowledge that Christ is that prophet, and yet turn a deaf ear to him.

15 When Jesus therefore perceived that they would come and take him by force, to make him a king, he departed again into a mountain himself alone. 16 And when even was now come, his disciples went down unto the sea, 17 And entered into a ship, and went over the sea toward Capernaum. And it was now dark, and Jesus was not come to them. 18 And the sea arose by reason of a great wind that blew. 19 So when they had rowed about five and twenty or thirty furlongs, they see Jesus walking on the sea, and drawing nigh unto the ship: and they were afraid. 20 But he saith unto them, It is I; be not afraid. 21 Then they willingly received him into the ship: and immediately the ship was at the land whither they went.

1. Observe what induced him to retire; because he perceived that they who acknowledged him to be that prophet that should come into the world, would come and take him by force to make him a king, ver. 15. Now here we have an instance.

1st. Of the irregular zeal of some of Christ's followers: nothing would serve but they would make him a king. Now, First. This was an act of zeal for the honour of Christ, and against the contempt which the ruling part of the Jewish church put upon him. They were concerned to see so great a benefactor to the world so little esteemed of in it; and therefore, since royal

v. 43, 44. They had not the love of God in their hearts, they therefore did not receive him who came in God the Father's name; there was nothing in common between what he revealed and what was in their hearts and minds. On the contrary, so given up are they to worldly, selfish love, that they would welcome one coming in this spirit, coming in his own name, and seeking his own exaltation. "Nothing is a greater hindrance to simple belief and faith in God than desire and cultivation of men's approbation of ourselves as religious persons, in order to advance our worldly interests. Hence the strong expression, 'How can ye believe which, &c.' "From God only," Alford translates, "from the only God," and says these words are "in contradistinction to the idolatry of the natural heart, which is ever setting up for itself other sources of honour, worshipping man or self, instead of God. The words 'of the only God' are very important, because they form the point of passage to the next verses, in which the Jews are accused of not believing the titles are counted the most illustrious, they would make him a king, knowing that the Messiah was to be a king; and if a prophet like Moses, then a sovereign prince and lawgiver like him; and if they cannot set him up upon the holy hill of Zion, a mountain in Galilee shall serve for the present. Those whom Christ has feasted with the royal dainties of heaven, should in return for his favour make him their king, and set him upon the throne in their souls. Let him that has fed us rule us. But, Secondly. It was an irregular zeal; for, 1st. It was grounded upon a mistake concerning the nature of Christ's kingdom, as if it were to be of this world; and he must appear with outward pomp, a crown on his head, and an army at his foot; such a king as this they would make him, which was as great a disparagement to his glory as it would be to lacker gold, or paint a ruby. Right notions of Christ's kingdom would keep us to right methods for the advancing of it. 2nd. It was excited by the love of the flesh; they would make him their king who could feed them so plentifully without their toil, and save them from the curse of eating their bread in the sweat of their face. 3rd. It was intended to carry on a secular design; they hoped this might be a fair opportunity of shaking off the Roman yoke, which they were weary of. If they had one to head them who could victual an army cheaper than another could provide for a family, they were sure of the sinews of the war, and could not fail of success, and the recovery of their ancient liberties. Thus is religion often prostituted to a secular interest, and Christ is served only to serve a turn, Rom. xvi. 18; vir queritur Jesus, propter Jesum, sed propter aliud. Jesus is usually sought after for something else, not for his own sake. Aug. Nay, 4th. It was a tumultuous, seditious attempt, and a disturbance of the public peace; it would make the country a seat of war, and expose it to the resentments of the Roman power. 5th. It was contrary to the mind of our Lord Jesus himself; for they would take him by force, whether he would or no. Note, Those who force honours upon Christ which he has not required at their hands, displease him, and do him the greatest dishonour. They that say, "I am of Christ," in opposition to those that are of Apollos and Cephas, so making Christ the head of a party, take him by force to make him a king, contrary to his own mind.

2nd. Here is an instance of the humility and self-denial of the Lord Jesus, that when they would have made him a king, he departed; so far was he from countenancing the design, that he effectually quashed it. Herein he has left a testimony, First. Against ambition, and affectation of worldly honour, to which he was perfectly mortified, and has taught us to be so. Had they come to take him by force, and make him a prisoner, he could not have been more industrious to abscond than he was when they would make him a king. Let not us then covet to be the idols of the crowd, nor be desirous of vain-glory. Secondly. Against faction and sedition, treason and rebellion, and whatever tends to disturb the peace of kings and provinces. By this it appears he was no enemy to Caesar, nor would have his followers be so, but the quiet in the land; that he would have his ministers decline every thing that looks like sedition, or looks towards it, and improve their interest only for their works' sake.

2. Observe whither he retired; he "departed again into a mountain," εἰς τὸ ὄρος, 'into the mountain,' the mountain where he had preached, ver. 3; whence he came down into the plain to feed the people, and then returned to it alone, to be private. Christ, though so useful in the places of concourse, yet chose sometimes to be alone, to teach us to sequester ourselves from the world now and then, for the more free converse with God and our own souls; and never less alone, saith the serious Christian, than when alone. Public services must not jostle out private devotions.

Secondly. Here is the disciples' distress at sea: "They that go down to the sea in ships, these see the works of the Lord; for he raiseth the stormy wind," Ps. cvii. 23. Apply that to these disciples.

1. Here is their going down to the sea in a ship, ver. 16, 17. "When even was come," and they had done their day's work, it was time to look homewards, and therefore they went aboard, and set sail for Capernaum. This they did by particular direction from their Master, with design, as it should seem, to get them out of the way of the temptation of countenancing those that would have made him a king.

2. Here is the stormy wind arising, and fulfilling the word of God. They were Christ's disciples, and were now in the way of their duty, and Christ was now in the mount praying for them, and yet in this distress. The perils and afflictions of this present time may very well consist with our interest in Christ and his intercession. They had lately been feasted at Christ's table; but after the sunshine of comfort expect a storm. 1st. "It was now dark;" this made the storm the more dangerous and uncomfortable. Sometimes the people of God are in trouble, and cannot see their way out; in the dark concerning the cause of their trouble, concerning the design and tendency of it, and what the issue will be. 2nd. "Jesus was not come to them." When they were in that storm, Mat. viii. 21, Jesus was with them; but now their beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone. The absence of Christ is the great aggravation of the troubles of Christians. 3rd. "The sea arose by reason of a great wind." It was calm and fair when they put to sea; they were not so presumptuous as to launch out in a storm, but it arose when they were at sea. In times of tranquillity we must prepare for trouble; for it may arise when we little think of it. Let it comfort good people, when they happen to be in storms at sea, that the disciples of Christ were so; and let the promises of a gracious God balance the threats of an angry sea: though in a storm, and in the dark, so were Christ's disciples. Clouds and darkness sometimes surround the children of the light and of the day.

3. Here is Christ's seasonable approach to them when they were in this peril, ver. 19, "they had rowed" (being forced by the contrary winds to betake themselves to their oars) "about twenty-five or thirty furlongs." The Holy Spirit, that indited this, could have ascertained the number of furlongs precisely; but being only circumstantial, that is left to be expressed according to the conjecture of the penman. And when they were got off a good way at sea, "they see Jesus walking on the sea." See here, 1st. The power Christ has over the laws and customs of nature, to control and dispense with them at his pleasure. It is natural for heavy bodies to sink in water; but Christ walked upon the water, as upon dry land, which was more than Moses' dividing the water, and walking through the water. 2nd. The concern Christ has for his disciples in distress: "he drew nigh to the ship;" for therefore he walked upon the water, as he rides upon the heavens, for the help of his people, Deu. xxxiii. 26. He will not leave them comfortless, when they seem to be tossed with tempests, and not comforted. When they are banished, as John, into remote places, or shut up, as Paul and Silas, in close places, he will find access to them, and will be nigh them. 3rd. The relief Christ gives to his disciples in their fears. "They were afraid," more afraid of an apparition, for so they supposed him to be, than of the winds and waves. It is more terrible to wrestle with the rulers of the darkness of this world than with a tempestuous sea. When they thought a demon haunted them, and perhaps was instrumental to raise the storm, they were more terrified than they had been while they saw nothing in it but what was natural. Note, First. Our real distresses are often much increased by our imaginary ones, the creatures of our own fancy. Secondly. Even the approaches of comfort and deliverance are often so misconstrued as to become the occasions of fear and perplexity. We are often not only worse frightened than hurt, but then most frightened when we are ready to be helped. But when they were in this fright, how affectionately did Christ silence their fears with that compassionate word, ver. 20, "It is I, be not afraid." Nothing more powerful to convince sinners than that word, "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest;" nothing more powerful to comfort saints than this, "I am Jesus whom thou lovest." It is I, that love thee, and seek thy good; be not afraid of me, no, nor of the storm. When trouble is nigh, Christ is nigh.

4. Here is their speedy arrival at the port they were bound for, ver. 17. 1st. They welcomed Christ into the ship; "they willingly received him." Note, Christ's absenting himself for a time, is but so much the more to endear himself at his return to his disciples, that value his presence above any thing: see Can. iii. 4. 2nd. Christ landed them safe at the shore; "immediately the ship was at the land whither they went." Note, First. The ship of the church, in which the disciples of Christ have embarked themselves and their all, may be much shattered and distressed, yet it shall come safe to the harbour at last; tossed at sea, but not lost; cast down, but not destroyed; the bush burning, but not consumed. Secondly. The power and presence of the church's King shall expedite and facilitate her deliverance, and conquer the difficulties which have baffled the skill and industry of all her other friends. The disciples had rowed hard, but could not make their point till they had got Christ in the ship, and then the work was done suddenly. If we have received Christ Jesus the Lord, have received him willingly, though the night be dark, and the wind high, yet we may comfort ourselves with this, we shall be at shore shortly, and are nearer to it than we think we are. Many a doubting soul is fetched to heaven by a pleasing surprise, or ever it is aware.

22 The day following, when the people which stood on the other side of the sea saw that there was none other boat there, save that one whereinto his disciples were entered, and that Jesus went not with his disciples into the boat, but that his disciples were gone away alone; 23 (Howbeit there came other boats from Tiberias nigh unto the place where they did eat bread, after that the Lord had given thanks :) 24 When the people therefore saw that Jesus was not there, neither his disciples, they also took shipping, and came to Capernaum, seeking for Jesus. 25 And when they had found him on the other side of the sea, they said unto him, Rabbi, when camest thou hither? 26 Jesus answered them and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled. 27 Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for him hath God the Father sealed.

LAKE AND COUNTRY NEAR CAPERNAUM

writings of Moses, the very pith and kernel of which was the unity of God and the having no other gods but him."

v. 45. Compare verse 22. Mark the difference between accusing and judging.

v. 46. "For he wrote of me:" Alford points out a twofold importance in these words: "(1) A testimony by our Lord to the subject of the whole Pentateuch; and (2) to the fact of Moses having written those books, which were then and are still known by his name."

v. 47. "The meaning is, 'Men give greater weight to what is written or published, the letter of a book, than to mere word of mouth; and ye in particular give greater honour to Moses than to me. If, then, ye believe not what he has written, which comes down to you hallowed by the reverence of ages, how can you believe the words which are uttered by me, to whom you are hostile?' This, however, is not all. Moses leads to Christ, is one of the witnesses by which the Father hath testified of him. 'If, then, ye have rejected the means,

In these verses we have,

First. The careful inquiry which the people made after Christ, ver. 23, 24. They saw the disciples go to sea, they saw Christ retire to the mountain, probably with an intimation that he desired to be private for some time; but their hearts being set upon it to make him a king, they waylaid his return; and the day following, the hot fit of their zeal still continuing,

1. They are here much at a loss for him; he was gone, and they wot not what was become of him; they saw there was no other boat there, but that in which the disciples went off, Providence so ordering it, for the confirming of the miracle of his walking on the sea, for there was no boat for him to go in. They observed also that "Jesus did not go with his disciples," but they went off alone, and had left him among them on their side of the water. Note. Those who would find Christ, must diligently observe all his motions, and learn to understand the tokens of his presence and absence, that they may steer accordingly.

2. They are very industrious in seeking him. They searched the places thereabouts, and "when they saw that Jesus was not there, nor his disciples," neither he nor any one that could give tidings of him, they resolved to search elsewhere. Note. Those that would find Christ, must accomplish a diligent search; must seek till they find; must go from sea to sea to seek the word of God, rather than live without it. And those whom Christ has feasted with the bread of life, should have their souls carried out in earnest desires towards him. Much would have more in communion with Christ. Now, 1st. They resolved to go to Capernaum in quest of him; there was his head-quarters, where he usually resided. Thither his disciples were gone, and they knew he would not be long absent from them. They that would find Christ, must go forth by the footsteps of the flock. 2nd. Providence favoured them with an opportunity of going thither by sea, which was the speediest way; for "there came other boats from Tiberias," that lay farther off upon the same shore, "nigh," though not so nigh, "to the place where they did eat bread," in which they might soon make a trip to Capernaum, and probably the boats were bound for that port. Note. Those that in sincerity seek Christ, and seek opportunities of converse with him, are commonly owned and assisted by Providence in those pursuits. The evangelist having occasion to mention their eating the multiplied bread, adds, "after that the Lord had given thanks," ver. 11. So much were the disciples affected with their Master's giving thanks, that they can never forget the impressions made upon them by it, but took a pleasure in remembering the gracious words that then proceeded out of his mouth. That was the grace and beauty of that meal, and made it remarkable; their hearts burned within them.

3. They laid hold on the opportunity that offered itself; and "they also took shipping, and came to Capernaum, seeking for Jesus." They did not defer, in hopes to see him again on this side the water; but, their convictions being strong, and their desires warm, they followed him presently. Good motions are often crushed, and come to nothing, for want of being prosecuted in time. They came to Capernaum, and, for aught appears, these unsound, hypocritical followers of Christ had a calm and pleasant passage, while his sincere disciples had a rough and stormy one. It is not strange if it fare worst with the best men in this evil world. They came "seeking for Jesus." Note. Those that would find Christ, and find comfort in him, must be willing to take pains, and, as those here, compass sea and land to seek and serve Him who came from heaven to earth to seek and save us.

Secondly. The success of this inquiry; ver. 25. "they found him on the other side of the sea." Note. Christ will be found of those that seek him, first or last; and it is worth while to cross a sea, nay, to go from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth, to seek Christ, if we may but find him at last. Those people appeared afterwards to be unsound, and not acted by any good principle, and yet were thus zealous. Note. Hypocrites may be very forward in their attendance on God's ordinances. If men have no more to shew for their love to Christ, but only their running after sermons and prayers, and their pangs of affection to good preaching, they have reason to suspect themselves no better than this eager crowd. But though these people were no better principled, and Christ knew it, yet he was willing to be found of them, and admitted them into fellowship with him. If we could know the hearts of hypocrites, yet while their profession is plausible, we must not exclude them our communion, much less when we do not.

Thirdly. The question they put to him when they found him: "Rabbi, when camest thou hither?" It should seem, by ver. 59, that they found him in the synagogue. They knew that was the likeliest place to seek Christ in, for it was his custom to attend public assemblies for religious worship, Lu. iv. 16. Note. Christ must be sought, and will be found, in the congregations of his people, and in the administration of his ordinances; public worship is what Christ chooseth to own and grace with his presence and the manifestations of himself. There they found him, and all they had to say to him was, "Rabbi, when camest thou hither?" They saw he would not be made a king, and therefore say no more of that, but call him Rabbi, their teacher. Their inquiry refers not only to the time, but to the manner of his conveying himself thither; not only when, but how, camest thou hither? for there was no boat for him to come in. They were curious in asking concerning Christ's motions, but not solicitous to observe their own.

Fourthly. The answer Christ gave them, not direct to their question, (What was it to them, when and how he came thither?) but such an answer as their case required.

1. He discovers the corrupt principle that they acted from, in their following of him, ver. 26: "Verily, verily, I say unto you;" I, that search the heart, and know what is in man; I, the Amen, the faithful Witness, Rev. iii. 14, 15; "ye seek me," that is well; but it is not from a good principle. Christ knows not only what we do, but why we do it. These followed Christ, 1st. Not for his doctrine's sake, "not because ye saw the miracles." The miracles were the great confirmation of his doctrine. Nicodemus sought for him for the sake of them, ch. iii. 2, and argued from the power of his works to the truth of his word; but these here were so stupid and mindless that they never considered that. But, 2nd. It was for their own bellies' sake, "because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled;" not because he taught them, but because he fed them. He had given them, First. A full meal's meat, "they did eat, and were filled;" and some of them perhaps were so poor that they had not known of a long time before now what it was to have their bellies full, to eat and leave. Secondly. A dainty meal's meat. It is probable, as the miraculous wine was the best wine, so was the miraculous food more than ordinary pleasant. Thirdly. A cheap meal's meat, that cost them nothing, no reckoning brought in. Note. Many follow Christ for loaves, and not for love. Thus they do who aim at secular advantages in their profession of religion, and follow it because by this craft they got their preferments: Quanti profuit nobis hæc fabula de Christo,—"This fable respecting Christ, what a gainful concern we have made of it," said one of the popes. These people complimented Christ with "rabbi," and shewed him great respect; yet he told them thus faithfully of their hypocrisy. His ministers must hence learn not to flatter those that flatter them, nor to be bribed by fair words not to give faithful reproofs where there is cause for them; nor cry peace to all that cry rabbi to them.

2. He directs them to better principles, ver. 27: "Labour for that meat that endureth to everlasting life." He had discoursed with the woman of Samaria under the similitude of water; here he speaks of the same things under the similitude of meat, taking occasion from the loaves they had eaten. His design is,

1st. To moderate our worldly pursuits: "Labour not for the meat that perisheth." This doth not forbid honest labour for food convenient, 2 Thes. iii. 12; but we must not make the things of this world our chief care and concern. Note. First. The things of the world are meat that perisheth. Worldly wealth, honour, and pleasure, these are meat, they feed the fancy, and many times that is all, and fill the belly; things which men hunger after as meat, and glut themselves with, and which a carnal heart, as long as they last, may make a shift to live upon; but they perish, are of a perishing nature, wither of themselves, and are exposed to a thousand accidents; those that have the largest share of them are not sure to have them while they live, but are sure to leave them, and lose them when they die. Secondly. It is therefore folly for us inordinately to labour after them. 1st. We must not labour in religion, nor work the works thereof, for this perishing meat; with an eye to this; must not make our religion subservient to a worldly interest, nor aim at secular advantages in sacred exercises. 2nd. We must not at all labour for this meat; that is, we must not make these perishing things our chief good, nor make our care and pains about them our chief business; not seek those things first and most, Pr. xlii. 45.

2nd. To quicken and excite our gracious pursuits. Bestow your pains to better purpose, and labour for that meat which belongs to the soul; of which he shews,

First. That it is unspeakably desirable: it is "meat which endureth to everlasting life;" it is a happiness which will last as long as we must, which not only itself endures eternally, but will nourish us up to everlasting life. The blessings of the new covenant are our preparative for eternal life, our preservative to it, and the pledge and earnest of it.

Secondly. It is undoubtedly attainable. Shall all the treasures of the world be ransacked, and all the fruits of the earth gathered together, to furnish us with provisions that will last to eternity? No. "The sea saith, It is not in me," among all the treasures hid in the sand; "it cannot be gotten for gold;" "it is that which the Son of man shall give;" ἡν δίδωκε, either which meat, or which life, the Son of man shall give. Observe here, 1. Who gives this meat; the Son of man, the great Householder, and Master of the stores, who is intrusted with the administration of the kingdom of God among men, and the dispensation of the gifts, graces, and comforts of that kingdom, and has power to give eternal life, with all the means of it, and preparations for it. We are bid to labour for it, as if it were to be got by our own industry, and sold upon that valuable consideration, as the heathen said; Dū laboribus omnia vendunt,—"The gods sell all advantages to the industrious." But when we have laboured never so much for it, we have not merited it as our hire, but the Son of man gives it. And what more free than gift? It is an encouragement, that he who has the giving of it is the Son of man; for then we may hope the sons of men that seek it, and labour for it, shall not fail to have it. 2. What authority he has to give it; "for him hath God the Father sealed;" τούτων γὰρ ὁ Πατήρ ἐσφράγισεν ὁ Θεός, "for him the Father hath sealed (that is, proved and evidenced), to be God," so some read it; he has declared himself to be the Son of God with power. He hath sealed him, that is, hath given him full authority to deal between God and man, as God's ambassador to man, and man's intercessor with God; and has proved his commission by miracles; having given him authority, he hath given us assurance of it; having intrusted him with unlimited powers, he hath satisfied us with undoubted proofs of them; so that, as he might go on with confidence in his undertaking for us, so may we in our resignations to him. God the Father sealed him with the Spirit that rested on him, by the voice from heaven, by the testimony he bore to him in signs and wonders. Divine revelation is perfected in him; in him the vision and prophecy is sealed up, Dan. ix. 24; to him all believers seal that he is true, ch. iii. 33, and in him they are all sealed, 2 Cor. i. 22.

28 Then said they unto him, What shall we do, that we might work the works of God? 29 Jesus answered and said unto them, This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent. 30 They said therefore unto him, What sign shewest thou then, that we may see, and believe thee? what dost thou work? 31 Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat. 32 Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. 33 For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. 34 Then said they unto him, Lord, evermore give us this bread. 35 And Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life; he that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst. 36 But I said unto you, That ye also have seen me, and believe not. 37 All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. 38 For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. 39 And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, how shall ye reach the end?" "If your unbelief has stopped the path, how shall ye arrive at him to whom it leads?"—Alford.

vi. 1. Nearly a year elapsed between the delivery of the discourse recorded in chap. v. and the event with which chap. vi. opens. During this time occurred most of the incidents recorded in Matt. v.—xiv. 12; Mark ii. 23—vi. 29; Luke vi.—ix. 9. The second year of Christ's ministry was now near its close.

vi. 1—13. A comparison of the parallel passages (Matt. xiv. 13—21;

Mark vi. 32—44; Luke ix. 10—17) is necessary, to understand fully the circumstances which led to this miracle. The apostles had returned, probably to Capernaum as their rendezvous, after their mission (Mark vi. 12, 13, 30, 31). About the same time the news of the murder of John the Baptist was brought. The number of those who were coming and going became exhausting; everything pointed out the need of a little leisure. Under the influence of these reasons our Lord departed to the other side. The scene of the miracle was that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day. 40 And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day. 41 The Jews then murmured at him, because he said, I am the bread which came down from heaven. 42 And they said, Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? how is it then that he saith, I came down from heaven? 43 Jesus therefore answered and said unto them, Murmur not among yourselves. 44 No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him: and I will raise him up at the last day. 45 It is written in the prophets, And they shall be all taught of God. Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me. 46 Not that any man hath seen the Father, save he which is of God, he hath seen the Father. 47 Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me hath everlasting life. 48 I am that bread of life. 49 Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead. 50 This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die. 51 I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. 52 The Jews therefore strove among themselves, saying, How can this man give us his flesh to eat? 53 Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. 54 Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day. 55 For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. 56 He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him. 57 As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father: so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. 58 This is that bread which came down from heaven: not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead: he that eateth of this bread shall live for ever. 59 These things said he in the synagogue, as he taught in Capernaum.

Whether this conference was with the Capernaïtes, in whose synagogue Christ now was, or with those who came from the other side of the sea, is not certain nor material. However, it is an instance of Christ's condescension, that he gave them leave to ask him questions, and did not resent the interruption as an affront; no, not from his common hearers, though not his immediate followers. Those that would be apt to teach, must be swift to hear, and study to answer. It is the wisdom of teachers, when they are asked even impertinent, unprofitable questions, from thence to take occasion to answer that which is profitable, that the question may be rejected, but not the querist.

Now, First, Christ having told them that they must work for the meat he spoke of, must labour for it, they inquire what work they must do; and he answers them, ver. 28, 29.

1. Their inquiry was pertinent enough; ver. 28, "What shall we do that we may work the works of God?" Some understand it as a pert question: "What works of God can we do more and better than those we do in obedience to the law of Moses?" But I rather take it as a humble, serious question, speaking them to be, at least for the present, in a good mind, and willing to know and do their duty; and I take it that they who asked this question, how and what, ver. 30, and made that request, ver. 34 were not the same persons with those that murmured, ver. 41, 42, and strove, ver. 52, for those are expressly called the Jews which came out of Judaea (for those were strictly called Jews) to civil; whereas these were of Galilee, and came to be taught. This question here intimates that they were convinced that they who would obtain this everlasting meat, 1st. They must aim to do something great; they that look high in their expectations, and hope to enjoy the glory of God, must aim high in those endeavours, and study to "do the works of God," works which he requires, and will accept of,—works of God, distinguished from the works of worldly men in their worldly pursuits. It is not enough to speak the words of God, but we must do the works of God. 2nd. That they must be willing to do any thing: "What shall we do?" "Lord, I am ready to do whatever thou appointest, though never so displeasing to flesh and blood, Acts ix. 6.

2. Christ's answer was plain enough; ver. 29, "This is the work of God, that ye believe." Note, 1st. The work of faith is the work of God: they inquire after the works of God, in the plural number, being careful about many things; but Christ directs them to one work, which includes all, the one thing needful, "that ye believe," which supersedes all the works of the ceremonial law; the work which is necessary to the acceptance of all the other works, and which produceth them; for without faith you cannot please God. It is God's work; for it is of his working in us, it subjects the soul to his working on us, and quickens the soul in working for him. 2nd. That faith is the work of God, which closeth with Christ, and relies upon him. It is to believe on him, as one whom God hath sent; as God's commissioner in the great affair of peace between God and man; and, as such, to rest upon him, and resign ourselves to him: see ch. xiv. 1.

Secondly, Christ having told them that the Son of man would give them this meat, they inquire concerning him, and he answers their inquiry.

1. Their inquiry is after a sign; ver. 30, "What sign shewest thou?" Thus far they were right, that since he required them to give him credit, he should produce his credentials, and make it out by miracle that he was sent of God. Moses having confirmed his mission by signs, it was requisite that Christ, who came to set aside the ceremonial law, should in like manner confirm his. "What dost thou work?" what dost thou drive at? what lasting characters of a Divine power dost thou design to leave upon thy doctrine? But herein they missed it: 1st. That they overlooked the many miracles which they had seen wrought by him, and which amounted to an abundant proof of his Divine mission. Is this a time of day to ask, "What sign shewest thou?" especially at Capernaum, the staple of miracles, where he had done so many mighty works; signs so significant of his office and undertaking. Were not these very persons but the other day miraculously fed by him? None so blind as they that will not see; for they may be so blind as to question whether it be day or no, when the sun shines in their faces. 2nd. That they preferred the miraculous feeding of Israel in the wilderness before all the miracles Christ wrought, ver. 31; "Our fathers did eat manna in the desert;" and to strengthen the objection, they quote a Scripture for it, "He gave them bread from heaven," taken from Ps. lxxviii. 24; he gave them of the corn of heaven. What a good use might be made of this story which they here refer to! It was a memorable instance of God's power and goodness, often mentioned to the glory of God, Neh. ix. 20, 21; yet see how these people perverted it, and made an ill use of it.

First, Christ reproved them for their fondness of the miraculous bread, and bade them not set their hearts upon meat which perisheth. Why, say they, meat for the belly was the great good thing that God gave to our fathers in the desert, and why should not we then labour for that meat? If God made much of them, why should not we be for those that will make much of us?

Secondly, Christ had fed five thousand men with five loaves; and had given them that as one sign, to prove him sent of God; but, under colour of magnifying the miracles of Moses, they tacitly undervalue that miracle of Christ, and evade the evidence of it. Christ fed his thousands, but Moses his hundred thousands. Christ fed them but once, and then reproved those who followed him in hope to be still fed, and put them off with a discourse of spiritual food; but Moses fed his followers forty years; and miracles were not their rarities, but their daily bread. Christ fed them with bread out of the earth, barley bread, and fishes out of the sea; but Moses fed Israel with bread from heaven, angels' food. Thus big did these Jews talk of the manna which their fathers did eat; but their fathers had slighted it, as much as they did now the barley loaves, and called it light bread, Num. xxi. 5. Thus apt are we to slight and overlook the appearances of God's power and grace in our own times, while we pretend to admire the wonders which our fathers told us of. Suppose this miracle of Christ was outdone by that of Moses, yet there were other instances in which Christ's miracles outshone his; and besides, all true miracles prove a Divine doctrine, though not equally illustrious in the circumstances, which were ever diversified according as the occasion did require. As much as the manna excelled the barley loaves, so much, and much more, did the doctrine of Christ excel the law of Moses, and his heavenly institutions the carnal ordinances of that dispensation.

2. Here is Christ's reply to this inquiry; wherein,

First, He rectifies their mistake concerning the typical manna. It was true their fathers did eat manna in the desert; but, 1st. It was not Moses that gave it them, nor were they obliged to him for it; he was but the instrument, and therefore they must look beyond him, to God. We do not find that Moses did so much as pray to God for the manna; and he spoke unadvisedly when he said, "Must we fetch water out of the rock?" for Moses gave them not either that bread or that water. 2nd. It was not given them, as they imagined, from heaven, from the highest heavens, but only from the clouds; and therefore not so much excelling that which had its rise from the earth as they thought. Because the Scripture saith he gave them bread from heaven, it doth not follow that it was heavenly bread, or was intended to be the nourishment of souls. Misunderstanding Scripture language, occasions many mistakes in the things of God.

Secondly, He informs them concerning the true manna, of which that was a type; "but my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven;" that which is truly and properly the bread from heaven, of which that was but a shadow and figure, is now given, not to your fathers, who are dead and gone, but to you of this present age, for whom the better things were reserved. He is now giving you that bread from heaven which is truly so called. As much as the throne of God's glory is above the clouds of the air, so much doth the spiritual bread of the everlasting Gospel excel the manna. In calling God his Father, he speaks himself greater than Moses; for Moses was faithful but as a servant, Christ as a Son, Heb. iii. 5.

Now this objection of theirs, concerning the manna, gave farther occasion to Christ to discourse of himself under the similitude of bread, and of believing under the similitude of eating and drinking; to which, together with his putting of both together, in the eating of his flesh, and drinking of his blood, with the remarks made upon it by the hearers, the rest of this conference may be reduced.

1. Christ having spoken of himself as the great gift of God, and the true bread, ver. 32, largely explains and confirms this, that we may rightly know him.

First, He here shews that he is the true bread; this he repeats again and again, ver. 33, 35, 48—51. Observe, the neighbourhood of a city called Bethsaida. There seems but little doubt that there were two cities of this name, one the city of Philip, Andrew, and Peter—this was in Galilee (John xii. 21); the other was in Gaulonitis, on the eastern or north-eastern shores of the lake, near the spot where the Jordan flows into it. This city was under the jurisdiction of Philip the Tetrarch, and not Herod Antipas. Hence another reason for Christ seeking such a spot, after Herod had put John the Baptist to death. Philip had raised the place from a village to the dignity of a city, and had named it Julius, after Julia, the daughter of Augustus. Bethsaida means "the house of the hunter," or "hunter's place."

vi. 3. "A mountain:" rather, "the mountain." A range of hills runs close along the eastern shore of the lake, falling off to the east, near the head of the lake, where the Jordan enters.

vi. 4. "The Passover:" it seems generally held that our Lord purposely abstained from going up to the feast at this time.

1. That Christ is bread; is that to the soul which bread is to the body; nourisheth and supporteth the spiritual life, is the staff of it, as bread doth the bodily life; it is the staff of life. The doctrine of the Gospel concerning Christ: that he is the Mediator between God and man; that he is our peace, our Righteousness, our Redeemer; "by these things do men live." Our bodies could better live without food, than our souls without Christ. Bread corn is bruised, Isa. xxviii. 28, so was Christ; he was born at Bethlehem, "the house of bread," and typified by the shewbread.

2. That he is "the bread of God," ver. 33; Divine bread; it is he that is of God, ver. 46; bread which my Father gives, ver. 32; which he has made to be the food of our souls; the bread of God's family, his children's bread. The Levitical sacrifices are called the bread of God, Lev. xxi. 21, 22; and Christ is the great sacrifice; Christ, in his word and ordinances, the feast upon the sacrifice.

3. That he is "the bread of life," ver. 35; and again, ver. 48, "that bread of life," alluding to the tree of life in the midst of the garden of Eden; which was to Adam the seal of that part of the covenant, Do this; and live, of which he might eat, and live. Christ is the bread of life; for he is the fruit of the tree of life. 1st. He is the living bread, so he explains himself; ver. 51, "I am the living bread." Bread is itself a dead thing, and nourisheth not, but by the help of the faculties of a living body; but Christ is himself living bread, and nourisheth by his own power. Manna was a dead thing; if kept but one night it putrefied, and bred worms; but Christ is ever living, everlasting bread, that never moulds, or waxeth old. The doctrine of Christ crucified is now as strengthening and comforting to a believer as ever it was, and his mediation still of as much value and efficacy as ever. 2nd. He gives life unto the world, ver. 33, spiritual and eternal life; the life of the soul in union and communion with God here, and in the vision and fruition of him hereafter; a life that includes in it all happiness. The manna did only preserve and support life, did not preserve and perpetuate life, much less restore it; but Christ gives life to those that were dead in sin. The manna was ordained only for the life of the Israelites; but Christ is given for the life of the world; none are excluded from the benefit of this bread, but such as exclude themselves. Christ came to put life into the minds of men—principles productive of acceptable performances.

4. That he is the "bread which came down from heaven;" this is often repeated here, ver. 33, 50, 51, 58. This notes, 1st. The divinity of Christ's nature. As God, he had a being in heaven, from whence he came to take our nature upon him; "I came down from heaven;" from whence we may infer his antiquity, he was in the beginning with God; his ability, for heaven is the firmament of power; and his authority, he came with a Divine commission. 2nd. The Divine original of all that good which flows to us through him. He cometh, not only καταβάς,—"that came down," ver. 51, but καταβάντων,—"that comes down;" he is descending, noting a constant communication of light, life, and love from God to believers, through Christ; as the manna descended daily; see Eph. i. 3; omnia de super,—"all things from above."

5. That he is that bread of which the manna was a type and figure, ver. 58; that bread, the true bread, ver. 32. As the rock that they drank of was Christ; so was the manna they ate of spiritual bread, 1 Cor. x. 3, 4. Manna was given to Israel; so Christ to the spiritual Israel. There was manna enough for them all; so in Christ, a fulness of grace for all believers. He that gathers much of this manna will have none to spare when he comes to use it; and he that gathers little, when his grace comes to be perfected in glory, shall find that he has no lack. Manna was to be gathered in the morning; and those that would find Christ, must seek him early. Manna was sweet, and as the author of the Wisdom of Solomon tells us, ch. xvi. 20, was agreeable to every palate; and to them that believe, Christ is precious. Israel lived upon manna till they came to Canaan; and Christ is our life. There was a memorial of the manna preserved in the ark; so of Christ in the Lord's supper, as the food of souls.

Secondly. He here shews what his undertaking was, and what his errand into the world. Laying aside the metaphor, he speaks plainly, and speaks no proverb, giving us an account of his business among men, ver. 38-40.

1. He assures us in general that he came from heaven upon his Father's business, ver. 38; not to do his own will, but the will of him that sent him. He came from heaven, which speaks him an intelligent, active being, who voluntarily descended to this lower world, a long journey, and a great step downwards. Considering the glories of the world he came from, and the calamities of the world he came to, we may well ask with wonder, what moved him to such an expedition? And here he tells us, he did not come to do his own will, but the will of his Father; not that he had any will that stood in competition with the will of his Father, but they to whom he spoke suspected he might. No, saith he, my own will is not the spring I act from, nor the rule I go by, but I am come to do the will of him that sent me. That is, 1st. Christ did not come into the world as a private person, that acts for himself only; but under a public character, to act for others; as an ambassador or plenipotentiary, authorized by a public commission; he came into the world as God's great agent, and the world's great physician. It was not any business that brought him hither, but he came to settle affairs between parties no less considerable than the great Creator and the whole creation. 2nd. Christ, when he was in the world, did not carry on any private design, nor had any separate interest at all, distinct from theirs for whom he acted. The scope of his whole life was to glorify God, and do good to men; he therefore never consulted his own ease, safety, or quiet; but when he was to lay down his life, though he had a human nature which startled at it, he set aside the consideration of that, and resolved his will, as man, into the will of God; "not as I will, but as thou wilt."

2. He acquaints us in particular with that will of the Father which he came to do; he here declares the decree, the instructions he was to pursue.

First. The private instructions given to Christ, that he should be sure to save all the chosen remnant; and this is the covenant of redemption between the Father and the Son; ver. 38, "this is the Father's will which hath sent me," this is the charge I am intrusted with, "that of all which he hath given me I should lose none."

Note, 1st. There is a certain number of the children of men given by the Father to Jesus Christ to be his care, and so to be to him for a name and a praise; given him for an inheritance, for a possession. Let him do all that for them which their case requires; teach them, and heal them, pay their debt, and plead their cause; prepare them for, and preserve them to, eternal life, and then let him make his best of them. The Father might dispose of them as he pleased: as creatures, their lives and beings were derived from him; as sinners, their lives and beings were forfeited to him: he might have sold them for the satisfaction of his justice, and delivered them to the tormentors; but he pitched upon them to be the monuments of his mercy, and delivered them to the Saviour. Those whom God chose to be the objects of his special love he lodged as a trust in the hands of Christ.

2nd. Jesus Christ has undertaken that he will lose none of those that were thus given him of the Father. The many sons whom he was to bring to glory shall all be forthcoming, and none of them missing, Mat. xviii. 14. None of them shall be lost for want of a sufficient price to purchase them, or sufficient grace to sanctify them. "If I bring him not unto thee, and set him before thee, let me bear the blame for ever," Gen. xliii. 9.

vi. 5. "A great company:" in verse 2 we read that they followed him. They recognised him and went afoot, says another evangelist. They came probably from Capernaum, and other adjacent places. They passed round the head of the lake, crossing the Jordan, which at this point is fordable. "Come," or perhaps "kept coming." The day was rapidly passing away; the people kept arriving.

vi. 10. A distinction between two words used in this verse does not appear in the English, as both are translated "men." Alford has,

3rd. Christ's undertaking for those that are given him extends to the resurrection of their bodies. "I will raise it up again at the last day," which supposeth all that goes before, but this is to crown and complete the undertaking. The body is a part of the man, and therefore a part of Christ's purchase and charge; it pertains to the promises, and therefore it shall not be lost. The undertaking is not only that he shall lose none, no person, but that he shall lose nothing, no part of the person, and therefore not the body. Christ's undertaking will never be accomplished till the resurrection, when the souls and bodies of the saints shall be reunited, and gathered to Christ, that he may present them to the Father; "Behold I and the children that thou hast given me," Heb. ii. 13; 2 Tim. i. 12.

4th. The spring and original of all this is the sovereign will of God; the counsels of his will, according to which he worketh all this. This was the commandment he gave to his Son when he sent him into the world, and to which the Son always had an eye.

Secondly. The public instructions which were to be given to the children of men, in what way, and upon what terms, they might obtain salvation by Christ; and this is the covenant of grace between God and man. Who the particular persons were that were given to Christ is a secret; "the Lord knows them that are his;" we do not, nor is it fit we should; but, though their names are concealed, their characters are published. An offer is made of life and happiness upon gospel terms, that by it those that were given to Christ might be brought to him, and others left inexcusable; ver. 40, "this is the will," the revealed will, "of him that sent me," the method agreed upon, upon which to proceed with the children of men, "that every one, Jew or Gentile, that sees the Son, and believes on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up." This is the Gospel indeed, good news.

Is it not reviving to hear this? 1st. That eternal life may be had, if it be not our own fault; that whereas, upon the sin of the first Adam, the way of the tree of life was blocked up, by the grace of the second Adam it is laid open again. The crown of glory is set before us as the prize of our high calling, which we may run for and obtain. 2nd. Every one may have it. This Gospel is to be preached, this offer made, to all, and none can say, "It belongs not to me," Rev. xxii. 17. 3rd. This everlasting life is sure to all those who believe in Christ, and to them only. He that sees the Son, and believes on him, shall be saved. Some understand this seeing as a limitation of this condition of salvation to those only that have the revelation of Christ and his grace made to them. Every one that has the opportunity of being acquainted with Christ, and improves that so well as to believe in him, shall have everlasting life; so that none shall be condemned for unbelief, however they may for other sins, but those who have had the Gospel preached to them, who, like these Jews here, ver. 36, have seen, and yet have not believed; have known Christ, and yet not trusted in him. But I rather understand seeing here to mean the same thing with believing, for it is θεωρῶν, which signifies, not so much the sight of the eye (as ver. 36, ὥρασαντες με), as the contemplation of the mind. "Every one that sees the Son," that is, believes on him, sees him with an eye of faith, by which we come to be duly acquainted and affected with the doctrine of the Gospel concerning him. It is to look upon him, as the stung Israelites upon the brazen serpent. It is not a blind faith that Christ requires, that we should be willing to have our eyes put out, and then follow him; but that we should see him, and see what ground we go upon in our faith. It is then right, when it is not taken up upon hearsay, believing as the church believes, but is the result of a due consideration of, and insight into, the motives of credibility. "Now mine eye sees thee;" "we have heard him ourselves." 4th. Those who believe in Jesus Christ, in order to their having everlasting life, shall be raised up by his power at the last day. He had it in charge as the Father's will, ver. 39; and here he solemnly makes it his own undertaking, "I will raise him up;" which signifies not only the return of the body to life, but the putting of the whole man into a full possession of the eternal life promised.

Now Christ, discoursing thus concerning himself, as the bread of life that came down from heaven, let us see what remarks his hearers made upon it.

First. When they heard of such a thing as the bread of God, which gives life, they heartily prayed for it; ver. 34, "Lord, evermore give us this bread." I cannot think that this is spoken scoffingly, and in a way of derision, as most interpreters understand it: "Give us such bread as this if thou canst; let us be fed with it, not for one meal, as with the five loaves, but evermore;" as if this were no better a prayer than that of the impenitent thief, "If thou be the Christ, save thyself and us." But I take this request to be made, though ignorantly, yet honestly, and to be well meant; for they call him "Lord," and desire a share in what he gives, whatever he means by it. General and confused notions of Divine things produce in carnal hearts some kind of desires towards them, and wishes of them; like Balaam's wish, to die the death of the righteous. Those who have an indistinct knowledge of the things of God, who see men as trees walking, make, as I may call them, inarticulate prayers for spiritual blessings. They think the favour of God a good thing, and heaven a fine place, and cannot but wish them their own, while they have no value or desire at all for that holiness which is necessary both to the one and to the other. Let this be the desire of our souls. Have we tasted that the Lord is gracious, been feasted with the Word of God, and Christ in the Word, let us say, "Lord, evermore give us this bread;" let the bread of life be our daily bread, the heavenly manna our continual feast, and let us never know the want of it.

Secondly. But when they understood that by this bread of life Jesus meant himself, then they despised it. Whether they were the same persons that had prayed for it, ver. 34, or some others of the company, doth not appear. It seems to be some others, for they are called Jews. Now it is said, ver. 41, they "murmured at him." This comes in immediately after that solemn declaration Christ had made of God's will, and his own undertaking concerning man's salvation, ver. 39, 40; which certainly were some of the most weighty and gracious words that ever proceeded out of the mouth of our Lord Jesus, the most faithful, and best worthy of all acceptance; one would think that, like Israel in Egypt, when they heard that God had thus visited them, they should have bowed their heads and worshipped; but, on the contrary, instead of closing with the offer made them, they murmured, quarrelled with what Christ said; and though they did not openly oppose and contradict it, yet they privately whispered among themselves in contempt of it, and instilled into one another's minds prejudices against it. Many that will not professedly contradict the doctrine of Christ, (their cavils are so weak and groundless that they are either ashamed to own them, or afraid to have them silenced,) yet say in their heart they do not like it. Now,

1. That which offended them was Christ's asserting his original to be from heaven, ver. 41, 42. "How is it that he saith, I came down from heaven?" They had heard of angels coming down from heaven, but never of a man; overlooking the proofs he had given them of his being more than a man.

2. That which they thought justified them herein was, that they knew his extraction on earth: "Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know?" They took it heinously that he should say he came down from heaven, when he was one of them. They speak slightly of his blessed name, Jesus; "Is not this Jesus?" They take it for granted that Joseph was really his father, though he was only reputed to be so. Note. Mistakes

"Make the people sit down. . . . So the 'men' sat down." A comparison of Matt. xiv. 21 will show that the men are distinguished from the women and children. It seems that the men alone sat in ranks, and thus were counted. "Much grass:" at this time of year, just before the feast of the Passover, the grass would be abundant.

vi. 11. The oldest MSS. omit the mention of the disciples, and read simply, "He distributed to them that were set down."

vi. 15. "When Jesus perceived:" or, "Jesus knowing that they concerning the person of Christ, as if he were a mere man, conceived and born by ordinary generation, occasion the offence that is taken at his doctrine and offices. Those who set him on a level with other the sons of men, whose father and mother we know, no wonder if they derogate from the honour of his satisfaction, and the mysteries of his undertaking; and, like the Jews here, murmur at his promise to raise us up at the last day.

II. Christ having spoken of faith as the great work of God, ver. 29, discoursed largely concerning this work, instructing and encouraging us in it.

First. He shews what it is to believe in Christ.

1. To believe in Christ is to come to Christ; he that comes to me is the same with he that believes in me, ver. 35; and again, ver. 37, "he that comes unto me," so ver. 44, 45. Repentance towards God is coming to him, Jer. iii. 22, as our chief good and highest end; and so faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ is coming to him, as our prince and Saviour, and our way to the Father. It notes the outgoings of our affections towards him, for those are the motions of the soul, and actions agreeable; it is to come off from all those things that stand in opposition to him, or competition with him, and to come up to those terms upon which life and salvation are offered to us through him. When he was here on earth it was more than barely coming where he was; so it is now, more than coming to his Word and ordinances.

2. It is to feed upon Christ; ver. 51, "If any man eat of this bread; the former notes applying ourselves to Christ, this notes applying Christ to ourselves, with appetite and delight, that we may receive life, and strength, and comfort from him; to feed on him, as the Israelites on the manna, having quitted the flesh-pots of Egypt, and not depending on the labour of their hands to eat of that, but living purely on the bread given them from heaven.

Secondly. He shews what is to be got by believing in Christ. What will he give us if we come to him? What shall we be the better if we feed upon him? Want and death are the chief things we dread; may we but be assured of the comforts of our being, and the continuance of it in the midst of those comforts, we have enough. Now these two are here secured to true believers.

1. They shall never want, never hunger, never thirst, ver. 35. Desires they have, earnest desires; but those so suitably, so seasonably, so abundantly satisfied, that they cannot be called hunger and thirst, which is uneasy and painful. Those that did eat manna, and drank of the rock, hungered and thirsted afterwards; manna surfeited them, water out of the rock failed them; but there is such an overflowing fulness in Christ as can never be exhausted, and such overflowing communications from him as can never be interrupted.

2. They shall never die, not die eternally; for, 1st. He that believeth on Christ hath everlasting life, ver. 47; he hath the assurance of it, the grant of it, the earnest of it; he has it in the promise and firstfruits. Union with Christ, and communion with God in Christ, is everlasting life begun. 2nd. Whereas they that did eat manna died, Christ is such bread as man may eat of and never die, ver. 49, 50. Observe here,

First. The insufficiency of the typical manna: "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead." There may be much good use made of the death of our fathers; their graves speak to us, and their monuments are our memorials, particularly of this, that the greatest plenty of the most dainty food will neither prolong the thread of life nor put by the stroke of death. Those that did eat manna, angels' food, yet died like other men. There could be nothing amiss in their diet to shorten their days, nor could their deaths be hastened by the toils and fatigues of life, for they neither sowed nor reaped, and yet they died. 1st. Many of them died by the immediate strokes of God's vengeance for their unbelief and murmurings; for though they did eat that spiritual meat, yet with many of them God was not well pleased, but they were overthrown in the wilderness, 1 Cor. x. 3-5. Their eating manna was no security to them from the wrath of God, as believing in Christ is to us. 2nd. The rest of them died in a course of nature, and their carcasses fell under a Divine sentence, in that wilderness where they did eat manna. In that very age when miracles were daily bread was the life of man reduced to the stint it now stands at, as appears, Ps. xc. 10. Let them not boast so much of manna then.

Secondly. The all-sufficiency of the true manna, of which the other was a type: "this is the bread that cometh down from heaven," that truly Divine and heavenly food, "that a man may eat thereof and not die;" that is, not fall under the wrath of God, which is killing to the soul; not die the second death, no, nor the first death, finally and irrecoverably; not die, that is, not perish, nor come short of the heavenly Canaan, as the Israelites did of the earthly, for want of faith, though they had manna. This is farther explained by that promise in the next words; "if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever," ver. 58. That is the meaning of his never dying; though he go down to death, he shall pass through it, to that world where there shall be no more death. To live for ever is not to be for ever, (the damned in hell shall be for ever, the soul of man was made for an endless state,) but to be happy for ever. And because the body must needs die, and be as water spilt upon the ground, Christ here undertakes for the gathering of that up too, as before, ver. 44, "I will raise him up at the last day;" and even that shall live for ever.

Thirdly. He shews what encouragements we have to believe in Christ. Christ here speaks of some who had seen him and yet believed not, ver. 36. They saw his person and miracles, and heard him preach, and yet were not wrought upon to believe in him. Faith is not always the effect of sight; the soldiers were eye-witnesses of his resurrection; and yet, instead of believing in him, belied him; so that it is a difficult thing to bring people to believe in Christ. And by the operation of the Spirit of grace, those that have not seen, yet have believed.

Two things we are here assured of, to encourage our faith:

1. That the Son will bid all those welcome that come to him; ver. 37, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." How welcome should this word be to our souls, which bids us welcome to Christ! Him that comes; it is in the singular number, speaking favour, not only to the body of believers in general, but to every particular soul that applies itself to Christ. Here, 1st. The duty required is a pure gospel duty; to come to Christ, that we may come to God by him. His beauty and love, those great attractions, must draw us to him; sense of need and fear of danger must drive us to him; any thing to bring us to Christ. 2nd. The promise is a pure gospel promise, "I will in no wise cast out," οὐ μὴ ἐκβάλω ἔξω; there are two negatives, "I will not; no, I will not." 1st. Much favour is expressed here. We have reason to fear that he should cast us out; considering our meanness, our vileness, our unworthiness to come, our weakness in coming, we may justly expect that he should frown upon us, and shut his doors against us; but he obviates these fears with this assurance, he will not do it; will not disdain us, though we are mean; will not reject us, though we are sinful. Do poor scholars come to him to be taught? though they be dull and slow he will not cast them out. Do poor patients come to him to be cured? poor clients come to him to be advised? though their case be bad, and though they come empty-handed, he will in no wise cast them out. But, 2nd. More favour is implied than is expressed: when it is said he will not cast them out, the meaning is, he will receive them and entertain them, and give them all that which they come to him for: as he will not would," &c. He not only withdrew himself, but he constrained his disciples (compare Matt. xiv. 22) to leave the spot. Perhaps he thought it well to separate them from the multitude, who contemplated a popular movement.

vi. 17. "Went over;" better, "were going over." "Toward Capernaum;" Mark has "unto Bethsaida"—i.e., the town of that name on the western shore. The apparent discrepancy is solved when it is observed that a different preposition is used. They refuse them at their first coming, so he will not afterwards, upon every displeasure, cast them out. His gifts and callings are without repentance.

2. That the Father will without fail bring all those to him in due time that were given him. In the federal transactions between the Father and the Son, relating to man's redemption, as the Son undertook for the justification, sanctification, and salvation of all that should come to him,—let me have them put into my hands, and then leave the management of them to me;—so the Father, the fountain, and the original of being, life, and grace, undertook to put into his hand all that were given him, and bring them to him. Now,

First. He here assures us that this shall be done; ver. 37, "all that the Father giveth me shall come to me." Christ had complained, ver. 36, of those who, though they had seen him, yet would not believe on him; and then he adds this, 1st. For their conviction and awakening; plainly intimating that their not coming to him, and believing on him, if they persisted in it, would be a certain sign that they did not belong to the election of grace; for how can we think that God gave us to Christ, if we give ourselves to the world and the flesh? 2 Pet. i. 10. 2nd. For his own comfort and encouragement; "though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious." The election has obtained, and shall, though multitudes be blinded, Rom. xi. 7, though he lose many of his creatures, yet none of his charge; "all that the Father gives him shall come to him" notwithstanding. Here we have,

1st. The election described: "all that the Father giveth me." πᾶν ὃ δίδωμι μοι, every thing which the Father gives to me. The persons of the elect, and all that belongs to them; all their services, all their interests; as all that he hath is theirs, so all that they have is his, and he speaks of them as his all: they were given him in full recompence of his undertaking. Not only all persons, but all things, are gathered together in Christ, Eph. i. 10, and reconciled, Col. i. 20. The giving of the chosen remnant to Christ is spoken of, ver. 39, as a thing done—he hath given them; here it is spoken of as a thing in the doing—he giveth them; because, when the First-begotten was brought into the world, it should seem there was a renewal of the grant: see Heb. x. 5, &c. God was now about to give him the heathen for his inheritance, Ps. ii. 8; to put him in possession of the desolate heritages, Isa. xlix. 8; to divide him a portion with the great, Isa. liii. 12; and though the Jews who saw him believed not on him, yet these, saith he, shall come to me; the other sheep which are not of this fold shall be brought, ch. x. 15; see Acts xiii. 45-48.

2nd. The effect of it secured; "they shall come to me." This is not in the nature of a promise, but a prediction, that as many as were in the counsel of God ordained to life shall be brought to life by being brought to Christ. They are scattered, are mingled among the nations, yet none of them shall be forgotten; not a grain of God's corn shall be lost, as is promised, Am. ix. 9. They are by nature alienated from Christ, and averse to him, and yet "they shall come." As God's omnipotence is engaged for the finding of them all out, so is his omnipotence for the bringing of them all in. Not, they shall be driven to me, but they shall come freely, shall be made willing.

Secondly. He here acquaints us how it shall be done. How shall those who are given to Christ be brought to him? Two things are to be done in order to it:

1st. Their understandings shall be enlightened; that is promised, ver. 45, 46. "It is written in the prophets," who spake of these things before, "And they shall be all taught of God;" this we find, Isa. liv. 13, and Jer. xxxi. 34; "they shall all know me." Note. In order to our believing in Jesus Christ it is necessary we be taught of God; that is, 1st. That there be a Divine revelation made to us, discovering to us both what we are to believe concerning Christ, and why we are to believe it. There are some things which even nature teacheth, but to bring us to Christ there is need of a higher light. 2nd. That there be a Divine work wrought in us, enabling us to understand and receive these revealed truths, and the evidence of them. God, in giving us reason, teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth; but in giving us faith, he teacheth us more than the natural man. Thus all the church's children, all that are genuine, are taught of God; he hath undertaken their education.

It follows then, by way of inference from this, that "every man that has heard and learned of the Father comes to Christ," ver. 45. 1st. It is here implied that none will come to Christ but those that have heard and learned of the Father. We shall never be brought to Christ but under a Divine conduct. Except God, by his grace, enlighten our minds, inform our judgments, and rectify our mistakes; and not only tell us, that we may hear, but teach us, that we may learn, the truth as it is in Jesus, we shall never be brought to believe in Christ. 2nd. That this Divine teaching doth so necessarily produce the faith of God's elect, that we may conclude that those who do not come to Christ have never heard or learned of the Father; for if they had, doubtless they would have come to Christ. In vain do men pretend to be taught of God, if they believe not in Christ, for he teacheth no other lesson, Gal. i. 8, 9. See how God deals with men as reasonable creatures, draws them with the cords of a man, opens the understanding first, and then by that, in a regular way, influenceth the inferior faculties; thus he comes in by the door; but Satan, as a robber, climbs up another way.

But lest any should dream of a visible appearance of God the Father to the children of men, to teach them these things, and entertain any gross conceptions about hearing and learning of the Father, he adds, ver. 46, "Not that any man hath seen the Father;" it is implied, nor can see him with bodily eyes, or may expect to learn of him, as Moses did, to whom he spake face to face; but God, enlightening men's eyes, and teaching them, works in a spiritual way. The Father of spirits hath access to, and influence upon, men's spirits undiscerned. Those that have not seen his face have felt his power; and yet there is one intimately acquainted with the Father, "he which is of God," that is, Christ himself, "he hath seen the Father," ch. i. 18. Note. 1st. Jesus Christ is of God in a peculiar manner, God of God, Light of Light; not only sent of God, but begotten of God before all worlds. 2nd. It is the prerogative of Christ to have seen the Father, perfectly to know him and his counsels. 3rd. Even that illumination which is preparative to faith is conveyed to us through Christ. Those that learn of the Father, forasmuch as they cannot see him themselves, must learn of Christ, who alone hath seen him. As all Divine discoveries are made through Christ, so through him all Divine powers are exerted.

2nd. Their wills shall be bowed. If the soul of man had now its original rectitude, there needed no more to influence the will but the illumination of the understanding; but in the depraved soul of fallen man there is a rebellion of the will against the right dictates of the understanding—a carnal μαρ, which is enmity itself to the Divine light and law: it is therefore requisite that there be a work of grace wrought upon the will, which is here called drawing; ver. 44, "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him." The Jews murmured at the doctrine of Christ; not only would not receive it themselves, but were angry that others did. Christ overheard their secret whisperings, and said, ver. 43, "Murmur not among yourselves;" lay not the fault of your dislike of my doctrine one upon another, as if it is because you find it generally distasteful; no, it is along of yourselves, and your own corrupt dispositions, which are such as amount to a moral impotency: your antipathies to the truths of God, and prejudices against them, are so strong went towards ("over against" is the marginal rendering in Mark) Bethsaida; but they went to Capernaum, for it was there they landed. The west or south-west wind which was blowing is quite enough to account for any deviation of course to the northward. St. Mark tells us that Jesus did not lose sight of his disciples: "he saw them toiling in rowing."

vi. 18. "The sea was rising, for a strong wind was blowing" (Alford). From Matthew and Mark we learn that the wind was contrary.

that nothing less than a Divine power can conquer them. And this is the case of all mankind; "no man can come to me," can persuade himself to come up to the terms of the Gospel, "except the Father which hath sent me draw him," ver. 44. Observe.

1st. The nature of the work; it is drawing; which speaks not a force put upon the will, but a change wrought in the will, whereby of unwilling we are made willing, and a new bias given to the soul, by which it inclines to God. This seems to be more than a moral suasion, for by that it is in the power of man to draw; yet it is not to be called a physical impulse, for it lies out of the road of nature; but he that formed the spirit of man within him by his creating power, and fashioned the hearts of men by his providential influence, knows how to new-mould the soul, and to alter its bent and temper, and make it conformable to himself and his own will, without doing any wrong to its natural liberty. It is such a drawing as works not only a compliance, but a cheerful compliance, a complacency; "Draw us, and we will run after thee."

2nd. The necessity of it: no man in this weak and helpless state can come to Christ without it. As we cannot do any natural action without the concurrence of common providence, so we cannot do any action morally good without the influence of special grace, in which the new man lives, and moves, and has its being, as much as the mere man has in the Divine providence.

3rd. The author of it; "the Father which hath sent me." The Father having sent Christ, will succeed him; for he would not send him on a fruitless errand. Christ having undertaken to bring souls to glory, God promised him, in order thereunto, to bring them to him, and so to give him possession of those whom he had given him a right to. God, having by promise given the kingdom of Israel to David, did at length draw the hearts of the people to him; so having sent Christ to save souls, he sends souls to him to be saved by him.

4th. The crown and perfection of this work; and "I will raise him up at the last day." This is four times mentioned in this discourse, and doubtless it includes all the intermediate and preparatory workings of Divine grace. When he raises them up at the last day, he will put the last hand to his undertaking, will bring forth the topstone. If he undertake this, sure he can do any thing, and will do every thing that is necessary in order to it. Let our expectations be carried out towards a happiness reserved for the last day, when all the years of time shall be fully complete and ended.

III. Christ, having thus spoken of himself as the bread of life, and of faith as the work of God, comes more particularly to shew what of himself is this bread, namely, his flesh; and that to believe is to eat of that, ver. 51—53, where he still prosecutes the metaphor of food. Observe.

First. The preparation of this food; "the bread that I will give is my flesh," ver. 51; "the flesh of the Son of man, and his blood," ver. 53; "his flesh is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed," ver. 55.

Secondly. The participation of this food; we must "eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood," ver. 53; and again, ver. 54, "whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood," and the same words, ver. 56, 57, "he that eateth me." This is certainly a parable, or figurative discourse, wherein the actings of the soul, upon things spiritual and Divine, are represented by bodily actions about things sensible; which made the truths of Christ more intelligible to some, and less so to others, Mar. iv. 12. Now let us see,

1. How this discourse of Christ was liable to mistake and misconstruction, that "men might see and not perceive."

1st. It was misconstrued by the carnal Jews, to whom it was first delivered, ver. 2, "they strove among themselves;" they whispered in each other's ears their dissatisfaction. "How can this man give us his flesh to eat?" Christ spoke, ver. 51, of giving his flesh for us to suffer and die; but they, without due consideration, understood it of his giving it to us to be eaten, which gave occasion to Christ to tell them that, however what he had said was otherwise intended, yet even that also of eating his flesh, was no such absurd thing, if rightly understood, as prima facie,—in the first instance, they took it to be.

2nd. It has been wretchedly misconstrued by the church of Rome, for the support of their monstrous doctrine of transubstantiation, which gives the lie to our senses, contradicts the nature of a sacrament, and overthrows all convincing evidence. They, like these Jews here, understand it of a corporal and carnal eating of Christ's body; like Nicodemus, ch. iii. 4. The Lord's supper was not yet instituted, and therefore it could have no reference to that; it is a spiritual eating and drinking that is here spoken of, not a sacramental.

3rd. It is misunderstood by many ignorant, carnal people, who from hence infer, that if they take the sacrament when they die, they shall certainly go to heaven; which, as it makes many that are weak causelessly uneasy if they want it, so it makes many that are wicked causelessly easy if they have it. Let us see therefore.

2. How this discourse of Christ's is to be understood.

1st. What is meant by the flesh and blood of Christ. It is called, ver. 53, "the flesh of the Son of man, and his blood;" his, as Messiah and Mediator, the flesh and blood which he assumed in his incarnation, Heb. ii. 14, and which he gave up in his death and sufferings; "my flesh which I will give" to be crucified and slain. It is said to be given "for the life of the world," that is, First. Instead of the life of the world, which was forfeited by sin, Christ gives his own flesh as a ransom or counter price. Christ was our bail, bound body for body (as we say), and therefore his life must go for ours, that ours may be spared; "Here am I, let these go their way." Secondly. In order to "the life of the world," to purchase a general offer of eternal life to all the world, and the special assurances of it to all believers. So that the flesh and blood of the Son of man, is the Redeemer incarnate, and dying; it is Christ and him crucified, and the redemption wrought out by him, with all the precious benefits of redemption—pardon of sin, acceptance with God, the adoption of sons, access to the throne of grace, the promises of the covenant, and eternal life—these are called the flesh and blood of Christ. 1st. Because they are purchased by his flesh and blood, by the breaking of his body, and the shedding of his blood. Well may the purchased privileges be denominated from the price that was paid for them, for it puts a value upon them; write upon them pretium sanguinis,—the price of blood. 2nd. Because they are meat and drink to our souls. Flesh with the blood was prohibited, Gen. ix. 4; but the privileges of the Gospel are as flesh and blood to us, prepared for the nourishment of our souls. He had before compared himself to bread, which is necessary food; here to flesh, which is delicious. It is a feast of fat things, Isa. xxv. 6; the soul is satisfied with Christ as with marrow and fatness, Psa. lxxiii. 5. It is meat indeed, and drink indeed; truly so, that is, spiritually, so Dr. Whitby; as Christ is called the true vine, or truly meat, in opposition to the shows and shadows with which the world shams off those that feed upon it. In Christ and his Gospel there is real supply, and solid satisfaction; that is meat indeed, and drink indeed, which satiates and replenisheth, Jer. xxxi. 25, 26.

2nd. What is meant by eating this flesh, and drinking this blood, which is so necessary and beneficial; it is certain it means neither more nor less than believing in Christ. As we partake of meat and drink by eating and drinking, so we partake of Christ and his benefits by faith. And believing in Christ includes these four things, which eating and drinking doth: First. It implies an appetite to Christ. This spiritual eating and drinking begins with hungering and thirsting, Mat. v. 6; earnest and importunate desires after Christ, not willing to take up with any thing short of an interest in him: "Give me Christ, or else I die." Secondly. An application of Christ to ourselves. Meat looked upon will not nourish us; but meat fed upon, and so made our own, and as it were one with us. We must so accept of Christ as to appropriate him to ourselves; "my Lord, and my God," ch. xx. 28. Thirdly. A delight in Christ and his salvation. The doctrine of Christ crucified must be meat and drink to us, most pleasant and delightful. We must feast upon the dainties of the New Testament in the blood of Christ, taking as great a complacency in the methods which Infinite Wisdom has taken to redeem and save us, as ever we did in the most needful supplies or grateful delights of nature. Fourthly. A derivation of nourishment from him, and a dependence upon him for the support and comfort of our spiritual life, and the strength, growth, and vigour of the new man. To feed upon Christ, is to do all in his name, in union with him, and by virtue drawn from him; it is to live upon him as we do upon our meat. How our bodies are nourished by our food we cannot describe, but that they are so we know and find; so it is with this spiritual nourishment. Our Saviour was so well pleased with this metaphor, as very significant and expressive, that when afterward he would institute some outward sensible signs, by which to represent our communicating of the benefits of his death, he chose those of eating and drinking, and made them sacramental actions.

Having thus explained the general meaning of this part of Christ's discourse, the particulars are reducible to two heads:

First. The necessity of our feeding upon Christ; ver. 53, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you;" that is, 1. It is a certain sign you have no spiritual life in you, if you have no desire towards Christ, nor delight in him. If the soul doth not hunger and thirst, certainly it doth not live. It is a sign we are dead indeed, if we are dead to such meat and drink as this. When artificial bees, that by curious springs were made to move to and fro, were to be distinguished from natural ones, they say it was by putting honey among them, which the natural bees only flocked to; but the artificial ones minded it not, for they had no life in them. 2. It is certain you can have no spiritual life, unless you derive it from Christ by faith; separated from him you can do nothing. Faith in Christ is the primum vivens—the first living principle of grace; without it we have not the truth of spiritual life, nor any title to eternal life: our bodies may as well live without meat, as our souls without Christ.

Secondly. The benefit and advantage of it, in two things:

1. We shall be one with Christ, as our bodies are with our food when it is digested; ver. 56, "he that eats my flesh, and drinks my blood," that lives by faith in Christ crucified, (it is spoken of as a continued act,) he "dwelleth in me, and I in him." By faith we have a close and intimate union with Christ; he is in us, and we in him, ch. xvii. 21—23; 1 Jno. iii. 24. Believers dwell in Christ as their stronghold, or city of refuge; Christ dwells in them as the master of the house, to rule it, and provide for it. Such is the union between Christ and believers, that he shares in their griefs, and they share in his graces and joys; he saps with them upon their bitter herbs, and they with him upon his rich dainties. It is an inseparable union, like that between the body and the digested food, Rom. viii. 35; 1 Jno. iv. 13.

2. We shall live, live eternally by him, as our bodies by our food. 1st. We shall live by him; ver. 57, "As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me." We have here the series and order of the Divine life. First. God is the living Father; hath life in and of himself: "I am that I am" is his name for ever. Secondly. Jesus Christ, as Mediator, lives by the Father; he has life in himself, ch. v. 26, but he has it of the Father; he that sent him, not only qualified him with that life which was necessary to so great an undertaking, but constituted him the treasury of Divine life to us; breathed into the second Adam the breath of spiritual lives, as into the first Adam the breath of natural lives. Thirdly. True believers receive this Divine life by virtue of their union with Christ, which is inferred from the union between the Father and the Son, as it is compared to it, ch. xvii. 21, for therefore "he that eateth me," or feeds on me, "even he shall live by me." Those that live upon Christ shall live by him. The life of believers is had from Christ, ch. i. 16; it is hid with Christ, Col. iii. 4; we live by him as the members by the head, the branches by the root; because he lives we shall live also. 2nd. We shall live eternally by him; ver. 54, "Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood," as it is prepared in the Gospel to be the food of souls, "he hath eternal life;" he hath it now, as, ver. 40, he hath that in him which is eternal life begun; he has the earnest and foretaste of it, and the hope of it, he "shall live for ever," ver. 58. His happiness shall run parallel with the longest line of eternity itself.

The historian concludes with an account where Christ had this discourse with the Jews; ver. 59, "in the synagogue, as he taught;" implying that he taught them many other things besides these, but this was that in his discourse which was new. He adds this, that "he said these things in the synagogue," to shew, 1. The credit of Christ's doctrine. His truths sought no corners, but were publicly preached in mixed assemblies, as able to abide the most severe and impartial test. Christ pleaded this upon trial, ch. xviii. 20, "I ever taught in the synagogue." 2. The credibility of this narrative of it. To assure you that the discourse was fairly represented, he appeals to the synagogue at Capernaum, where it might be examined.

60 Many therefore of his disciples, when they had heard this, said, This is an hard saying; who can hear it? 61 When Jesus knew in himself that his disciples murmured at it, he said unto them, Doth this offend you? 62 What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before? 63 It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life. 64 But there are some of you that believe not. For Jesus knew from the beginning who they were that believed not, and who should betray him. 65 And he said, Therefore said I unto you, that no man can come unto me, except it were given unto him of my Father. 66 From that

vi. 19. "Five-and-twenty or thirty furlongs:" this would be about half way across the lake, which is seven miles wide. Some idea of the slowness of their progress against the heavy seas and contrary winds may be gathered from the fact that it was the fourth watch (i.e., about 3 A.M.) when Jesus came to them (Mark vi. 48). As they started about sunset, they could only have made three and a half miles in some eight or nine hours.

vi. 23. "Howbeit there came other boats:" or, "yet other boats came from Tiberias." This verse furnishes an undesigned coincidence between St. John and St. Mark. John does not mention the "contrary" wind; but this account of the arrival of the boats from Tiberias exactly coincides with the direction of the wind, which would carry vessels coming from the south-west, and land them at the eastern Bethsaida.

vi. 24. "Took shipping:" or, "entered into the boats"—i.e., those mentioned in verse 23.

time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him. 67 Then said Jesus unto the twelve, Will ye also go away? 68 Then Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life. 69 And we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God. 70 Jesus answered them, Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? 71 He spake of Judas Iscariot the son of Simon: for he it was that should betray him, being one of the twelve.

We have here an account of the effect of Christ's discourse; some were offended, and others edified by it; some driven from him, and others brought nearer to him.

1. To some it was a savour of death unto death, not only to the Jews, who were professed enemies to him and his doctrine, but even to many of his disciples, such as were disciples at large, that were his frequent hearers, and followed him in public; a mixed multitude, like those among Israel, that began all the discontents. Now here we have,

First. Their murmurings at the doctrine they heard, ver. 60; not a few, but many of them, were offended at it. Of the several sorts of ground that received the seed, only one in four brought forth fruit. See what they say to it; ver. 60, "This is a hard saying, who can hear it?" 1st. They do not like it themselves: What stuff is this? Eat the flesh, and drink the blood of the Son of man! If it be understood figuratively, it is not intelligible; if literally, not practicable. What! must they turn cannibals? Can they not be religious but they must be barbarous? Si Christiani adorant quod comedunt, (said Averroes,) sit anima mea cum philosophis.—If Christians adore what they eat, my mind shall continue with the philosophers. Now, when they found it a hard saying, if they had humbly begged of Christ to have declared unto them this parable, he would have opened it, and their understandings too,—for the meek will he teach his way; but they were not willing to have Christ's sayings explained to them, because they would not lose this pretence for rejecting them, that they were "hard sayings." 2nd. They think it impossible any one else should like it; "Who can hear it?" surely none can. Thus the scoffers at religion are ready to undertake that all the intelligent part of mankind concur with them; they conclude, with great assurance, that no man of sense will admit the doctrine of Christ, nor any man of spirit submit to his laws; because they cannot bear to be so tutored, so tied up themselves, they think none else can. "Who can hear it?" Thanks be to God, thousands have heard these sayings of Christ, and have found them not only easy, but pleasant as their necessary food.

Secondly. Christ's animadversions upon their murmurings.

1. He well enough knew their murmurings, ver. 61. Their cavils were secret in their own breasts, or whispered among themselves in a corner. But, 1st. Christ knew them, he saw them, he heard them. Note, Christ takes notice not only of the bold and open defiance that are done to his name and glory by daring sinners, but of the secret slights that are put upon his doctrine by carnal professors. He knows that which the fool saith in his heart, and cannot for shame speak out; he observes how his doctrine is resented by those to whom it is preached; who rejoice in it, and who murmur at it; who are reconciled to it, and bow before it; and who quarrel with it, and rebel against it, though never so secretly. 2nd. He knew it "in himself;" not by any information given him, or any external indication of the thing, but by his own Divine omniscience: he knew it, not as the prophets, by a Divine revelation made to him,—that which the prophets desired to know was sometimes hid from them, as 2 Kin. iv. 27.—but by a Divine knowledge in him. He is that essential Word that discerns the thoughts of the heart, Heb. iv. 12, 13. Thoughts are words to Christ; we should therefore take heed, not only what we say and do, but what we think.

2. He well enough knew how to answer them: "Doth this offend you?" Is this a stumbling-block to you? See how people by their own wilful mistakes create offences to themselves: they take offence where there is none given, and make it even there where there is nothing to make it of. Note, We may justly wonder that so much offence should be taken at the doctrine of Christ, for so little cause. Christ speaks of it here with wonder, "Doth this offend you?" How unreasonable are your quarrels!

Now, in answer to those who condemned his doctrine as intricate and obscure, (Si non vis intelligi debes negligi,—"If you are unwilling to be understood, you ought to be neglected.")

First. He gives them a hint of his ascension into heaven, as that which would give an irresistible evidence of the truth of his doctrine; ver. 62. "What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before?" And what then? 1st. If I should tell you of that, surely it would much more offend you, and you would think my pretensions too high indeed. If this be so hard a saying that you cannot hear it, how will you digest it when I tell you of my returning to heaven, from whence I came down? see ch. iii. 12. Those who stumble at smaller difficulties should consider how they will get over greater. 2nd. "When you see the Son of man ascend, this will much more offend you, for then my body will be less capable of being eaten by you in that gross sense wherein you now understand it;" so Dr. Whitby. Or, 3rd. When you see that, or hear it from those that shall see it, surely then you will be satisfied. You think I take too much upon me, when I say, "I came down from heaven," for that was it you quarrelled with, ver. 42; but will you think so when you see me return to heaven? If he ascended, certainly he descended; Eph. iv. 9, 10; Christ did often refer himself thus to subsequent proofs, as ch. i. 50, 51; ii. 14; Mat. xii. 40; xvii. 64. Let us wait awhile till the mystery of God shall be finished, and then we shall see there was no reason to be offended at any of Christ's sayings.

Secondly. He gives them a general key to this, and all such parabolical discourses; teaching them that they are to be understood spiritually, and not after a corporal and carnal manner; ver. 63. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing." As it is in the natural body, the animal spirits quicken and enliven it, and without these the most nourishing food would profit nothing; what would the body be the better for bread, if it were not quickened and animated by the spirit? so it is with the soul. 1st. The bare participation of ordinances, unless the Spirit of God work with them, and quicken the soul by them, profiteth nothing; the Word and ordinances, if the Spirit work with them, are as food to a living man; if not, they are as food to a dead man. Even the flesh of Christ, the sacrifice for sin, will avail us nothing unless the blessed Spirit quicken our souls thereby, and enforce the powerful influences of his death upon us, till we by his grace are planted together in the likeness of it. 2nd. The doctrine of eating Christ's flesh, and drinking his blood, if it be understood literally, profits nothing, but rather leads us into mistakes and prejudices; but the spiritual sense and meaning of it quickens the soul, makes it alive, and lively, for so it follows, "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life." To eat the flesh of Christ, is a hard saying, but to believe that Christ died for man, and to derive from that doctrine strength and comfort in my approaches to God, my oppositions of sin, and preparations for a future state, this is the spirit and life of that saying, and construing it thus it is an excellent saying. The reason why men dislike Christ's sayings is, because they mistake them. The literal sense of a parable doth us no good, we are never the wiser for it, but the spiritual meaning is instructive. 3rd. The flesh; that is, those that are in the flesh, (so some understand it,) that are under the power of a carnal mind, they profit nothing by Christ's discourses; but the Spirit, that is, those that have the Spirit, that are spiritual, they are quickened and enlivened by them, for they are received ad modum recipientis,—so as to correspond with the state of the receiver's mind. They found fault with Christ's sayings, whereas the fault was in themselves; it is only to sensual minds that spiritual things are senseless and sapless; spiritual minds relish them; see 1 Cor. ii. 14, 15.

Thirdly. He gives them an intimation of his knowledge of them, and that he had expected no better from them, though they called themselves his disciples, ver. 64, 65. Now was fulfilled that of the prophet, speaking of Christ and his doctrine, Isa. liii. 1. "Who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" Both these Christ here takes notice of.

1st. They did not believe his report. "There are some of you" who said you would leave all to follow me, "who yet believe not;" and this was the reason why the Word preached did not profit them, because it was not mixed with faith, Heb. iv. 2. They did not believe him to be the Messiah, else they would have acquiesced in the doctrine he preached, and not have quarrelled with it, though there were some things in it dark, and hard to be understood; oportet discipulum credere,—"young beginners in learning must take things upon their teacher's word." Note, 1. Among those who are nominal Christians there are many that are real infidels. 2. The unbelief of hypocrites, before it discovers itself to the world, is naked and open before the eyes of Christ. He knew from the beginning who they were of the multitudes that followed him, that believed; and who of the twelve should betray him; he knew from the beginning of their acquaintance with him, and attendance on him, when they were in the hottest pang of their zeal, who were sincere, as Nathanael, ch. i. 47, and who were not. Before they distinguished themselves by any overt act, he could infallibly distinguish who believed, and who did not; whose love was counterfeited, and whose cordial. We may gather hence, 1st. That the apostasy of those who have long made a plausible profession of religion, is a certain proof of their constant hypocrisy, and that from the beginning they believed not; but is not a proof of the possibility of the total and final apostasy of any true believers. Such revolts are not to be called the fall of real saints, but the discovery of pretended ones: see 1 Jno. ii. 19; stella cadens non stella fuit,—"the star that falls never was a star." 2nd. That it is Christ's prerogative to know the heart; he knows who they are that believe not, but dissemble in their profession, and yet continues them room in his church, the use of his ordinances, and the credit of his name, and doth not discover them in this world, unless they by their own wickedness discover themselves; because such is the constitution of his visible church, and the discovering day is yet to come; but if we pretend to judge men's hearts, we step into Christ's throne, and anticipate his judgment. We are often deceived in men, and see cause to change our sentiments of them; but this we are sure of, that Christ knows all men, and his judgment is according to truth.

2nd. The reason why they did not believe his report was, because the arm of the Lord was not revealed unto them; for, ver. 65, "Therefore said I unto you, that no man can come to me, except it were given unto him of my Father," referring to ver. 44; Christ therefore could not but know who believed, and who did not, because faith is the gift and work of God, and all his Father's gifts and works could not but be known to him, for they all passed through his hands. There he had said, none could "come to him except the Father draw him;" here he saith, "except it were given him of my Father;" which shews that God draws souls by giving them grace and strength, and a heart to come; without which, such is the moral impotency of man in his fallen state, that he cannot come.

Thirdly. We have here their final apostasy from Christ hereupon; ver. 66, "From that time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him." When we admit into our minds hard thoughts of the word and works of Christ, and conceive a secret dislike, and are willing to hear insinuations tending to their reproach, we are then entering into temptation: it is as the letting forth of water, it is looking back, which, if infinite mercy prevent not, will end in drawing back; therefore, obsta principii,—"take heed of the beginnings of apostasy."

1. See here the backsliding of these disciples. Many of them went back: to their houses, and families, and callings, which they had left for a time to follow him; went back, one to his farm, and another to his merchandise; went back, as Orpah did, to their people, and to their gods, Ru. i. 15. They had entered themselves in Christ's school, but they went back,—did not only play truant for once, but took leave of him and his doctrine for ever. Note, The apostasy of Christ's disciples from him, though really a strange thing, yet has been such a common thing that we need not think strange at it. Here were many that went back. It is often so, when some backslide, many backslide with them; the disease is infectious.

2. The occasion of this backsliding. "From that time," from the time that Christ preached this comfortable doctrine, that he is the bread of life, and those who by faith feed upon him shall live by him, which one would think should have engaged them to cleave the more closely to him, "from that time" they withdrew. Note, The corrupt and wicked heart of man often makes that an occasion of offence, which is indeed matter of the greatest comfort. Christ foresaw that they would thus take offence at what he said, and yet he said it. That which is the undoubted word and truth of Christ must be faithfully delivered, whoever are offended at it. Men's humours must be captivated to God's Word, and not that accommodated to men's humours.

3. The degree of their apostasy; "they walked no more with him" returned no more to him, and attended no more upon his ministry. It is hard for those "who have been once enlightened, and have tasted the good Word of God, if they fall away, to renew them again to repentance," Heb. vi. 4-6.

4. This discourse was to others a savour of life unto life. "Many went back," but, thanks be to God, all did not; even then the twelve stuck to him. Though the faith of some be overthrown, yet the foundation of God stands sure. Observe here,

First. The affectionate question which Christ put to the twelve, ver. 67, "Will ye also go away?" He saith nothing to them which went back; "if the unbelieving depart, let them depart;" it was no great loss of those whom he never had; light come, light go. But he takes this occasion to speak to the twelve, to confirm them; and by trying their steadfastness the more to fix them.

vi. 27. "For him hath God the Father sealed:" rather read, "For him the Father sealed, even God." Sealed is equivalent to "designated" or "appointed" for that end.

vi. 32. Lightfoot has an interesting note on this verse. The Gemarists, he says, affirm that manna was given for the merits of Moses. "There were three good shepherds of Israel—Moses, Aaron, and Miriam; and there were three good things given us by their hands—a well, a cloud, and manna: the well for the merits of Miriam, the pillar of the cloud for the merits of Aaron, manna for the merits of Moses." Contrary, therefore, to this opinion of theirs, it may well be said, "Moses did not give you this bread"—i.e., it was by no means for any merit of his.

vi. 34. "Lord, evermore give us this bread:" there seemed to be a half-awakening of their thoughts at this point.

vi. 35. It should be noted that from this point the discourse is conducted in the first person. It has been reckoned that "I" or "Will ye also go away?" 1. It is at your choice whether ye will or no; if ye will forsake me, now is the time, when so many do. It is an hour of temptation; if ye will go back, go now. Note, Christ will detain none with him against their wills; his soldiers are volunteers, not pressed men. The twelve had now had time enough to try how they liked Christ and his doctrine; and that none of them might afterwards say they were trepanned into discipleship, and if it were to do again they would not do it, he here allows them a power of revocation, and leaves them at their liberty, as Jos. xxiv. 15; Ru. i. 15. 2. It is at your peril if you do go away. If there were any secret inclination in the heart of any of them to depart from him now, he stops it with this awakening question, "Will you also go away?" Think not that you hang at as loose an end as they did, and may go away as easily as they can; they have not been so intimate with me as you have been, nor received so many favours from me; they are gone, but will you go? Remember your character, and say, whatever others do, we will never go away: "Should such a man as I flee?" Neh. vi. 11. Note, The nearer we have been to Christ, and the longer we have been with him,—the more mercies we have received from him, and the more engagements we have laid ourselves under to him,—the greater will be our sin if we desert him. 3. I have reason to think you will not. "Will you go away?" No; I have faster hold of you than so; I hope better things of you, Heb. vi. 9; for you are they that have continued with me, Lu. xxii. 28. When the apostasy of some is a grief to the Lord Jesus, the constancy of others is so much the more his honour, and he is pleased with it accordingly. Christ and believers know one another too well to part upon every displeasure.

Secondly, The believing reply which Peter, in the name of the rest, made to this question, ver. 68, 69. Christ put the question to them, as Joshua put Israel to their choice, whom they would serve, with design to draw out from them a promise to adhere to him, and it had the like effect: "Nay, but we will serve the Lord." Peter was, upon all occasions, the mouth of the rest, not so much because he had more of his Master's ear than they, but because he had more tongue of his own; and what he said was sometimes approved, and sometimes reprimanded, Mat. xvi. 17, 23; the common lot of those who are swift to speak. This here was well said, admirably well; and probably he said it by the direction, and with the express assent, of his fellow-disciples; at least he knew their mind, and spoke the sense of them all, and did not except Judas; for we must hope the best.

1. Here is a good resolution to adhere to Christ; and so expressed as to intimate that they would not entertain the least thought of leaving him: "Lord, to whom shall we go?" "it were folly to go from thee, unless we knew where to mend ourselves. No, Lord, we like our choice too well to change." Note, Those who leave Christ would do well to consider whom they will go to, and whether they can expect to find rest and peace any where but in him: see Ps. lxxiii. 27, 28; Hos. ii. 9. "Whither shall we go?" Shall we make our court to the world? It will certainly deceive us. Shall we return to sin? It will certainly destroy us. Shall we leave the fountain of living waters for broken cisterns? The disciples resolve to continue their pursuit of life and happiness; and will have a guide to it,—and will adhere to Christ as their guide,—for they can never have a better. "Shall we go to the heathen philosophers, and become their disciples? They are become vain in their imaginations; and, professing themselves to be wise in other things, are become fools in religion. Shall we go to the scribes and Pharisees, and sit at their feet? What good can they do us, who have made void the commandments of God by their traditions? Shall we go to Moses? He will send us back again to thee. Therefore, if ever we find the way to happiness, it must be in following thee. Note, Christ's holy religion appears to great advantage when it is compared with other institutions, for then it will be seen how far it excels them all. Let them who find fault with this religion, before they quit it, find a better. A Divine teacher we must have; can we find a better than Christ? A Divine revelation we cannot be without; if the Scripture be not such a one, where else may we look for it?"

2. Here is a good reason for this resolution. It was not the inconsiderate resolve of a blind affection, but the result of mature deliberation. The disciples were resolved never to go away from Christ.

1st. Because of the advantage they promised themselves by him; "thou hast the words of eternal life." They themselves did not fully understand Christ's discourse, for as yet the doctrine of the cross was a riddle to them; but in the general they were satisfied that he had "the words of eternal life;" that is, First. That the word of his doctrine shewed the way to eternal life, set it before us, and directed us what to do that we may inherit it. Secondly. That the word of his doom and determination must confer eternal life. His having the words of eternal life, is the same with his having power to give eternal life to as many as were given him, ch. xvii. 2. He had, in the foregoing discourse, assured eternal life to his followers. These disciples fasten upon that plain saying, and therefore resolved to stick to him, when the other overlooked that, and fastened upon the hard sayings, and therefore forsook him. Though we cannot account for every mystery, every obscurity in Christ's doctrine, yet we know in the general it is the word of eternal life, and therefore must live and die by it; for if we forsake Christ, we forsake our own merits.

2nd. Because of the assurance they had concerning him; ver. 69. "We know, and are sure, that thou art that Christ." If he be the promised Messiah, he must bring in an everlasting righteousness, Dan. ix. 24, and therefore has the words of eternal life, for righteousness reigns to eternal life, Rom. v. 21. Observe, First. The doctrine they believed: that this Jesus was the Messiah promised to the fathers, and expected by them; and that he was not a mere man, but the Son of the living God, the same to whom God had said, "Thou art my Son," Ps. ii. 7. In times of temptation to apostasy it is good to have recourse to our first principles, and stick to them; and, if we faithfully abide by that which is past dispute, we shall be the better able both to find and to keep the truth in matters of doubtful disputation. Secondly. The degree of their faith: it rose up to a full assurance; "we are sure," we have known it by experience, that is the best knowledge. We should take occasion, from others' wavering, to be so much the more established, especially in that which is the present truth. When we have so strong a faith in the Gospel of Christ as boldly to venture our souls upon it, knowing whom we have believed, then, and not till then, we shall be willing to venture every thing else for it.

Thirdly. The melancholy remark which our Lord Jesus made upon this reply of Peter's: ver. 70, 71. "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?" And the evangelist tells us who he meant; "he spake of Judas Iscariot." Peter had undertaken for them all that they would be tight to their Master. Now Christ doth not condemn his charity,—it is always good to hope the best,—but he tacitly corrects his confidence. We must not be too sure concerning any. God knows them that are his, we do not. Observe here,

1. Hypocrites and betrayers of Christ are no better than devils. Judas not only had a devil, but he was a devil; "one of you is a false accuser," so διαβολος sometimes signifies, 1 Tim. iii. 11; and it is probable that Judas, when he sold his Master to the chief priests, represented him to them as an ill man, to justify himself in what he did. But I rather take it as we read it, 'he is a devil,' a devil incarnate; a fallen apostle, as the devil a fallen angel. He is Satan, an adversary, an enemy to Christ. He is Abaddon, and Apollyon, a son of perdition. He was of his father, the devil; did his lusts, was in his interests, as Cain, 1 Jno. iii. 12. Those whose bodies were possessed by the devil, are never called devils (demoniacs, but not devils); but Judas, into whose heart Satan entered, and filled it, is called a devil.

2. Many that are seeming saints are real devils. Judas had as fair an outside as many of the apostles; his venom was, like that of the serpent, covered with a fine skin. He cast out devils, and appeared an enemy to the devil's kingdom, and yet was himself a devil all the while. Not only he will be one shortly, but he is one now. It is strange, and to be admired; Christ speaks of it with wonder, "Have not I?" It is sad, and to be lamented, that ever Christianity should be made a cloak to diabolism!

3. The disguises of hypocrites, however they may deceive men, and put a cheat upon them, cannot deceive Christ, for his piercing eye sees through them. He can call those devils that call themselves Christians; like the prophet's greeting to Jeroboam's wife, when she came to him in masquerade, 1 Kin. xiv. 6, "Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam." Christ's divine sight, far better than any double sight, can see spirits.

4. There are those who are chosen by Christ to special services, that yet prove false to him: "I have chosen you to the apostleship; for, it is expressly said, Judas was not chosen to eternal life, ch. xiii. 18;" and yet one of you is a devil." Note, Advancement to places of honour and trust in the church is no certain evidence of saving grace: "We have prophesied in thy name."

5. In the most select societies on this side heaven, it is no new thing to meet with those that are corrupt. Of the twelve that were chosen to an intimate conversation with an incarnate Deity,—as great an honour and privilege as ever men were chosen to,—one was an incarnate devil. The historian lays an emphasis upon this, that Judas was one of the twelve that were so dignified and distinguished. Let us not therefore reject and unchurch the twelve because one of them is a devil; nor say they are all cheats and hypocrites, because one of them was so: let those that are so, bear the blame, and not those who, while they are undiscovered, incorporate with them. There is a society within the veil, into which no unclean thing shall enter,—a church of firstborn, in which are no false brethren.

CHAPTER VII.

In this chapter we have, 1. Christ's declining for some time to appear publicly in Judæa, ver. 1. 11. His design to go up to Jerusalem at the feast of tabernacles; and his discourse with his kindred, in Galilee, concerning his going up to this feast, ver. 3—13. III. His preaching publicly in the temple at that feast: 1. In the midst of the feast, ver. 14, 15, we have his discourse with the Jews, 1st. Concerning his doctrine, ver. 16—18; 2nd. Concerning the crime of sabbath-breaking laid to his charge, ver. 19—24; 3rd. Concerning himself, both whence he came, and whither he was going, ver. 25—36. 2. On the last day of the feast: 1st. His gracious invitation to poor souls to come to him, ver. 37—39. 2nd. The reception that it met with. First. Many of the people disputed about it, ver. 40—44. Secondly. The chief priests would have brought him into trouble for it, but were first balked by their officers, ver. 45—49, and then silenced by one of their own court, ver. 50—53.

AFTER these things Jesus walked in Galilee: for he would not walk in Jewry, because the Jews sought to kill him. 2 Now the Jews' feast of tabernacles was at hand. 3 His brethren therefore said unto him, Depart hence, and go into Judæa, that thy disciples also may see the works that thou doest. 4 For there is no man that doeth any thing in secret, and he himself seeketh to be known openly. If thou do these things, shew thyself to the world. 5 For neither did his brethren believe in him. 6 Then Jesus said unto them, My time is not yet come: but your time is always ready. 7 The world cannot hate you; but me it hateth, because I testify of it, that the works thereof are evil. 8 Go ye up unto this feast: I go not up yet unto this feast; for my time is not yet full come. 9 When he had said these words unto them, he abode still in Galilee. 10 But when his brethren were gone up, then went he also up unto the feast, not openly, but as it were in secret. 11 Then the Jews sought him at the feast, and said, Where is he? 12 And there was much murmuring among the people concerning him: for some said, He is a good man: others said, Nay; but he deceiveth the people. 13 Howbeit no man spake openly of him for fear of the Jews.

We have here,
First. The reason given why Christ spent more of his time in Galilee than in

"me" occurs no less than five-and-thirty times. This is not egotism. There are times when the frequent use of the first person on the part of a mere creature is not egotism; when used by the Divine Redeemer, the very form heightens the promise, and helps the heart of the hearer. "For, as the great master of the philosophy of language, William Humboldt, observes, they (i.e., the pronouns 'I' and 'thee') are not mere substitutes for the persons for whom they stand (they are not, that is to say, mere pronouns), but involve the personality of the speaker, and of the person spoken to, and the relation between them" ("Guesses at Truth").

vi. 36. "Ye also have seen:" rather, "ye have even seen me." This rendering gives force to verse 40, and serves to illustrate the language used in chap. xx. 29. (Compare 1 Pet. i. 8.)

vi. 49. "Did eat . . . and are dead:" or, "ate the manna in the wilderness, and died."

vi. 70. "A devil:" the answer of Peter was in the plural, "we

Judaea, ver. 1; because the Jews, the people in Judaea and Jerusalem, sought to kill him, for curing the impotent man on the sabbath day, ch. v. 16. They thought to be the death of him, either by a popular tumult or by a legal prosecution. In consideration of this he kept at a distance, in another part of the country, very much out of the lines of Jerusalem's communication. It is not said he durst not, but, he would not, walk in Jewry. It was not through fear and cowardice that he declined it, but in prudence, because his hour was not yet come. Note, 1st, Gospel light is justly taken away from those that endeavour to extinguish it and blow it out. Christ will withdraw from those that drive him from them, and hide his face from those that spit in it, and justly shut up his bowels from those that spurn at them. 2nd. In times of imminent peril, it is not only allowable, but advisable, to withdraw and abscond for our own safety and preservation, and to choose the service of those places which are least perilous, Mat. x. 23. Then, and not till then, we are called to expose and lay down our lives, when we cannot save them without sin. 3rd. If the providence of God casts persons of merit into places of obscurity and little note, it must not be thought strange; it was the lot of our Master himself; he who was fit to have sat in the highest of Moses' seats willingly "walked in Galilee" among the ordinary sort of people. Observe, He did not sit still in Galilee, nor bury himself alive there, but "walked," he "went about doing good." When we cannot do what and where we would, we must do what and where we can.

Secondly. The approach of the feast of tabernacles, ver. 2, one of the three solemnities which called for the personal attendance of all the males at Jerusalem: see the institution of it, Lev. xxiii. 34, &c., and the revival of it, after a long disuse, Neh. viii. 14. It was intended to be both a memorial of the tabernacle state of Israel in the wilderness, and a figure of the tabernacle state of God's spiritual Israel in this world. This feast, which was instituted so many hundred years before, was still religiously observed. Note, Divine institutions are never antiquated, nor go out of date by length of time; nor must wilderness mercies ever be forgotten. But it is called the Jews' feast, because it was now shortly to be abolished, as a mere Jewish thing, and left to them that served the tabernacle.

Thirdly. Christ's discourse with "his brethren," some of his kindred, whether by his mother or his supposed father is not certain; but they were such as pretended to have an interest in him, and therefore interposed to advise him in his conduct. And observe,

1st. Their ambition and vainglory in urging him to make a more public appearance than he did. "Depart hence," said they, "and go into Judaea," ver. 3, where thou wilt make a better figure than thou canst here. Two reasons they give for this advice:

First. That it would be an encouragement to those in and about Jerusalem, who had a respect for him; for, expecting his temporal kingdom, the royal seat of which they concluded must be at Jerusalem, they would have disciples there to be particularly countenanced; and thought the time he spent among his Galilean disciples wasted and thrown away, and his miracles turning to no account, unless they at Jerusalem saw them. Or, that thy disciples, that is, all of them in general, who will be gathered at Jerusalem to keep the feast, may see thy works; and not, as here, a few at one time, and a few at another.

Secondly. That it would be for the advancing of his own name and honour; "there is no man that doth any thing in secret, if he himself seeks to be known openly." They take it for granted that Christ sought to make known himself, and therefore thought it absurd for him to conceal his miracles. "If thou do these things," if thou be so well able to gain the applause of the people, and the approbation of the rulers, by thy miracles, venture abroad, and "shew thyself to the world." Supported with these credentials, thou canst not fail of acceptance, and therefore it is high time to set up for an interest, and think of being great.

Now one would not think there was any harm in this, and yet the evangelist notes it as an evidence of their infidelity; for "neither did his brethren believe in him," ver. 5; if they had, they would not have said this. Observe, 1st. It was an honour to be of the kindred of Christ, but no saving honour; they that hear his word, and keep it, are the kindred he values. Sure grace runs in no blood in the world, when not in that of Christ's family. 2nd. It was a sign Christ did not aim at any secular interest; for then his kindred would have struck in with him, and he would have secured them first. 3rd. There were those that were akin to Christ according to the flesh, who did believe in him—three of the twelve were his brethren; and yet others, as nearly allied to him as they, did not believe on him. Many that have the same external privileges and advantages do not make the same use of them.
